ROYAL COMMISSION UPON THE DUTIES OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

COPY OF ROYAL WARRANT.

Whitehall, May 28, 1906.

The KING has been pleased to issue a Commission under His Majesty's Royal Sign Manual to the following effect:—

EDWARD, R. & I.

Edward the Seventh, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas King, Defender of the Faith; To Our Right Trusty and Well-beloved Councillor Alfred Lyttelton, one of Our Counsel Learned in the Law, and Our Trusty and Well-beloved Rufus Daniel Isaacs, Esquire, one of Our Counsel Learned in the Law; David Brynmor Jones, Esquire, one of Our Counsel Learned in the Law; Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esquire, Barrister-at-Law; and Willoughby Hyett Dickinson, Esquire, Barrister-at-Law; Greeting!

Whereas We have deemed it expedient that a Commission should forthwith issue to inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged, with power to make recommendations thereon:

Now know Ye, that We, reposing great trust and confidence in your knowledge and ability, have authorized and appointed, and do by these Presents authorize and appoint you, the said Alfred Lyttelton (Chairman); Rufus Daniel Isaacs; David Brynmor Jones; Charles Algernon Whitmore; and Willoughby Hyett Dickinson, to be Our Commissioners for the purpose of the said Inquiry:

And for the better effecting the purpose of this Our Commission, We do by these Presents give and grant unto you, or any three or more of you, full power to call before you such persons as you shall judge likely to afford you any information upon this Our Commission; and also to call for, have access to and examine all such books, documents, registers and records as may afford you the fullest information on the subject, and to inquire of and concerning the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever:

And We do by these Presents will and ordain that this Our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you, Our said Commissioners, or any three or more of you, may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment:

And We do further ordain that you, or any three or more of you, have liberty to report your proceedings under this Our Commission from time to time if you shall judge it expedient so to do.

And Our further will and pleasure is that you do, with as little delay as possible, report to Us, under your hands and seals, or under the hands and seals of any three or more of you, your opinion upon the matters herein submitted for your consideration.

Given at Our Court at Saint James's, the Twenty-sixth day of May, One thousand nine hundred and six, in the Sixth Year of Our Reign.

By His Majesty's Command.

H. J. GLADSTONE.

CHAPTER 6

An Act to facilitate the proceedings of the Commissioners appointed to hold an Inquiry respecting the Duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of Drunkenness, Disorder, and Solicitation in the Streets. A.D. 1906

[22nd June, 1906]

WHEREAS a Commission has been issued by His Majesty whereby the Right Honourable Alfred Lyttelton, K.C., Willoughby Hyett Dickinson, Esquire, M.P., Rufus Daniel Isaacs, Esquire, K.C., M.P., David Brynmor Jones, Esquire, K.C., M.P., and Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esquire (herein-after referred to as "the Commissioners"), have been authorised and directed to inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged with power to make recommendations thereon:

And whereas it is desirable to make provision for the more effective conduct by the Commissioners of any inquiry which they may be authorised to make:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

Powers of Commissioners.

1.—(1) The Commissioners shall have all such powers, rights, and privileges as are vested in the High Court, or in any judge thereof, on the occasion of any action, in respect of the following matters:—

(i) The enforcing the attendance of witnesses and examining them on oath, affirmation, or otherwise; and

(ii) The compelling the production of documents; and

(iii) The punishing persons guilty of contempt; and a summons signed by one or more of the Commissioners may be substituted for and shall be equivalent to any formal process capable of being issued in any action for enforcing the attendance of witnesses and compelling the production of documents.

(2) A warrant of committal to prison issued for the purpose of enforcing the powers conferred by this section shall be signed by one or more of the Commissioners, and shall specify the prison to which the offender is to be committed, but shall not authorise the imprisonment of an offender for a period exceeding three months.

(3) Every person who on examination on oath or affirmation before the Commissioners wilfully gives false evidence shall be liable to the penalties for perjury.

(4) Any person may appear before the Commissioners by counsel or solicitor, if authorised to do so by the Commissioners.

Indemnity to witnesses.

2.—(1) A person examined as a witness by the Commissioners shall not be excused from answering any question put to him, or from producing any document, on the ground that the answer thereto or production thereof may criminate or tend to criminate him.

(2) Every person examined as a witness, who, in the opinion of the Commissioners, makes a full and true disclosure touching all the matters in respect of which he is examined, shall be entitled to receive a certificate signed by the Commissioners, stating that the witness has, on his examination, made a full and true disclosure as aforesaid.

A.D. 1906.

(3) If any criminal proceeding is at any time thereafter instituted against any such witness in respect of any matter touching which he has been so examined, the court having cognizance of the case shall, on his application, and on proof of the certificate, stay the proceeding.

(4) Nothing in this section shall apply to the case of proceedings for having given false evidence before the Commissioners, or of having procured, or attempted or conspired to procure, the giving of such evidence.

Short Title.

3. This Act may be cited as the Metropolitan Police (Commission) Act, 1906.

REPORT

ROYAL COMMISSION UPON THE DUTIES OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY—

We, the undersigned Commissioners authorised and directed to inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are performed, with power to make recommendations thereon, have the honour to submit to Your Majesty our Report.

PREFACE.

§ 1. On the 25th May, 1906, a preliminary meeting, at which all the Commissioners were present, was held. The Chairman informed us that he had received papers relating to two cases as to which complaint had been made of the action of certain members of the Metropolitan Police Force in regard to matters coming within the Terms of Reference, though the Secretary of State made no specific suggestion as to the way in which we ought to deal with those cases. The Chairman was of opinion that, seeing we were directed to inquire into the manner in which the members of the force perform their duties, we ought to inquire into the conduct of the officers and constables who were concerned in those cases, but pointed out that further complaints as to the action of the police might be made from other quarters, and that we could hardly refuse to inquire into such of them as referred to cases of the kind mentioned in the Terms of Reference and as were likely to be of assistance to us in reporting upon the general question submitted for report, but that it was obviously expedient not to attempt to investigate cases which were not reasonably recent, since it would be impossible, owing to lapse of time and the difficulty of getting witnesses, to do so with any hope of arriving at sound conclusions. He suggested 1903 as affording a proper limit. With these views the Commissioners concurred, and a general discussion as to matters of procedure, and the question of allowing appearance by counsel or solicitor of parties interested, and as to the times of meeting took place. The Chairman informed us that the Secretary of State was about to present a Bill in the House of Commons to invest us with powers similar to those which had been conferred upon the Royal Commission on War Stores in South Africa, and we all agreed that until that Bill had received the Royal Assent it was not expedient to commence our inquiry.

§ 2. On June 22nd, the Metropolitan Police (Commission) Act, 1906, duly received the Royal Assent.

§ 3. Shortly afterwards the Chairman, the Right Honourable Alfred Lyttelton, K.C., resigned his office on personal grounds, to the great regret of the Commission.

§ 4. Upon the 6th July Sir David Brynmor Jones, K.C., was appointed Chairman in his place.

§ 5. We thereupon held divers meetings at which the Terms of Reference and the general procedure and course of the inquiry were discussed and decided.

§ 6. The first matter to which we directed our attention was the construction of the Terms of Reference. It was obvious from those terms that we had only to inquire into the duties of the police in regard to three classes of street offences—drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation. We came to the conclusion that we need not apprehend any great difficulty as to deciding whether a particular case came within one of those classes, and that it was not necessary at the outset of our inquiry to make any general statement as to the offences which we might treat as coming within the category above mentioned.

It appeared to us that our inquiry resolved itself into two general questions :—

1. What are the duties of the police in dealing with cases coming within the three classes of offence just referred to ? and

2. In what manner are those duties discharged by the police ?

The interpretation of the first question presented no difficulty, but that of the second was not so easy. Construed in the most restrictive sense it might be said to involve simply an inquiry into the method according to which the police discharge their duties. Construed in a more extensive sense it might be deemed to involve an inquiry into the manner in which those duties are discharged—well or ill, properly or improperly, and efficiently or inefficiently.

That the latter was the construction placed on the Terms of Reference by Your Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed certain, since he had laid before us for our consideration papers in relation to two cases in which misconduct was alleged against divers police constables and as to which he himself had caused inquiry to be made.

We, therefore, came to the conclusion that it was our duty not simply to make an inquiry into the form and method according to which the police discharge their duties, but to make an inquiry of a broader kind raising the question whether the officers and constables of the Metropolitan Police Force discharge their duties honestly and efficiently and in such a manner as to deserve the public confidence.

§ 7. Having decided the character of our inquiry we next discussed the method according to which it should be conducted.

Though a considerable number of communications, chiefly anonymous, was received by us at the very outset of our inquiry, in which allegations of misconduct on the part of the police were made, most of them were of a broad and sweeping kind which had no special reference to the matters referred to us. We had when we first met no definite complaint as to police action in regard to particular offences coming within our Terms of Reference except the D'Angely case and the complaint of Dr. Gerothwohl and M. Lavalette.

We decided that our best course would be to commence a public inquiry into the two cases just mentioned, to which attention had been called in Parliament and in the Press, and anticipated that by so doing such publicity would be given to our inquiry as to attract the attention of the persons, if any, who desired to make complaints as to the manner in which the police discharge their duties as to the street offences mentioned in the warrant. We had at that time no means of estimating the number of such complaints that might be made to us, but we were under the impression that they would be few ; we therefore determined that we would consider each complaint as it might be sent in, and then decide whether or not to make it the subject of inquiry, by reference to the circumstances alleged in each case, and the consideration whether its investigation would assist us or not in reporting upon the general question put to us. We believed it likely that the complaints would not be so large in number as to make it impossible for us to deal with all or nearly all of those which came within our Terms of Reference within a reasonable time, and that after we had heard such complaints as might be made to us for a reasonable period we might then announce that we should receive no further complaints, but close the inquiry so far as the evidence of complaints against particular officers or constables was concerned. We decided, therefore, to proceed with as little delay as possible with the investigation of the two cases above mentioned.

§ 8. With regard to the first branch of our inquiry, namely, the duties of the police in dealing with the three classes of cases mentioned above, we thought that we could not do better than to invite Sir Edward Henry, the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police Force, to attend and give evidence of a general character concerning the organisation of the Force under him, the duties of the police in regard to drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets, the statutory provisions creating the offences coming under those denominations, the special powers conferred by statute upon members of the Force for dealing with those offences, the regulations under which the police exercise their powers, and the general arrangement and disposition of the Force at his command. We decided to communicate our decision to Sir Edward Henry, informing him at the same time that when all the evidence in regard to complaints made by the public had been taken he should be recalled and have an opportunity of expressing his opinion upon the evidence or upon the questions which that evidence might suggest, and of answering the accusations that might be made.

§ 9. Our deliberations led us to foresee that the evidence upon which we should have to base our Report would be divisible into two classes (1) General evidence bearing upon our Terms of Reference ; and (2) The evidence given in reference to the particular complaints into which we might inquire. As to the latter, it was of course impossible to form any estimate as to its value, its bulk, or its character.

It was of course apparent to us that the men not directly connected with the Force, who were in the best position to speak as to the duties of ordinary members of the Force and as to the way in which they habitually discharge their duties, were the London Police Magistrates, in whose courts the offences with which we were concerned are decided from day to day. We determined, therefore, to ask Sir Albert de Rutzen, the chief magistrate, to give evidence, and we asked him to be good enough to send us a list of his colleagues who might be ready to come before us for the purpose of giving their views as to the character and conduct of the police. We thought it expedient for the time being to postpone the consideration of the question whether we should take any further general evidence coming from judges and others concerned in the administration of the law until we were better able to form an opinion as to its necessity.

§ 10. We passed on to consider what procedure we should adopt in our inquiry.

As to the general evidence, we, of course, agreed to follow the course ordinarily taken by Royal Commissions appointed to hear and report. In regard to cases like the D'Angely case, or the case of Dr. Gerothwohl and M. Lavalette, in which accusations against particular officers or constables might be made, and in which a conflict of evidence of a character exactly similar to that which arises in Courts of Justice might be expected, the ordinary procedure of a Royal Commission to inquire and report did not appear to us to be entirely well adapted for our purpose. We thought that it was only right that any person coming to accuse a particular officer or constable of misconduct ought to make his complaint to us in writing in a clear and specific form, showing as far as possible the character of the complaint, and setting forth with reasonable certainty the particular acts or omissions which constituted the misconduct alleged. We therefore determined that any person wishing to give evidence before us should communicate with Mr. John Leslie, the Secretary of the Commission, at our office, 31, Great George Street, Westminster, and instructed him if the complaint should be one alleging misconduct against a named constable to obtain a statement containing the necessary particulars.

We did not think it necessary to make a formal code of Rules upon the matter, but we directed that upon a complaint being made to Mr. Leslie he should submit it to us, and, if we decided to hear the complaint, that he should give instructions to the complainant as to the time and place of inquiring into the matter, ask the names of his witnesses, and either leave it to the complainant to serve them with summonses to attend before us, or, if he preferred it, say that we would take steps to serve the summonses ourselves.

We had also to decide the question whether parties interested might be represented by counsel or solicitor. We had received from the Chief Commissioner an application to be allowed to appear before the Commission by counsel, and we had no difficulty in acceding to the request, so far as the appearance of counsel to watch our proceedings was concerned, because we knew that the work of the Chief Commissioner and of his assistants is of so laborious a character as to make it impossible for him or them to attend our sittings continuously.

In regard to the extent to which counsel or solicitor should be permitted to take part in the proceedings, we felt that as we were conducting a general inquiry, and had not to decide questions between litigating parties, we ought as a rule to examine the witnesses ourselves, and should not invite counsel or solicitor to address us. We found that in an analogous inquiry made by the Royal Commission on War Stores in South Africa, which was presided over by Mr. Justice Farwell (now Lord Justice Farwell), which was by statute invested with powers identical with those accorded to us by the Metropolitan Police Act, 1906, counsel and solicitors had been permitted, on application, to examine witnesses in matters as to which a direct conflict of testimony arose between two or more witnesses, and in which it became, therefore, necessary for the Commission to decide which of two or more persons were to be believed. We determined to follow that precedent, and that the Chairman should make an announcement on the subject at the first public sitting of the Commission.

§ 11. One other matter of procedure was the subject of somewhat anxious consideration, and that was whether we should take the evidence in public or in private. The precedents afforded by the action of other Royal Commissions were conflicting. Prima facie our view was that the evidence ought to be taken in public. To take it in private might, we thought, give rise to discontent and suspicion among those interested in our proceedings and diminish the confidence which we hoped the public would feel in the good faith and thoroughness of our inquiry. But to take it in public in every case seemed open to two objections. If we allowed any person to come forward and make allegations of misconduct against particular officers or constables, which, by means of the Press, would be widely spread abroad, and as to which the Commission could not possibly express its opinion immediately, some needless pain might be caused to the officers and constables attacked, and perhaps irritation might arise throughout the whole Force. We felt, too, that some persons having what they deemed to be legitimate grievances against the police, especially persons who wished to complain of police action in regard to cases of solicitation, might be deterred from communicating with us owing to a dread of publicity, and of possibly injurious consequences to their reputation, and that thus the inquiry might wholly miss its mark and fail to bring within its scope the very cases in which it was most important that we should examine the conduct of the police. Upon the whole, we determined that our best course was, as a general rule, to sit in public, and to hear the complainant and his witnesses, on the one hand, and the answer of the officers and constables against whom misconduct might be alleged on the other, in the hope that the common sense of the members of the Force and of the general public would lead them to suspend anything like a final judgment until they should have the opportunity of considering our report upon the matter; but at the same time, thinking that there might be persons very reluctant to come forward, we decided to reserve to ourselves the power of hearing a case in private, under conditions fair to all parties, yet not involving publicity, if the occasion should arise.

§ 12. The result of our deliberations was that we determined to hear the general evidence of Sir Edward Henry, the Chief Commissioner, first of all, and then proceed to hear the witnesses in reference to the complaints of Madame D'Angely and Dr. Gerothwohl and M. Lavalette. We accordingly heard Sir Edward Henry on the 17th July, and on divers days up to the 31st July took the evidence in regard to the two cases just mentioned.

At the first public sitting the Chairman made a public announcement setting forth the course which the Commissioners proposed to take in the following terms:—"The Commission thinks it will be desirable that the following statements as to its method of procedure and conduct of the inquiry should be made. We have decided for the present to sit and take evidence in public. We feel, however, having regard to the nature of the cases into which it may be necessary to inquire, that possibly persons may be reluctant to come forward and give evidence, and accordingly we shall, if, in our opinion, it should become necessary or expedient, take evidence in private. We shall upon application allow any person directly interested in the inquiry to appear by counsel or solicitor, but as we have to conduct an inquiry and not to decide questions between litigating parties, we shall examine the witnesses ourselves. If, however, as the inquiry proceeds, there should arise a direct conflict of testimony between two or more witnesses, and it becomes necessary for us to decide which of two or more persons are to be believed, we will consider any application for leave to examine or cross-examine witnesses by counsel or solicitor on its merits when it arises. It will be observed that the scope of our inquiry is limited to investigating the duties of the police in regard to three classes of cases—namely, cases of drunkenness, cases of disorder, and cases of solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged. We are anxious to have the fullest information concerning these matters, and shall be glad if any person wishing to give evidence before us or to supply us with information will communicate with Mr. John Leslie, the Secretary of the Commission, at 31, Great George Street, Westminster."

On the 31st July we adjourned over the greater part of the Long Vacation to the 16th October, partly with a view to general convenience, and partly because we thought it likely that the publicity given to our proceedings through the Press would be sufficiently great to acquaint persons in the Metropolis who might wish to give evidence before us, or to bring to our notice complaints as to alleged misconduct on the part of particular officers and constables, with our proposed mode of procedure, and give them an opportunity of communicating with us in accordance with the public announcement.

§ 13. When we met on the 16th October we found that our expectations that the public attention called to the existence of the Commission would result in communications from persons interested in the inquiry, or who wished to make complaints against members of the Metropolitan Police Force, were realised. During the interval, and from time to time, until the close of the inquiry, we received many letters, some anonymous, some pseudonymous, and some signed with the real name and address of the correspondent. The Secretary also had interviews with a considerable number of persons who made allegations against the police in general or against named constables. Some of these allegations were afterwards reduced into writing, and formed the subjects of inquiry. We considered all the communications written and verbal that were received, and most of them were found to some extent useful as conveying to us hints as to the topics requiring our attention. For instance, some letters making general complaints alleged that the police were unduly arbitrary in keeping order in the streets and in their method of controlling traffic, and one correspondent suggested that during recent years the whole Force had assumed too military a character. In investigating the cases of misconduct alleged against particular officers and constables we have borne this and other like suggestions in mind. Of the communications containing general allegations of misconduct against the Force as a whole, those which seemed to us to be most relevant to our inquiry were those which suggested that constables were in the habit of receiving bribes from prostitutes and street bookmakers; and we decided so far as possible to ascertain to what, if any, extent such practices, obviously detrimental to the efficiency of police administration, prevailed in the Force. The communications to which we naturally attached the greatest amount of importance were those containing definite allegations of misconduct on comparatively recent occasions against particular officers and constables. Similar communications continued to reach us during the whole of the sittings which we devoted to the investigation of such complaints, and we received a few after we had determined to close the inquiry upon that head.

§ 14. Disregarding letters and post-cards which were so incoherent as not to need any attention the total number of complaints received by us up to the time we closed our Inquiry came to about 300. Of these, 99 contained charges of misconduct of varying degrees of gravity more or less definitely formulated against members of the Force.

We examined and considered these complaints from time to time as they came before us. Those which clearly came within the terms of reference and which were of such a character as to make it probable that their investigation would throw light on the subject matter of the Inquiry, we decided to hear as fully as might be reasonably possible. As to the others we deemed it either unnecessary or inexpedient to inquire into them publicly or to take evidence as to them on oath for all or some of the following reasons :—

1. That the misconduct alleged on the part of the named officers and constables was not committed in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder or solicitation in the streets at all, or only related to them so indirectly that the cases could not be properly considered as coming within the Terms of Reference.

2. That the cases in the course of which the misconduct was alleged to have taken place occurred so long ago that it was not reasonably possible for us to investigate them with any prospect of arriving at a just and true conclusion.

3. That the cases could not be looked upon as typical, or were not of such a character as to make it likely that their detailed investigation would assist us in making our Report.

We may add here (1) that nearly all the cases which were rejected by us were clearly not within the Terms of our Reference; and, (2) it must not be supposed that the fact that in these cases we decided not to hear the witnesses made their presentation entirely useless, since we found them of some service in indicating the points to which we ought to direct our attention in taking the general evidence and in inquiring into the particular cases which we fully heard.

We received one complaint of such a character and made under such circumstances as led us to examine the complainants in private with a view to deciding whether the case was one which we ought to investigate; but the complainants before we had taken further steps attended before us, and stated that they unreservedly withdrew all the charges they had made against the police. We came to the conclusion from their demeanour and their conduct that they were witnesses of so obviously untrustworthy a character that it would be useless to prosecute the inquiry into the case further.

§ 15. We sat as frequently as possible from the 16th October to the close of the year, and devoted the sittings almost entirely to the taking of evidence in regard to cases of complaints against particular officers and constables. We then adjourned until the 28th January, 1907.

Upon resuming our sittings we considered the progress made by us and the general position of the inquiry. We all felt that the inquiry was one that ought not to be prolonged for an indefinite period, and that, seeing that nearly six months had elapsed from the time of our first public sitting, we might well come to the conclusion that a reasonable opportunity had been afforded to members of the public desiring to complain of misconduct on the part of particular members of the Force to lay their complaints before the Commission. It was accordingly decided that the Chairman should make an announcement upon the matter at the sitting of the Commission on the 28th January, and he accordingly did so in the following terms:—"The Commission desire to announce that in their opinion a reasonable opportunity has been afforded to members of the public desiring to complain of misconduct on the part of particular constables to lay their complaints before the Commission. The Commission have received a number of such complaints, they have considered them, and have investigated those of them which related to matters within the Terms of Reference in the Warrant appointing the Commission, and which appeared to them to be typical or likely to assist them in making their Report. They have decided (without however precluding themselves from further inquiry, if it should be deemed necessary) not to investigate any further cases of alleged misconduct against particular constables in dealing with cases of drunkenness and disorder (except the cases of Mr. Riley, Mr. Higgs, and Mr. Gamble or Pearce). They will, of course, finish the part-heard case of Mr. Emms. They will also finish the case of Mr. Platt, and will hear any further complaints of a similar character. The Commission will also proceed to take general evidence."

§ 16. We then proceeded with as much dispatch as possible to hear the evidence in the cases referred to by the Chairman in his announcement on the 28th January.

Some further complaints of misconduct by particular officers and constables were subsequently made to the Commission, but of these we decided to inquire into only two, and we took that course because they were cases dealing with solicitation in the streets, as to which we had then only inquired into the cases of Madame D'Angely and Mrs. Braham. The other cases were rejected either because they did not come within our Terms of Reference or because they were not of such a character as to make it expedient to re-open and continue the inquiry as to misconduct by particular officers or constables.

The total number of cases involving complaints against particular officers or constables which we heard was nineteen, and the names of the complainants and other particulars connected with the cases appear in the Appendix (Table I). In two only of these cases did we take the evidence in private.

§ 17. As to the general evidence it seems only necessary to say here that we examined Sir Albert de Rutzen and eight of his colleagues, namely: Mr. Alfred Chichele Plowden, Mr. Horace Smith, Mr. Ernest Baggallay, Mr. Albert Rowland Cluer, Mr. E. C. Tennyson D'Eyncourt, Mr. H. Curtis Bennett, Mr. George Paul Taylor, and Mr. E. N. Fenwick Fenwick.

In addition to those gentlemen Sir Forrest Fulton, K.C., Recorder of London, Sir R. D. M. Littler, C.B., K.C., the Chairman of the Middlesex Sessions, and the late Colonel Sir E. H. Vincent, K.C.M.G., C.B., A.D.C., M.P., who had had long experience in connection with the administration of the Criminal Law and the police system of the Metropolis, and appeared to us likely to be able to give us relevant information as to the manner in which the Police discharge their duties, attended and gave evidence before us.

We also took the evidence of Sir M. D. Chalmers, K.C.B., C.S.I., Permanent Under Secretary of the Home Office, and Mr. C. E. Troup, C.B., Assistant Secretary, upon various matters relevant to the inquiry.

We also thought it expedient, if possible, having regard to the suggestion of bribery by or blackmailing of prostitutes by constables, to call before us some persons whose police work had brought them into close contact with women of this class, and who had had some opportunities of observing the relations that exist between them and the police. We accordingly examined Mr. W. A. Coote, the Secretary of the National Vigilance Association, and Deputy Chairman of the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, the Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., as well as Staff Captain Harriet Hillyer, of the Salvation Army, and other ladies, who gave us very useful evidence as to the relations of the police with prostitutes, and as to the condition of the streets.

With a view to a comparison of the Metropolitan Police system with that of some of the great provincial cities which we thought might be useful for our purpose, especially so far as any possible recommendations were concerned, we took the evidence of Major G. Golbourne Tarry, Chief Constable of Leeds, and Mr. L. Dunning, Head Constable of Liverpool, as well as that of Mr. J. V. Stevenson, the Chief Constable of Glasgow. The evidence of the last named gentleman disclosed some points of difference between the London system and that of Glasgow which induced us to request the Rt. Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate of Scotland, to attend before us, and he accordingly did so, and gave us valuable evidence. Captain J. W. Nott Bower, the Chief Commissioner of Police for the City of London, also gave us some useful information.

We considered the question whether it would be expedient to take evidence as to the system of police administration in regard to street offences in foreign capitals, and came to the conclusion that no useful purpose would be served by taking that course; but we desire to say we were much indebted to the late Colonel Sir C. E. Howard Vincent for a memorandum which he was good enough to send to us on the methods adopted in Paris.

We finally called Sir Edward Henry so as to afford him an opportunity of making any such answer as he deemed expedient to the charges, whether general or specific, made against the members of the Police, and to give us an opportunity of obtaining further information upon matters which suggested themselves to us.

§ 18. Neither the London County Council nor the Council of any Metropolitan Borough made any representations on the matters referred to us. The only public societies which approached us were the National Vigilance Association, the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, and the Police and Public Vigilance Society. We desire to thank those societies for the assistance they have given in our inquiry.

§ 19. We held altogether sixty-four sittings for the taking of evidence, during which we examined 292 witnesses, and closed the inquiry, so far as the taking of oral evidence was concerned, on the 1st August, 1907.

§ 20. Owing to the character of the Inquiry the necessary arrangements for and the proceedings at our sittings came to resemble those of a Court of Justice rather than those of an ordinary Royal Commission. This imposed on our staff an unusual burden which was, however, lightened by the assistance which we received from the authorities at New Scotland Yard and from Mr. Timewell, the Secretary of the Police and Public Vigilance Society who obtained the addresses of a considerable number of witnesses, served them with the summonses, and arranged for their attendance. We desire to thank Sir Edward Henry and his subordinate officers, as well as Messrs. Wontner & Son, the Solicitors to the Police, for arranging for the attendance of the police witnesses and for placing at our disposal all books and documents for which we asked. We also wish to express our appreciation of the courtesy shown to us by Sir R. Littler, the Chairman, and the Justices of the Middlesex Sessions, in placing in response to our personal request their court at the Westminster Guildhall at our disposal for our public sittings.

We desire to thank Mr. John Leslie for the services he ably rendered to the Commission until its public sittings ended. We desire to express our great obligations to Mr. J. Felix Waley, who first as Assistant Secretary, and after the resignation of Mr. Leslie as Secretary, discharged the duties of his office with great zeal and capacity, and who especially deserves our gratitude for the efficient help he has given us in the preparation of a Report which as to that part of it which deals with complaints against particular members of the Force presented special difficulties.

From a strictly logical standpoint our decisions on the complaints made against particular officers and constables into which we fully inquired should find a place in that part of our Report which deals with the manner in which the police discharge their duties, but for reasons of practical convenience we divide our Report into a General Report and Reports on Particular Cases.

We divide our General Report into an Introduction and three principal parts, as follows:—

Introduction.

Part I.—Duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets.

Part II.—The manner in which the Metropolitan Police perform their duties as to cases of drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets.

Part III.—Conclusions and Recommendations.

I.

GENERAL REPORT.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. It seems necessary for the purpose of our Report, and for the comprehension of the evidence and other materials on which it is based, to give a brief account of the origin and history of the Metropolitan Force and some general information as to its organisation and its present strength.

Before 1829 no sufficient and reasonably effective police system existed in the Metropolis. The local government of the populous urban towns which had in the course of centuries of continuous national life come into being around and closely adjoining the ancient City of London was still left in the main to the county and parochial authorities invested with the powers conferred by the common law, but increased and modified to some extent both by general and local Acts of Parliament. The system had broken down under the strain imposed upon it by the growth of population and the modern conditions of urban life. The arrangements for the prevention and detection of crime, the maintenance of public order, and the administration of the criminal law were wholly inadequate to meet the needs of the time. According to the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Police of the Metropolis appointed in 1828 the provision for the policing of the Metropolis was then as follows :—

Report by Select Committee on the Police of the Metropolis 1828, vi. (i)

The City of London had a separate system of Police and Watch by night under the control of municipal authorities.

In the City of Westminster there was an establishment of 80 constables annually chosen at a Court of Burgesses from persons carrying on trade, who were permitted under certain regulations to perform the office of deputy; but the active exertions of these constables had been, with reference to the detection and punishment of offences, superseded by the stipendiary police.

This stipendiary police consisted of seven officers of police, each acting independently and presiding over a defined district with a fixed number of constables attached to each for the assistance of the magistrates in the discharge of their ordinary duties.

The Thames Police Office with an establishment of about 90 officers for the protection of property and the maintenance of order on the river.

The Bow Street Office which, under the directions of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, had the immediate superintendence of the effective force applicable to the general purposes of police in the whole of the Metropolis and its neighbourhood, with the exception of the City of London. This force was divided into three classes :—The Horse Patrol, patrolling the great roads within about 20 miles of the Metropolis; the Dismounted Patrol, stationed in its environs; and the Foot Patrol, charged with the duty of patrolling the streets by night and by day.

In addition to these establishments there was the system of the Nightly Watch, which with scarcely an exception was a parochial establishment and which the Committee reported to be as a whole defective.

The Report of this Committee (which was the last of a series of such Committees which had during the previous half century dealt with the subject of the policing of the Metropolis) dwelt on the increase in the number of offences against property during the then recent years, and emphatically pointed out the inadequacy of the local establishments of nightly watch and nightly police for the prevention and detection of crime by reason of the frequent unfitness of the individuals employed, the insufficiency of their number, the limited sphere of their authority, and their want of connection and co-operation with each other, and recommended the establishment of a new police force in lieu of the nightly watch. The result was the introduction and passing of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829.

By the Preamble of the Act above mentioned it was declared that it was expedient to substitute a new and more efficient system of police in lieu of such establishments of nightly watch and nightly police within the limits thereinafter mentioned, and to constitute an office of police which, acting under the immediate authority of one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, should direct and control the whole of such new system of police within those limits.

The Force was duly established, and commenced its work in the year 1829. It should be observed that the new Act did not abolish the Bow Street and other police offices then existing.

In 1839 it was found expedient to amend and supplement the Act of 1829; and accordingly the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, was passed in that year. By the latter Act Her Majesty by an Order in Council was empowered to extend the Metropolitan Police District to any place not being in the City of London within the Central Criminal Court District, and to any part of any parish or place not more than fifteen miles distant in a straight line from Charing Cross.

The Metropolitan Police District and its Divisions.

§ 2. The Metropolitan Police District, as constituted by the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, and by an Order in Council dated 3rd January, 1840, made under that Act, and the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, comprises the following places:—

(1) The County of London exclusive of the City of London and its Liberties.

(2) The County of Middlesex.

(3) In the County of Surrey the following parishes and places:—Addington, Banstead, Barnes, Beddington, Carshalton, Cheam, Chessington, Coombe, Coulsdon, Cuddington, Epsom, Ewell (exclusive of Kingswood Liberty), Farley, Hamlet of Ham with Hatch, Hamlet of Hook, Kew, Kingston-on-Thames, Long Ditton, Malden (Old and New), Merton, Mitcham, Morden, Mortlake, Molesey (East and West), North Sheen, Petersham, Richmond, Sanderstead, Surbiton, Sutton, Thames Ditton (comprising the Hamlets of Claygate, Ember and Weston), Tolworth, Hamlets of Wallington, Warlingham, Wimbledon, and Woodmansterne.

(4) The County Borough of Croydon.

(5) In the County of Herts the following parishes and places:—Aldenham (and Hamlet of Theobald Street), Arkley, East Barnet, Barnet Vale, Bushy (Urban and Rural), Cheshunt, Chipping Barnet, Elstree, Hadley, Monken Hadley, Northaw, Ridge, Shenley, South Mimms (Urban), and Totteridge.

(6) In the County of Essex the following parishes and places:— Barking, Buckhurst Hill, Cann Hill, Chigwell, Chingford, Dagenham, East Ham (including Little Ilford), Great Ilford, Loughton, Low Leyton, Waltham Abbey and Town (including the Hamlets of Holyfield, Sewardston, and Upshire), Walthamstow, Wanstead, and Woodford.

(7) The County Borough of West Ham.

(8) In the County of Kent the following parishes and places:— Beckenham, Bexley, Bromley, Chislehurst, Crayford, Down, Erith, Farnborough, Foot's Cray, Hayes, Keston, Hamlet of Mottingham, North Cray, Orrington, Hamlet of Penge, St. Mary's Cray, St. Paul's Cray, and Wickham (East and West).

The Metropolitan Police District as thus established extends over a radius of fifteen miles from Charing Cross, exclusive of the City of London and the liberties thereof, and embraces an area of 699·42 square miles extending from Colney Heath, Hertfordshire, on the north, to Mogadore, Todworth Heath, in the south, and from Lark Hall, Essex, in the east, to Staines Moor, Middlesex, in the west.

The Metropolitan police constables act as such on that part of the River Thames within the Police Districts.

By virtue of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1860, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis may employ such number of constables of the Metropolitan Police Force as the Secretary of State may direct to be employed in his Majesty's Dockyards, not only within the Metropolitan Police District, but also in such yards or at the principal stations of the War Department and in their neighbourhood which are situate beyond the limits of such district.

The whole Metropolitan Police District is divided into twenty-two portions called divisions; twenty-one are distinguished by a letter of the alphabet, which the sergeants and constables attached to a division wear with a number on their collars and helmets to enable the public to identify them and the locality of the district to which they belong. The Dockyard divisions are not included in this arrangement.

Each division is under the charge of a superintendent, and its strength of chief and other inspectors, sergeants and constables, varies according to the extent of the division and other circumstances.

A division is divided into sub-divisions, each of which is under the supervision of inspectors, the numbers varying according to local circumstances.

Sub-divisions are divided into sections under the charge of inspectors, sergeants, or acting sergeants, and sections are divided into beats which are patrolled by constables who are responsible for the protection of life and property during the time they are on duty.

Every street and road is measured, and divisions, sub-divisions, sections and beats are clearly defined in the beat books, and there is no difficulty in ascertaining the number and name of a constable on duty in any street or place at any particular time.

In every division there is at least one police station, and in some two or more.

The officers on duty at each station are appointed by the Chief Commissioner on the recommendation of the superintendent and chief constable.

Quarters are provided at police stations and in section houses for a large proportion of single men belonging to the Force.

The name and alphabetical letter of each of the divisions of the Metropolitan Police District will be found in the Table on page 14 of this Report.

The population of the Metropolitan Police District in 1905 was 7,086,638.

Organisation of the Metropolitan Police Force.

§ 3. For the purpose of understanding the evidence with which we have to deal in this report it is necessary to know the salient features as to the organisation and the disposition of the members of the Force; and we accordingly think it advisable to give some information relative to the general government of the Force, and the qualification, rank, and particular service of the several members which constitute the whole establishment.

At the head of the organisation is the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis appointed under statutory provision by Warrant under your Majesty's sign manual. Acting under the authority of the Secretary of State he directs and controls the whole system of Police within the Metropolitan Police District. The Commissioner is a Justice of the Peace for the Counties of London, Middlesex, Surrey, Hertford, Essex, Kent, Berkshire, and Buckinghamshire.

The Commissioner has the power to frame subject to the approbation of the Secretary of State, such orders and regulations as he deems expedient relative to the general government of the members of the Metropolitan Police Force; the places of their residence; the classification, rank, and particular service of the several members; and all such other orders and regulations relative to the Police Force as he from time to time deems expedient for preventing neglect or abuse, and for rendering the Force efficient in the discharge of all its duties.

The Commissioner has also power at any time to suspend or dismiss from his employment any man belonging to the Police Force whom he thinks remiss or negligent in discharge of his duty, or otherwise unfit for the service.

Next in order to the Commissioner there are three Assistant Commissioners, also appointed by Warrant under your Majesty's sign manual, who are justices of the Peace for the same Counties as the Commissioner.

In the absence of the Commissioner one of the Assistant Commissioners may be authorised under the hand and seal of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to do all such acts as it would be competent for the Commissioner to do.

The Assistant Commissioners superintend the discipline of the whole Force and make occasional visits to the several divisions, inspect the clothing, appointments, and horses of each division, visit the stations and section houses, and report to the Commissioner on all matters calling for observation.

Next in order there are four Chief Constables who are appointed by the Secretary of State.

The whole Metropolitan Police District is divided into three districts, and each of these three districts is allotted to a Chief Constable. The fourth Chief Constable is attached to the Criminal Investigation Department.

The Chief Constables supervise generally all matters connected with the organisation and discipline of the Police within their respective districts, and are responsible that all infringements of the Regulations laid down for the guidance of Police that may come to their notice are reported to the Commissioner.

Certain disciplinary powers are vested in the Chief Constables, but every man punished by a Chief Constable has a right of appeal against the decision to the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner, and any case in which the matter is so serious, or his general character and conduct are so unsatisfactory, as to call, in the opinion of the Chief Constable, for the resignation or dismissal of a man is referred with the whole of the witnesses and papers to the decision of the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioners.

The following are the grades of officers of the force below the rank of Chief Constable :—

(1) Superintendents.

There is a Superintendent for each division.

The Superintendent of a division is responsible for its discipline, and for securing strict compliance with the Commissioner's orders and regulations.

He is to make himself well acquainted with the inspectors and sergeants, and through them with the character of every constable in the division under his orders ; he will be firm and just, at the same time kind and conciliatory in his behaviour towards them on all occasions.

He is to give clear and precise instructions to the officers under him, and any neglect on their part is to be reported.

He is to take care that no cause of complaint be given to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood by noise or any irregularity at the stations or section houses.

If a complaint be made to him against any member of his division he should report the circumstances to the Chief Constable, and may at once, if the offence be of a serious nature, suspend the officer or take such other precaution as may appear necessary.

He may settle such complaints against any constable of his division as allowed by the Commissioner, and inflict a fine to the amount of two days' pay, with the addition of deprivation of fortnightly leave for not more than one month. He may, in the exercise of his discretion, award punishment for the first offence of drunkenness on or off duty, or for drinking on duty contrary to the Regulations, by reduction in rate of pay according to a scale fixed by the Commissioner from time to time, with the addition of the deprivation of fortnightly leave for not more than one month, if he thinks fit. The facts of each case, with the decision of the Superintendent thereon, are to be stated on the Morning Report, and any special reports attached and laid before the Chief Constable and the Commissioner.

Any constable not satisfied with the Superintendent's decision may have the case brought before the Chief Constable or the Commissioner.

(2) Chief Inspectors.

These officers have sub-charge of clothing, stores, equipment, unclaimed property, etc., and will be available to assist the Superintendent in the supervision of the Division by patrolling and making such inquiries as the Superintendent may from time to time direct.

(3) Sub-divisional Inspectors.

At all Sub-divisional Stations one Inspector will be selected to have entire general charge under the Superintendent of all arrangements pertaining to the Sub-division, but a Sub-divisional Inspector may have more than one Station under his supervision.

(4) Reserve Inspectors.

Reserve Inspectors, in addition to doing ordinary Station duty are to accompany reserves on special duties.

(5) Inspectors.

Inspectors are appointed to duty at all Stations of the interior Divisions and at the principal Stations of the exterior ones, and such others as may be approved by the Commissioner.

There are a limited number of Sub-Inspectors who also perform Station duty but are subordinate to the Inspectors. This rank, however, will not be permanently retained, any vacancies occurring being filled by Station Sergeants.

(6) Sergeants and Acting Sergeants.

A sergeant is held responsible for the general good conduct and good order of the constables under his charge, and he is expected to know the character of each. It is not necessary to detail his duties; but his chief duty is to parade the men placed under him at the station fifteen minutes before the hour at which they go on duty for the different reliefs, and to march with them to his section and see that each patrols his proper beat.

(7) Ordinary Constables.

Though every member of the force is a constable, the term is ordinarily applied only to those who form the lowest grade in the service. The principal duties thrown on officers of higher grades are duties of superintendence and discipline. The duties cast upon those members of the force who are merely constables are those direct and primary duties by the due performance of which the objects for which the force is established are attained. They are of a multifarious kind, and are described so far as regards the three classes of offences with which we are concerned in Part I.

There is a distinction drawn between ordinary Constables and Reserve Constables which is of no concern so far as our inquiry is concerned, but which it is well to mention as the term "Reserve" occurs in the evidence. The Foot Reserve of each Division consists of one Inspector, Constables in the proportion of ten per cent. on the authorised strength of that rank, and Sergeants in proportion of ten per cent. of the number of Constables.

Special duties, such as at processions, drawing rooms, public meetings, etc., where numbers of Police are required, are performed by the Reserve, but when not so employed the Reserve perform ordinary duty in supplying the places of Divisional police who are sick or absent from other causes.

The Mounted Reserves consist of about 10 per cent. of the Mounted Police Force in addition to one Police Sergeant and ten Police Constables of A Division.

The men for the Reserve are selected for ability, smartness, and good conduct Criminal Investigation Department.

§ 4. It should be mentioned here that the force also includes an establishment for the investigation of crime (commonly called the Criminal Investigation Department), which forms one body under an Assistant Commissioner, and consists of a Chief Constable, Superintendent, Chief, 1st and 2nd class and Local Inspectors, 1st, 2nd and 3rd class Sergeants, and Patrol Constables. With the duties of this branch of the organisation (which are largely of a detective character) we have no direct concern

Candidates for Appointments.

§ 6. The applications of candidates for admission to the Metropolitan Police Force are considered by the Commissioner, and vacancies are filled by appointment by the Commissioner from time to time.

Such candidates enter the Force upon Conditions of Service laid down in regulations made by the Chief Commissioner.

Candidates are examined as to their physical fitness for the post of Constable, and also have to undergo an educational test in the following subjects :—

(1.) Reading and Dictation :—

From Royal Reader, No. 3, or book of similar standard.

(2.) Arithmetic :—

Numeration to 100,000, and the four simple rules, viz :—Addition, Subtraction, Multiplication and Division.

Conditions of Service.

§ 7. Upon joining the Force successful candidates are put into a preparatory class, and for a certain time are employed only on Station duty and in attending Police Courts during the hearing of charges and summonses with a view to learning their duties.

They are also instructed by an officer appointed by the Superintendent for one hour daily as to the Regulations of the Service.

Men, for the first six months after joining, are to be assembled at least for one hour once in fourteen days, and carefully questioned by the Inspectors as to their knowledge of the contents of the Police Instruction Book. They are also, of course, practised in drill.

The conditions of service to which we need call attention are these :—

(1) Each constable is to devote his whole time to the Police Service. He is not to carry on any trade, nor can his wife be allowed to keep a shop.

(2) He is to serve and reside wherever he is appointed.

(3) He is to appear in his police dress at all times when on duty, but he may wear plain clothes when off duty unless directed to the contrary.

(4) He is promptly to obey all orders from the persons in authority over him

(5) He is to obey all the Regulations of the Service.

(6) Such debts owing by him as the Commissioner directs to be paid, shall be paid by him forthwith.

(7) A reduction will be made from his pay according to Regulations, for each day when he is certified by the Surgeon sick and unfit for duty except in certain cases when full pay is allowed by the Commissioner.

(8) He shall not resign nor withdraw himself from the duties unless allowed to do so in writing by the Superintendent of the Division or by the Commissioner ; or unless he shall have given to his Superintendent one month's previous notice in writing. If he resign or withdraw without such leave or notice he is liable to forfeit all pay due and to be charged before a Magistrate.

(9) Each Police Constable is liable to immediate dismissal for unfitness, negligence or misconduct, independently of any other punishment to which by law he may be subject. The Commissioner may also remove him from the Service by dismissal or otherwise without assigning any reason. If he be dismissed the Police Force the whole of his pay then due is forfeited.

(10) A Constable dismissed from the Police Force, or who resigns his situation, shall immediately after the dismissal or resignation deliver up every article of dress and appointments which have been supplied to him. If any such articles or appointments have in the opinion of the Commissioner been improperly used or damaged, a deduction from the pay then due to the party shall be made sufficient to make good the damage or supply a new article.

(11) A certificate of good conduct if deserved in the Police Force will be given by the Commissioner subject to the Regulations of the Service.

(12) Every Police Constable in the Force may hope to rise by activity, intelligence, and good conduct to the superior stations.

(13) His pay on being appointed Constable is 24s. a week, rising by annual increments of 1s. per week to a maximum of 32s. a week. Clothing will be supplied to him, and also coals or a money allowance in lieu of coals, in accordance with the Regulations.

(14) The Constable's pay is subject to a deduction on account of Superannuation limited by the Police Act to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and at present fixed at 2 per cent. The pensions and gratuties awarded to Constables and to their widows and children are regulated by the Police Act, 1890.

Promotion.

§ 8. In view of certain suggestions which were made to us in the communications referred to above, it is necessary to understand the system of promotion in the Force.

The Commissioner and the three Assistant Commissioners are, as we have seen, appointed by the Crown, and the four Chief Constables are appointed by the Secretary of State.

The following are the Rules as to promotion to which it seems necessary to call attention :—

(1) All promotions in the Service up to the rank of Superintendent are made from the next rank below.

(2) When vacancies in the higher ranks occur, and directions are given for Police Officers to be recommended to the Commissioner for promotion, those best qualified in all respects are to be selected, seniority of service being duly considered as a qualification or otherwise.

(3) A candidate for promotion must be prepared to serve in any Division to which he may be transferred when his turn for promotion is reached.

(4) Inspectors, Station Sergeants, Sergeants, and Constables who are recommended for promotion by Superintendents and Chief Constables will appear before a Board of Examiners formed for the purpose of determining and reporting upon the merits of candidates for promotion in rank or appointment to higher grades.

(5) Police who are selected for promotion are to undergo an educational examination, conducted by the Civil Service Commissioners, to ascertain whether they are qualified to discharge efficiently the duties which would devolve upon them.

(6) The Superintendents will satisfy themselves, before recommending a man for promotion, that there is a reasonable probability that he will pass the authorised examination.

(7) The examination of Police candidates for promotion to the ranks of Sergeant, Inspector, and Superintendent will be undertaken by the Civil Service Commission.

(9) When Police have been examined, and have failed to pass, the Examiner's report is to be forwarded (confidentially) to the Superintendent of the Division, for a copy to be taken by the unsuccessful candidate to enable him to improve himself in those subjects in which he was deficient, so that he may be enabled to pass a future examination should he be called upon. The report is to be marked "Copy taken," and signed by the candidate, and then returned to the Superintendent of the Executive Branch.

(10) Police Officers recommended for promotion are to be examined by the Chief Surgeon, and a report made as to their general soundness of health.

The medical record in the Divisional Sick Book is to be submitted to the Chief Surgeon for his information at these examinations.

(11) All officers of the rank of Sergeant and upwards must be proficient in drill and able to drill a company. A certificate to this effect is to be submitted when an officer is recommended for promotion.

(12) As soon as Constables, who are recommended for promotion to Sergeants, have passed the required educational examination, facilities are to be afforded them in their respective Divisions for acquiring a knowledge of telegraphy.

(13) The Commissioner has also laid down the following Regulation as to promotion :—

"Some of the Police have attempted to obtain promotion by means of applications made by private friends; such practices being injurious to the good order and discipline of the Service, the Police are to understand that their prospects of promotion must depend on the report which their superior officers may make as to their qualifications and conduct in the performance of their duties. Merit, and not favour, is the ground of advancement, and any of the Police who attempt to bring interest to bear for the purpose of influencing the Commissioner to recommend them to the Secretary of State, or who apply to the Secretary of State for promotion, will be considered as disqualified for the promotion thus sought."

Metropolitan Police Courts.

§ 9. The Police Offices existing at the time of the establishment of the Metropolitan Police Force were not done away with by the Act of 1829. They were not simply Police Offices in the ordinary sense of the term, since they were controlled by paid magistrates who attended to them and exercised there the jurisdiction of justices of the peace and the powers given to them by statute. The creation of the Metropolitan Police Force and other circumstances rendered an amendment of the system expedient, and this was effected by the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, under which and subsequent statutes to which it is not necessary to refer specifically, the existing Police Courts are now regulated.

For judicial purposes the Metropolitan Police area is divided into divisions, in each of which there is a Police Court.

[6.21] It may facilitate the following of the evidence as to complaints against particular officers and constables if we give a list of the existing Metropolitan Police Courts, which is as follows :—

Bow Street, W.C.
Westminster (Vincent Square, S.W.).
Marlborough Street (Great Marlborough Street, W.).
Clerkenwell (King's Cross Road, W.C.).
Old Street, E.C.
Lambeth (Lower Kennington Lane, S.E.).
Marylebone (Seymour Place, W.).
Tower Bridge, S.E.
Thames (Arbour Square, Stepney, E.).
West London (Vernon Street, Hammersmith Road, W.).
South Western (Lavender Hill, S.W.).
North London (Stoke Newington Road, N.).
Greenwich and Woolwich.

Preceding Inquiries as to the Police System and its Administration.

§ 10. We have thought it worth while to refer to such public inquiries into matters connected with the Metropolitan Police as have taken place since its establishment by virtue of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829.

We find that until the creation of this Commission it has not been found necessary to appoint any Royal Commission to inquire and report upon any matters connected with the Metropolitan Police except one appointed in 1855 to inquire into the alleged disturbance of the public peace in Hyde Park; but on several occasions the House of Commons has appointed Select Committees to consider complaints relating to the administration and efficiency of the Police system, or as to the conduct of the Police.

A brief summary of such parts of the Reports of these Committees as have any bearing upon the matters referred to us may be useful and interesting.

On the 22nd April, 1833, a Select Committee was appointed "To inquire into the state of the Police of the Metropolis within the Metropolitan district and the state of crime therein."

The Committee of that Session commenced their labours and had made considerable progress when, to use their own words, "They found their course impeded not only by the delay which the preparation of returns and accumulation of evidence occasioned but by the unexampled pressure of business before the House necessarily occasioning the appointment of an unusual number of Committees and requiring so much of the attendance of members as to preclude the possibility of their persevering with dispatch in the prosecution of this very extensive and important investigation. The hindrance, however, which has presented the most formidable obstruction has been the appointment of two other Committees: the one on the 1st July, 'To inquire into the matter of a petition of several persons complaining that policemen are employed as spies, and praying that the people may not be taxed to maintain those spies'; and the other on the 11th July, 'To inquire into the conduct of the Metropolitan Police on the 13th May last in dispersing a public meeting in Coldbath Fields.'"

The Committee arrived at the conclusion that they ought to await the Reports of the two last-named Select Committees before finally concluding their inquiry; but towards the end of the Session they considered themselves "called upon to close their proceedings for the present Session"; and on the 16th August the Committee made a Report suggesting that they should be permitted to resume their labours in the following Session, and that, though they had not brought their labours to a close, it might perhaps be expected that they should express some opinion as to the conduct and utility of the Metropolitan Police as far as the evidence adduced before them had enabled them to form any opinion.

Subject to the further information which might be elicited by the inquiries of the other Committees above alluded to, the Committee did not hesitate to state that it was their opinion that the evidence adduced before them had led them to think that the greatest economy was observed in every department of the Metropolitan Police; that very great and increasing care was taken in the selection of the individuals employed; and that, on the whole, the conduct of the men had been very creditable to them.

The Committee could speak with unqualified praise of the manner in which the Commissioners discharged the arduous duties incident to their office; who, in every arrangement proceeding from them, evinced a desire to render the police as effective in detecting as in repressing crime, and occasioning as little inconvenience as possible to the honest and well-conducted portion of the community.

On the 1st July, in the same Session, a Select Committee was appointed "To inquire into the matter of the petition of several persons complaining that policemen are employed as spies; and praying that the people may not be taxed to maintain those spies," and that Committee duly reported on the 6th August.

On the 11th July, 1833, a Select Committee was appointed "To inquire into the Conduct of the Metropolitan Police on the 13th of May last in dispersing a Public Meeting in Cold Bath Fields," and that Committee duly reported on the 23rd August then next following.

The conduct of the Police in regard to the dispersing of the Public Meeting held in Cold Bath Fields on the 13th May, 1833, has now, of course, simply historical interest, but it may be noted that the Report, upon the whole, gives a favourable report of the conduct and efficiency of the Police Force at that time.

The Committee reported "That the Conduct of the Bodies of Police employed in the actual dispersion of the Meeting was not attended with greater violence than was occasioned by the resistance they met with from a portion of the Meeting in the execution of their orders.

"That after the dispersion of the Meeting, some of the Police employed in clearing the surrounding ground were suffered to follow persons to a greater distance than was necessary, and that, under these circumstances, they were not subjected to that efficient control which in a moment of excitement and irritation, and after much provocation, could alone prevent individual instances of undue exercise of power.

"That none of the Police were in any degree intoxicated, and that no dangerous wound or permanent injury has been shown to have been inflicted by them upon any individual, while on the other hand, one of their own number was killed with a dagger, and two others stabbed while in the discharge of their duty

"That while it is the opinion of this Committee that the conduct of the Police as a body, on the occasion in question, affords no just ground of complaint, they feel it a duty to advert to the importance of the utmost caution and vigilance on the part of the Superintendents, and other officers of the Police, to check any approach to unnecessary violence among their men on all occasions, but more especially where large bodies of them are employed in the prevention or suppression of disturbance and the maintenance of the Public Peace."

Select Committee of 1834.

§ 11. The Select Committee appointed in the Session of 1833 "To inquire into the state of the Police of the Metropolis within the Metropolitan District and the state of crime therein," was re-appointed on the 10th March, 1834, and made their final Report on the 13th August in that year.

In that Report they say that finding it (the Order of the House for their appointment) so much coincided with that in 1828 they considered the object sought to be attained in their appointment to have reference to "the change in the System of Police" recommended by that Committee.

From the Report of this Select Committee we think it well to quote a few extracts.

The Report commences with a brief account of the condition of the Metropolis before the establishment of the Metropolitan Police.

In regard to the "Management and Conduct of the Metropolitan Police" they say: "It was not to be expected that a new system of Police, however perfect, could be introduced without encountering many and strong objections from very obvious causes. The Committee of 1828 were aware that in effecting this change there might be serious difficulties to encounter, the difficulties of changing ancient usages, of simplifying a complicated system, of arranging a troublesome detail, of transferring to one department a sort of patronage and power which was then exercised by many. And perhaps it is a matter of surprise that so great a change should have been accomplished without greater opposition than has been experienced.

"Much, in the opinion of your Committee, is due to the judgment and discrimination which was exercised in the selection of the individuals, Colonel Rowan and Mr. Mayne, who were originally appointed, and still continue, to fill the arduous offices of Commissioners of Police. On many critical occasions, and in very difficult circumstances, the sound discretion they have exercised, the straightforward, open and honourable course they have pursued whenever their conduct has been questioned by the public, calls for the strongest expression of approbation on the part of your Committee. A reference to the evidence of this and the Committees of last year will satisfactorily confirm this opinion, and it will also show the searching and minute investigation which every part of their conduct and of the Establishment has undergone.

"Your Committee is of opinion that a strict economy pervades every department of the Establishment of Police and that this economy is carried to the utmost extent compatible with the Service.

"The duties of the constables have been clearly defined in a book of instructions prepared for their use by the Commissioners. The men are desired to make themselves acquainted with its contents in order to become qualified to fulfil without exceeding their duty.

"It appears that great care is exercised by the Commissioners in the selection of constables and that a vigilant control is maintained over them ; that on many occasions they have received testimonies of approbation from Magistrates, Grand Juries and others, and that private individuals have, since the Metropolitan Police came into operation, contributed for their services, on different occasions, in donations to the men, with the consent of the Commissioners, a sum which, up to the period of the examination of the Commissioners in 1833, was stated to have amounted to £2,000.

"The whole system of the Metropolitan Police is one which must greatly enhance the difficulty of a successful course of crime or plunder. It appears indeed that the more violent offences have already decreased, while the detection of the lighter offences has increased, which is precisely what was to be expected from a good system of preventive police.

"The complaints and objections which have been brought under the notice of your Committee by the various witnesses who have been examined, and which will be enumerated, are capable of being classed under two heads ; those remediable by the Police Commissioners, and those remediable only by an alteration of the law. The complaints brought against the Police, for which the Commissioners may be considered fairly responsible, are such as relate to the conduct of the men ; the withdrawing of constables from one parish or district to send them to another, where tumult or disturbance is apprehended ; and the discharging of persons out of custody from the Station House without the sanction of a Magistrate. These complaints will be considered in the order in which they are mentioned.

"With reference to the conduct of the men, the Committee are of opinion that every precaution is taken by the Commissioners in the choice of men, and in their conduct afterwards, and it appears from the evidence that there is a disposition on the part of the Commissioners to remedy every inconvenience arising from this cause of which the public has had any just reason to complain.

"There may have been abuses of authority by individual members of the Police ; but it appears to your Committee that when they have occurred they have been promptly punished, and that they have been less in number and of a less aggravated character than could have been expected in a body so numerous, or than did practically exist under the former system of parochial watch.

"It appears to your Committee that the complaints made of the extraordinary power exercised by the Inspectors of Police at the Station Houses have not been well founded. Much misunderstanding appears to exist upon this subject, as a reference to the evidence will show ; but according to the Commissioners who were particularly examined on this point, no charge once entered on the Charge Sheet, and signed by the party making it, has ever been disposed of otherwise than under the direction and sanction of a Magistrate. Drunken cases appear to have formed an exception ; but your Committee is of opinion, in concurrence with many experienced magistrates, that it is safer that all persons once received into custody at the Station Houses should only be discharged by the order of a magistrate, a system which has been of late strictly adhered to.

"Two other objections, under the second class of complaints, have occasionally been made altogether different from the generality of those urged against the Metropolitan Police, founded on a deficiency of power and disinclination to interfere. Your Committee refer to the system of non-interference in cases of disturbances and disorderly conduct in public-houses not involving the commission of any criminal offence, and in cases of common assault where the act has not been witnessed by the constable, or the party assaulted does not bear visible marks of the aggression. The only observation which the Committee feel it necessary to make in reference to these objections is that it does not appear to have been contemplated by the statute, establishing the Metropolitan Police, to give the constables of that Force more power than was possessed by any other constables, and they do not see at present sufficient reason for recommending a change in this respect.

"Your Committee having thus reviewed the complaints which to them appeared deserving of notice, and considering also that the witnesses examined in every instance appeared rather desirous to improve than to oppose an efficient system of Police, and that the prevailing character of the evidence is that of approbation of the new system, conclude this head of their Report by expressing it as their opinion, and one amply supported by the evidence, that the conduct and management of the Metropolitan Police has given general satisfaction.

"Many persons have assumed, and that assumption has been countenanced by the Report of the Committee of 1822, that a good Police could only be attained at the expense of the liberty of the subject, and that it necessarily involved some arbitrary principle opposed to the free constitution of this country. In the words of the Report it was 'difficult to reconcile an effective system of Police with that perfect freedom of action and exemption from interference which are the great privileges and blessings of society in this country.' A full consideration of the evidence now presented to the House will dispel this apprehension; and, looking at the Establishment as a whole, it appears to your Committee that the Metropolitan Police has imposed no restraint, either upon public bodies or individuals, which is not entirely consistent with the fullest practical exercise of every civil privilege and with the most unrestrained intercourse of private society."

In reference to the reports of the two other Select Committees appointed in 1833, and referred to above, the Report says: "Your Committee have perused the evidence and reports of these Committees, which latter are printed in the appendix; and upon a mature and anxious consideration of both they deem it their duty to express their entire concurrence in the opinions of the Reports of the Committees alluded to; and also to add that the Metropolitan Police Force, its management, and the principles upon which it is conducted, deserve the confidence and support of the House. That it is well calculated to check crime, and to maintain the peace and order of the Metropolis, both effectively and constitutionally. And there is satisfactory evidence of this in the fact that on no occasion since the establishment of the Metropolitan Police has the Military authority been called upon to assist the Civil.

"Your Committee, keeping in view the whole evidence now placed before the House, conclude with this expression of their opinion, viz., that the Metropolitan Police Force, as respects its influence in repressing crime, and the security it has given to person and property, is one of the most valuable of modern institutions. And the high character of those who now direct it, and the consequent improvement in the moral character of the men, together with its successful working in practice, has clearly shown that what under the old Police was considered by the Magistrates and the most experienced officers as a necessary evil, viz., flash houses, where the most vicious and desperate characters were allowed openly to assemble, hardening each other in their careers of crime, and seducing others, in order that they might be more readily secured when an adequate reward was offered, and the association of the Police Constables with low and infamous characters as a means of obtaining information is not a necessary part of a system which has for its object only the prevention and detection of crime; and there is reason to hope that the present system may carry into practice to the utmost extent every measure which can augment the difficulty and multiply obstructions in the way of the depredator, as well as every arrangement best calculated to diminish the chances of a profitable conversion of property when dishonestly obtained. The former will tend to prevent the latter to diminish the motives to commit crime."

Select Committee of 1837.

§ 12. On the 14th April, 1837, another Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the provisions of the 3 and 4 William IV., c. 19 (Metropolitan Police Offices Act), with a view to the further improvement of the same.

The Committee commenced but did not finally conclude their Inquiry during the Session and were re-appointed on the 24th November, 1838.

The Committee in their Report recommended:—

(I.) That for the better prevention of crime, the detection of offenders, and the preservation of the peace, and the more effectually to promote these objects in conformity with the principle of the 10 Geo. IV., c. 44, it is expedient to consolidate the several Constabulary Forces of the Metropolis, including those of the City of London and the River Thames, under one authority, responsible to the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

(II.) That it would tend to a more satisfactory administration of justice if Police Magistrates were called upon to execute such duties only as are of a judicial character and if all duties of an executive nature were committed to the charge of the Metropolitan Police Force.

(III.) That it would tend to the orderly and satisfactory administration of justice were the emoluments and qualifications of Police Magistrates strictly in accordance with the character and importance of the duties they have to perform, and were such alterations made in the construction and regulations of Police Offices as shall render them more analogous to Courts of Justice, and more convenient to suitors and the public.

The Committee made certain other recommendations which have no direct relevance to our Inquiry, but in regard to the power of Police Constables to take persons into custody without warrant the Report contains the following paragraphs :—

"Your Committee proceed now to consider such amendments as have been proposed with regard to the law of arrest. The constable's power to act without warrant is confined to cases of felony of which he receives the charge or sees the commission ; and to cases of breach of the peace taking place within his own view ; in all other misdemeanours a Justice's warrant must be obtained before the constable can legally make an arrest. This restraint is found to be productive of very considerable practical inconvenience. There are many offences of which the evidence will be lost unless immediately collected and fixed by examination of the witnesses. In like manner there are many offenders whose presence before a Magistrate cannot otherwise be secured than by instant apprehension and detention. In each of these cases, therefore, the law which prohibits arrest without warrant is to a certain extent a law for the protection of the offender and the prevention of redress to the party injured.

"The reason for the exercise of this power exists still stronger in the case of misdemeanours relating to the coin, in which, as the usual form of the offence is the uttering counterfeit coin twice within the space of ten days, all trace of the offender as well as all evidence of his offence would be obliterated by the delay of applying to a Magistrate for his warrant. The Legislature has already conferred this power, by special enactments, with regard to many particular offences, and your Committee can entertain no doubt it may safely be extended to every case in which the circumstances require its exercise in order to promote the substantial ends of justice. Your Committee also think that a similar necessity exists for an enlargement of the Magistrate's power to detain in custody the party so arrested for a reasonable time, for the purpose of examination ; and as it is believed that the practice both of Constables and Magistrates is at present not in accordance with the law, your Committee are of opinion that some immediate enactment to remedy this inconvenience is required."

The Committee accordingly recommended :—

"That in order to prevent the failure of justice in certain cases it is desirable the Police Constables should be authorised to take into custody, without warrant, offenders duly charged by the party aggrieved, and the Police Magistrates should have power to remand persons in custody for further examination."

The Committee also recommended :—

"That in order to prevent inconvenience from the unnecessary detention of persons in custody, it is expedient that more ample powers of taking bail or personal recognisance be provided."

The Committee further recommended :—

"That better accommodation be provided for the detention of offenders, both previous to and during the course of their examination before Police Magistrates."

In conclusion the Committee said :—

"Your Committee cannot conclude their Report without bestowing great and well-deserved commendation upon the excellent management and satisfactory conduct of the Metropolitan Police Force, which appears to be the subject of approbation on every occasion in which their services are capable of being publicly noticed.

If the Police Offices department does not merit the same degree of praise, that, in the opinion of your Committee, is the fault of the system, and not of the individuals concerned in the execution of its duties. The new arrangement of duties recommended in this Report will, as your Committee hope and expect, render the system nearly as perfect an instrument for the prevention, detection and effectual punishment of crime as Police institutions are capable of being made. What beyond this may be necessary for the more complete suppression of vicious habits and practices in this immense and mingled population must be the result of active benevolence, both public and private, governed by sound principles, directed to the promotion of such measures as tend to the early instruction of the inferior classes of society in virtuous and industrious habits, and to the provision of such means for the reformation of offenders as may restore them usefully to the station to which they belong."

We may here add certain facts which are not without interest, and which we gather from the evidence given before the Select Committee of 1834.

Lieutenant-Colonel Rowan and Mr. Richard Mayne were the two Commissioners who were first appointed to carry into execution the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829.

The Force was first established in September of that year, but not all at once, as, being deemed an experiment, it was thought necessary to enter upon it by degrees, and therefore the district was taken charge of by the Police in parts at three different periods, namely, in September, 1829, in February, 1830, and in the May following.

Only six out of seventeen divisions were established in September, 1829. The first increase took place in February, 1830, when there were seven additional divisions created, and the remaining four, making up the seventeen divisions, in May, 1830.

The full strength of the Force as it stood upon its completion up to May, 1830, consisted of 17 Superintendents, 68 Inspectors, 318 Sergeants, and 2,892 Police Constables. In 1834 the strength of the Force stood at 17 Superintendents, 70 Inspectors, 342 Sergeants, and 2,968 Police Constables. It follows from these figures that the total strength of the Force in 1830 was 3,295, and in 1834, 3,397.

The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, and the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, may be regarded as the direct outcome of the Report of the Select Committee with which we have just dealt.

The Royal Commission of 1855.

§ 13. The only Royal Commission appointed to inquire into any matter affecting the conduct of the Police was that which was appointed in 1855, when, in consequence of a disturbance of the public peace in Hyde Park on the 1st July, 1855, a Royal Commission was appointed "To inquire into the alleged disturbance of the public peace and all the circumstances thereof, and all matters connected therewith, and particularly into the conduct of the Officers and Constables of the said Metropolitan Police in connection with the same, and into the truth of all and singular the complaints of the conduct of them or any of them upon that occasion," which might be brought under their investigation.

The Commission being thus limited, the Commissioners in due course made their Report, which contained the judgment or opinion of the Commissioners upon a number of specific cases which were brought to their attention, and as to which they took evidence.

The general conclusion to which they came is expressed thus :—

"After full inquiry into the complaints submitted to our consideration we have deemed it our duty to report misconduct on the part of various members of the Police; a result more to be regretted on account of the high character of that body; but if excesses were shown to have been committed by some, ample testimony was also borne to the moderation and forbearance of other members of the same body on the same occasion; and whatever blame may attach to individuals it was through the exertions of the Police that accidents were prevented in the Park, and property in that vicinity protected from damage. When the events of the day are properly contrasted we think they will not be found to afford any just ground for lessening the confidence of the public—a confidence founded on experience of six-and-twenty years—in the general conduct and efficiency of the Metropolitan Police."

Departmental Committees.

§ 14. Departmental Committees have been appointed from time to time to inquire into and report upon various matters connected with the organisation and administration of the Police Force. Those brought to our notice are the Committees of 1868, 1878, 1879, and 1886. None of the Reports of these Committees appear to us to contain matters sufficiently relevant to or helpful in regard to our Inquiry to make it necessary for us to do more than to call attention to the fact that such Committees have advised the Secretary of State, and that it may therefore be presumed that the existing system of administration, organisation, and discipline of the Force is one that has been comparatively recently examined and in general found satisfactory.

None of the Reports of these Committees deal with complaints by members of the public against the Police.

PART I.

THE DUTIES OF THE POLICE IN DEALING WITH CASES OF DRUNKENNESS, DISORDER AND SOLICITATION IN THE STREETS.

Introduction.

§ 1. It is not easy to state briefly the objects of a Police Force in the capital of a modern State so as to cover all the purposes which its establishment is intended to serve. So far as our inquiry is concerned, it is sufficient to say that the primary object of an efficient Police Force is the prevention of crime; and next, that of the detection and the punishment of offenders if crime be committed.

The Metropolitan Police Force is a statutory Force composed of a number of constables who are invested with certain special rights or powers, and upon whom certain special corresponding duties are imposed by law.

For the purpose of attaining the objects with which the Force was established, the Commissioner of Police, as mentioned above, is given power, subject to the approbation of the Secretary of State, to frame such Orders and Regulations as he deems expedient relative to the general government of the members of the Metropolitan Police Force, the places of their residence, the classification, rank, and particular service of the several members, and all such other Orders and Regulations relative to the Police Force as he from time to time deems expedient for preventing neglect or abuse, and for rendering the Force efficient in the discharge of all its duties. Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, section 5.

In pursuance of this power, Regulations have been drawn up and framed from time to time by successive Commissioners, and sanctioned by successive Secretaries of State. These Regulations have been modified from time to time in the light of the experience gained by the working of the Force from year to year, and some of the Regulations are of a merely temporary kind. They form a code of rules by which all members of the Force are bound.

Status of Members of the Metropolitan Police Force.

§ 2. Every member of the Force is a constable, and upon his appointment he makes an affirmation to the following effect :—

"I, ———, being appointed a Constable of the Police Force of the Metropolitan Police District, do solemnly, sincerely and truly declare and affirm that I will well and truly serve our Sovereign Lord, the King, in the office of a Constable, and that I will act as a Constable for preserving the peace and preventing robberies and other felonies, and apprehending offenders against the peace, and in all respects, to the best of my skill and knowledge, discharge the duties of the said office faithfully according to law."

The office of "Constable" is an ancient one, and to explain and define the rights and duties of a constable at Common Law is difficult without giving the history of the office. It is not necessary for us to do more than state that at the present time every constable is possessed of certain special rights, and is subject to certain special duties in regard to the preservation of the peace by Common Law, and under the provisions of public and general Acts of Parliament.

Members of the Metropolitan Police Force are invested with the rights, and are subject to the duties especially appertaining to all constables within the Realm by virtue of holding the office, and they are also invested with special rights, and are subject to special duties, by virtue of statutory provisions applicable to the Metropolitan Police Force and to the Metropolitan Police District.

Speaking broadly, the duties of a constable are defined by the rights or powers with which he is invested as constable, for it is his duty to exercise those rights or powers if and when it becomes necessary to do so for the preservation of the peace, and the attainment of the purposes for which his office in the Force to which he belongs is designed.

The Metropolitan Police Force is a civilian and not a military body.

The power of a constable or police officer in respect to an act done by him officially affecting the liberty of the subject is greater than that accorded to a private individual; and assaults upon constables when in the execution of their duty, and resistance to or obstruction of them at such a time, have been made special offences by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, Section 12, and the Prevention of Crimes Act (Amendment Act), 1885, Section 2. Members of the Metropolitan Police are specially protected by the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 18, which makes it an offence to assault or resist any member of the Force in the execution of his duty, and by the Metropolitan Police Act, 1861, which enacts that "if any person shall assault or resist any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police Force acting in the execution of his duty, or shall aid or incite any person so to assault or resist, every such offender 'being summarily convicted thereof' may be fined to an amount not exceeding £5, or imprisoned for a time not exceeding one calendar month."

Members of the Metropolitan Police Force are not immune from the jurisdiction of the Courts of Justice established in the Realm in respect of any breaches of the law committed by them in the discharge, or in the intended discharge, of their duties as members of the Force. They may be sued in an action for damages for any wrong committed by them, and they are also liable to prosecution in the same manner, and to the same extent, for any crime committed by them, just as if they were ordinary individuals.

Archibald, Metropolitan Police Guide 23rd edition, p. 469, Beckwith v. Philby 6 B. & C., 638).

Neither in a civil action nor in a criminal prosecution is it any defence of itself for a constable to allege that he acted under the orders of an officer whose command he was bound, by the Regulations of the Force, to obey.

In civil actions for false imprisonment there are certain special defences which may be set up by constables; for instance, it is a good answer for a constable who has arrested the plaintiff to prove that he had reasonable cause to suspect that the plaintiff had committed a felony, whereas a defendant, who is not a constable, has to prove, in order to justify the arrest, that a felony has actually been committed.

A constable acting in the execution or intended execution of his duty is also in proceedings against him entitled to the limited protection afforded by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

The duties which have to be performed by members of the Force are of a very varied and extensive character, and it is not necessary for us, having regard to our Terms of Reference to attempt to state them exhaustively.

Classification of Duties.

§ 3. The duties of a member of the Metropolitan Police Force may be thus classified by reference to their source:—

(1) Duties imposed upon them as constables at Common Law.

(2) Duties imposed upon them by Statute.

(3) Duties imposed upon them by the Regulations of the Commissioner.

We have now to limit ourselves to a consideration of the duties of the police in dealing with the three classes of offences coming within our Terms of Reference, namely, drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets.

30 & 31 Vict., cap. 134, s. 3.

We take it that we may properly give to the word "street" the interpretation applicable to the term as used in the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867; and, accordingly, that it is used in such a sense as to include any "highway or other public place, whether a thoroughfare or not."

The offences which are comprised within the Terms of Reference, "drunkenness" and "solicitation in the streets," are clearly non-indictable offences.

The term "Disorder," standing alone, is so wide that it might possibly be construed as covering any kind of breach of the peace committed in a street, though it should be pointed out that the word is not technically descriptive of any treason, felony, misdemeanour, or breach of the law. Having regard to the context, we think that upon the true construction of the phrase we may consider it as a generic term intended to cover all such statutory offences, punishable summarily, which involve or tend to create a breach of the peace, and it is in that sense that we use the term in this Report.

We will now proceed to consider the duties of the Police in regard to the offences coming within our Terms of Reference under each of the three heads above mentioned.

DIVISION I.

I.—DUTIES AT COMMON LAW.

§ 1. At Common Law neither drunkenness nor solicitation in the streets appears of itself to be a criminal offence. Justices of the Peace are, however, by virtue of their commissions and of the old Statute, 34 Edward III., chapter 1, invested with certain powers of compelling persons to enter into recognisances to the King to keep the peace and to be of good behaviour. By his Commission "Every Justice of the Peace has power to cause to come before him all those who, to any of the King's people, concerning their bodies, or the firing of their houses have used threats, to find sufficient surety for the peace, or their good behaviour towards the King and his people, and, if they shall refuse to find such surety, to cause them in the King's prisons to be kept safely until they shall find such surety." And by the Statute just mentioned justices "have power to restrain the offenders, rioters, and all other barrators, and to pursue, arrest, take, and chastise them according to their trespass or offence, and to cause them to be imprisoned and duly punished according to the laws and custom of the Realm; . . . and to take of all them that be not of good fame, where they shall be found, sufficient surety and main prize of their good behaviour towards the King and his people, and the other duly to punish; to the intent that people be not by such rioters or rebels troubled or endangered, nor the peace blemished, nor merchants nor others passing by the highways of the Realm disturbed and put into the peril which may happen of such offenders."

Archibald, p. 279.

Archibald, p. 280.

A constable may, like any other person, go before a justice or justices out of Session, and make complaint on oath of the facts which require the surety; but formal complaint seems not to be necessary if the party is already before the Court on another charge.

Archibald, p. 280.

§ 2. It does not appear that at Common Law a constable has any right to arrest a person simply because of the use of threatening language or behaviour, but where one person threatens another with immediate personal violence the constable seems to have power to interfere with a view of preventing a breach of the peace, and if his efforts at mediation are unsuccessful—if one party should attempt to strike the other, especially if he does so with a weapon—the constable may arrest, for in that case a specific attempt to commit an offence has been made.

White Book, pp. 224, 225.

In general it may be laid down that a constable ought not to apprehend any person unless some specific act has been committed by which the law has been broken for which a right of apprehension exists. At Common Law a constable may arrest anyone who within his view commits a breach of the peace (e.g., commits an assault), or anyone whom he has just cause to suspect to be about to commit a breach of the peace.

Thus, when a drunken person, or a man in a violent passion, threatens the life of another, the constable should interfere and arrest, though, if persons be merely quarrelling or insulting each other by word, a constable has no right to arrest, but should be ready to prevent a breach of the peace.

DIVISION II.

DUTIES OF THE POLICE IN DEALING WITH CASES OF DRUNKENNESS, DISORDER, AND SOLICITATION IN THE STREETS UNDER STATUTE.

§ 1. The duties of the police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets arising under Statute, can only be determined by reference to the provisions of the various Acts of Parliament creating offences coming under these general heads.

Dealing, first of all, with drunkenness, we find that the offences created by Statute coming under this head may be divided into cases of drunkenness simply, and cases of drunkenness with aggravating circumstances.

As to drunkenness simply, the statutory provisions are :—

(1) The Licensing Act, 1872, Section 12 :—

"Every person found drunk in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not or on any licensed premises, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten shillings, and on a second conviction within a period of twelve months shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings, and on a third or subsequent conviction within such period of twelve months be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

It will be observed that no power of arrest without warrant was given to a constable by this provision, nor is any definition of the term "drunk" given in the Licensing Act, 1872. A very large discretion is accordingly given to the magistrate who has to try the case in arriving at a conclusion as to whether he ought or ought not to convict under this section, as will be seen from what we say below. Some of the difficulties under which the police labour in discharging their duties are due to the want of precision in the meaning of the word "drunk." Drunkenness is obviously a matter of degree; and, as the section stands, it gives what is practically absolute freedom to the magistrate to place his own interpretation upon it.

(2) The Licensing Act, 1902, Section 1 :—

"If a person is found drunk in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, or on any licensed premises, and appears to be incapable of taking care of himself, he may be apprehended and dealt with according to law."

It thus appears that if a person is simply drunk a constable cannot legally arrest him; but if the person in question is so drunk that he may be properly described as "incapable of taking care of himself" he may be apprehended without warrant. It is obvious that the words "incapable of taking care of himself," in the Statute, are also words of a wide character capable of very different constructions, though in practice little difficulty, so far as we can ascertain, has been found in the cases dealt with under the Act of 1902.

§ 2. With regard to drunkenness with aggravating circumstances, the following are the principal statutory provisions now relied upon :—

(1) The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 58 :—

"Every person who shall be found drunk in any street or public thoroughfare within the said district" (the Metropolitan Police District), "and who while drunk shall be guilty of any riotous or indecent behaviour . . . . . shall be liable to a penalty of not more than forty shillings for every such offence, or may be committed, if the magistrate before whom he shall be convicted shall think fit, instead of inflicting on him any pecuniary penalty, to the house of correction for any time not more than seven days."

(2) The Licensing Act, 1872, Section 12 :—

"Every person who in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, is guilty while drunk of riotous or disorderly behaviour, or who is drunk while in charge on any highway or other public place of any carriage, horse, cattle, or steam engine, or who is drunk when in possession of any loaded firearms, may be apprehended, and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings, or in the discretion of the court to imprisonment with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding one month."

(3) The Licensing Act, 1902, Section 2 :—

(i) "If any person is found drunk in any highway or other public place, whether a building or not, or on any licensed premises, while having the charge of a child apparently under the age of seven years, he may be apprehended, and shall, if the child is under that age, be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding forty shillings, or to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding one month.

(ii) "If the child appears to the Court to be under the age of seven, the child shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be under that age unless the contrary is proved.

(iii) "The offence under this section shall be included in the list of offences mentioned in the First Schedule to the Inebriates' Act, 1898, and in Section 60 of the Licensing Act, 1872."

Disorder.

§ 3. As we have observed above, disorder in the streets is not a word descriptive of any specific offence at Common Law or under any Statute. The term "disorderly" is, however, found in several statutes designed to secure the safety and peace of streets and highways.

The statutory provisions now in force, and applied by the police when occasion arises, are the following :—

(1) The Metropolitan Police Act, 1829, Section 7 :—

"It shall be lawful for any man belonging to the said Police Force, during the time of his being on duty, to apprehend all loose, idle, and disorderly persons whom he shall find disturbing the public peace, or whom he shall have just cause to suspect of any evil designs."

(2) The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 64 :—

"It shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police to take into custody, without a warrant, all loose, idle, and disorderly persons whom he shall find disturbing the public peace, or whom he shall have good cause to suspect of having committed or being about to commit any felony, misdemeanour, or breach of the peace, and all persons whom he shall find between sunset and the hour of eight in the morning lying or loitering in any highway, yard, or other place, and not giving a satisfactory account of themselves."

It should be noticed here that neither of these sections creates an offence, and so far as that part of Section 64 which gives power to arrest a person whom a constable shall have good cause to suspect of having committed or being about to commit any felony, is concerned, it seems to be merely declaratory of the Common Law, for, apart from that enactment, it is clear that a member of the Force under his powers as a constable has power to arrest a person on reasonable suspicion that he has committed a felony, or when he has just cause to suspect that he is about to commit a felony.

With regard to the power given to arrest "loose, idle and disorderly persons," it may be remarked that the power to arrest is wider than the jurisdiction of the magistrate before whom the person apprehended may be brought. Being a "loose, idle, and disorderly person" disturbing the public peace is not of itself (that is, without evidence of some specific act constituting the offence) a crime punishable by the magistrate. See Mr. C.E. Troup's Evidence, Qs. 47842 to 47849.

When a prisoner arrested under either of these sections as a "loose, idle, and disorderly person" is brought before the magistrate, unless the constable has any ground for preferring a charge of some specific offence, it appears that the only course which the magistrate can take is to bind over the prisoner to keep the peace under the powers conferred by his Commission and the old Statute of Edward III. above quoted.

(3) The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 54:—

"Every person shall be liable to a penalty not more than forty shillings, who, within the limits of the Metropolitan Police District, shall, in any thoroughfare or public place, commit any of the following offences (that is to say) . . . .

(xii) "Every person who shall sell or distribute, or offer for sale or distribution, or exhibit to public view any profane, indecent, or obscene book, paper, print, drawing, painting, or representation, or sing any profane, indecent or obscene song or ballad, or write or draw any indecent or obscene word, figure, or representation, or use any profane, indecent, or obscene language to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers.

(xiii) "Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned . . . . and it shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police Force to take into custody, without warrant, any person who shall commit any such offence within view of any such constable."

Section 54 of the Police Act, 1839, creates, besides the offences specified in sub-sections 12 and 13, various other street offences which it is unnecessary to enumerate. All of them, however, may be classified under the general head "Disorder," though some of them are virtually only regulations for the convenient and proper use of the highway, the breach of which does not involve criminality in the ordinary sense of the term.

(4) The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 63:—

"It shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police District, and for all persons whom he shall call to his assistance, to take into custody, without a warrant, any person who within view of any such constable shall offend in any manner against this Act, and whose name and residence shall be unknown to such constable and cannot be ascertained by such constable."

(5) By the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, provisions are made for regulating the traffic in the Metropolis and for the greater security of persons passing through the streets, and for other purposes.

It is unnecessary to set out in detail the offences created by this Act, but as a complaint was made to us by a street bookmaker that the police blackmailed him, and we inquired into it, it may be well to set forth Section 23 of this Act which enacts that:—

"Any three or more persons assembled together in any part of a street within the Metropolis for the purpose of betting shall be deemed to be obstructing the street, and each of such persons shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding Five Pounds, and within the City of London and the Liberties thereof any constable of the City Police Force, and without such limits any constable of the Metropolitan Police Force, may take into custody, without warrant, any person who may commit such offence in view of such constable."

Street betting has also been made an offence by the following local authorities under the Local Government Act :—

The County of London.

The County of Middlesex.

The County of Essex.

The Borough of Richmond

The Borough of Croydon.

By the Street Betting Act, 1906, street betting is made an offence against the general law of the land, and is punishable under Section 1—(a) and (b), by fine, and in the case of a third offence (c) by imprisonment.

Under Sections 1 and 2 any persons found offending against the Act may be arrested by a constable without warrant, and his betting books, cards, and papers may be seized and forfeited.

§ 4. Various offences have been created by the London County Council, the Middlesex County Council, the Essex County Council, the Surrey County Council, the Kent County Council, the Hertfordshire County Council, and by the Councils of the Boroughs of Kingston, of Richmond, of West Ham and of Croydon, to which it is unnecessary to do more than call general attention. But as, in regard to the complaint made before us by Mr. James Baker, reference was made to a bye-law of the London County Council, it may be well to set it out here. It is to the following effect :—

Qs. 20864, 20865.

"Every person who in any street or in any open space to which the public have access for the time being shall commit, or attempt to commit, any act of indecency with any other person, or shall, to the annoyance of residents or passengers, commit any act of indecency which is not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of an Act of Parliament in force throughout the County of London, shall be liable to a fine, etc."

It should also be remembered that the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and the Vagrancy Act, 1838, apply to the Metropolitan area.

Solicitation.

§ 5. The principal statutory principles relating to solicitation in the streets are as follows :—

(1) The Vagrancy Act, 1824, Section 3 :—

"Every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways, or in any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous and indecent manner . . . shall be deemed an idle and disorderly person within the true intent and meaning of this Act ; and it shall be lawful for any Justice of the Peace to commit such offender (being thereof convicted before him by his own view, or by the confession of such offender, or by the evidence on oath of one or more credible witness or witnesses) to the House of Correction, there to be kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding one calendar month."

Section 4 :—

"Every person committing any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned, after having been convicted as an idle and disorderly person (thus including every common prostitute wandering in the streets, etc.) . . . . . shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond, within the true intent and meaning of this Act."

(2) The Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 54 :—

"Every person shall be liable to a penalty not more than forty shillings who, within the limits of the Metropolitan Police District, shall, in any thoroughfare or public place, commit any of the following offences (that is to say) . . . . (ss. xi). Every common prostitute or night-walker, loitering or being in any thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers. . . . And it shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police Force to take into custody, without warrant, any person who shall commit any such offence within view of any such constable."

(3) The Vagrancy Act, 1898, Section 1 :—

(ss. 1) Every male person who—

(a) knowingly lives wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution ; or

(b) in any public place persistently solicits or importunes for immoral purposes, shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and may be dealt with accordingly.

§ 6. There are no statutory provisions expressly relating to the solicitation of women by men in the streets, but, in the view of several of the learned magistrates who gave evidence before us, such cases where the accosting of a woman is so clear or pronounced as to become insulting could be dealt with under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 13, which is set out above.

DIVISION III.

DUTIES OF THE POLICE IN DEALING WITH CASES OF DRUNKENNESS, DISORDER, AND SOLICITATION IN THE STREETS UNDER THE ORDERS AND REGULATIONS.

Police Orders and Regulations.

§ 1. Besides the duties imposed upon members of the Force by virtue of their office at Common Law and under statute, there are duties imposed upon them under the Orders and Regulations made by the Commissioner of Police under the statutory powers given to him by the Metropolitan Police Acts 1829 and 1839.

By Section 5 of the former Act, power was given to the Justices to be appointed under the Act to make from time to time, subject to the approbation of one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, certain Orders and Regulations, and those powers are now exercisable by the sole Commissioner of Police.

The power given is to frame "such Orders and Regulations as they shall deem expedient relative to the general government of the men to be appointed members of the police under this Act, the place of their residence, the classification, rank, and particular service of the several members; their distribution and inspection; the description of arms, accoutrements, and other necessaries to be furnished to them; and which of them shall be provided with horses for the performance of their duty; and all such other Orders and Regulations, relative to the said Police Force, as the said Justices (now the Commissioner) shall from time to time deem expedient for preventing neglect or abuse, and for rendering such Force efficient in the discharge of all its duties."

The Orders and Regulations made in the exercise of this power are obviously rules to be binding upon members of the Force, and any Order or Regulation made thereunder which affects to impose duties upon persons other than members of the Force appears to be ultra vires.

The Orders and Regulations contemplated are provisions of law regulating the rights and duties of members of the Force inter se, with the general aim of so establishing, maintaining, and governing the Force, as to adapt it for the purposes for which it was created and is carried on.

It may be remarked, further, that Orders and Regulations made under this power must be consistent with the general law. Any Order or Regulation which might purport to give members of the Force greater powers against persons not members of the Force than the general law gives them would be of no effect.

The legal relations of the Metropolitan Police Force, as a whole, and the individual members thereof, to the public are determined by the general law of the land.

§ 2. But though these propositions are true as regards the Orders and Regulations made in pursuance of the general powers given by these two Acts, they are not applicable to Regulations made from time to time by the Commissioner under powers given expressly by divers statutes which have been passed for the government of the Metropolis. Thus, the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, gives (among other things) the Commissioner power to make Regulations as to the traffic in the Metropolis. So, also, under the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, the Commissioner has power to make Regulations as to the traffic on certain occasions. Orders and Regulations made under these and similar Acts may impose duties upon the general public as well as upon members of the Police Force.

Though for our purpose it is not necessary to enumerate the legislative or other special powers of the Commissioner, still it is necessary to notice and bear in mind the distinction between Orders and Regulations made under the general powers of the Metropolitan Police Acts, which are intended to bind members of the Police Force, but which by their own force alone impose no duty upon persons not belonging to the Police Force, and Orders and Regulations which apply to persons other than members of the Police Force.

The Instruction Book.

§ 3. The Orders and Regulations for the use of the Police have been collected and arranged in a book called the "Instruction Book for the Government and Guidance of the Metropolitan Police Force," the last edition of which was published in the year 1900. A copy of this book is supplied to every member of the Force, and it is his duty to make himself acquainted with its contents.

In the course of our proceedings this book came to be referred to, for the sake of brevity, as the "White Book," and for a similar reason we shall refer to it in the course of our Report in the same manner.

In the White Book the distinction between Orders and Regulations which affect to bind the Police only and justify their relations, inter se, and Orders and Regulations which apply to persons other than members of the Force, is ignored. Both kinds of Orders and Regulations are set forth.

The Orders and Regulations are arranged in three divisions, as follows :—

Division I.—Administration.

Division II.—Crime and Criminal Matters.

Division III.—Civil Business.

The arrangement contemplated appears to have been that under the first head of "Administration," the Orders and Regulations relating to the organisation of the Force and its disposition, apportionment, and so forth, should be included ; and that, under Divisions II. and III., the duties of the Police as to "Crime and Criminals" and as to "Civil Business" should be explained. The arrangement has, in fact, not been adhered to. For instance, under the head of "Administration" we find the law as to hackney and stage carriages in the Metropolis, and the subject of licensing drivers of such carriages and the special offences of which they may be guilty are dealt with.

Again, we find that the Orders and Regulations as to division, beat, and fixed point of members of the Force are included in Division III., relating to "Civil Business," though one would have thought its appropriate place would have been under Division I., relating to "Administration."

It is in Division II., relating to "Crimes and Criminals," that the Orders and Regulations laying down rules as to the conduct of the Police in dealing with the three classes of cases with which we are concerned are to be mainly found. It is obvious that these offences are not created by Orders and Regulations made by the Commissioner, but that they either came into being as part of the Common Law, or else have been created by the Statutes to which attention has been drawn above.

In the White Book we find that a considerable part of Division II. is devoted to a statement of the law as to crimes and offences. If the White Book was intended simply as a compilation of Orders and Regulations made by the Chief Commissioner, an exposition of the law as to crimes and offences ought to have no place in the work ; but it is clear that the framer of the book, as it stands, designed it for the instruction and general direction of members of the Force, and that he felt it was necessary to give some description of the crimes and offences which it is the duty of the Police to prevent and detect.

Seeing that it is the duty of the Police to prevent street offences, and to exercise their powers against offenders, it is very necessary that they should know what acts or conduct constitute such offences, and in a proper Instruction Book an exposition of the law in regard to such offences ought undoubtedly to find a place ; but it seems to us that statements of law ought to be clearly separated from Orders and Regulations directing members of the Force as to how they are to exercise the powers vested in them in regard to the prevention and punishment of these offences. That course was not, however, taken by the compiler of the White Book, and it is accordingly not always easy to distinguish between directions which are simply statements of law and directions given to constables as to the method in which they are to discharge their duty as members of the Force. We have endeavoured to extract from the White Book the directions which may be truly described as Orders and Regulations imposed upon members of the Force as to the manner in which they are to exercise their powers in regard to street offences.

Procedure in Regard to Street Offences.

§ 4. The offences with which we are concerned, in accordance with the construction which we place upon the Terms of Reference, are all non-indictable offences punishable summarily under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

In regard to these offences, a constable may proceed against an offender either by Information and Summons or by summary arrest of the offender where the law allows him that power. So far as the legal position of the constable is concerned the character of the crime is not very material. In cases, for instance, where he has the power of summary arrest, the constable's duty is the same, so far as the actual apprehension of the offender is concerned, whether the offender be guilty of a felony such as larceny from the person, or guilty merely of some street offence, and it is only in the subsequent stages of the procedure for the punishment of crime that the distinction becomes material. Thus, in the Charge Room it appears that the Orders and Regulations contemplate some difference of treatment in the method of taking the charge in the case of an indictable as compared with a non-indictable offence.

White Book, p. 249.

Where the name and address of an offender, guilty of a street offence committed within view of a constable, are known, the constable is not bound to make use of the statutory power of arrest, but may take out a Summons against the offender in the ordinary way.

If the constable proceeds by Summons, it is his duty to report the facts of the case without delay, and to prosecute the case in the ordinary way. He is not, however, obliged to draw up the Summons, as that is the duty of the Magistrate's Clerk.

It does not appear to us necessary to go into detail as to the constable's duty where the proceeding is by Summons, as in nearly all the complaints which have been made to us as to alleged misconduct on the part of the Police the complaint has had reference to the exercise of the power of summary arrest, and the proceedings consequent thereon.

It is necessary, therefore, for us to treat in some detail the directions given to constables as to their conduct in regard to summary arrest for street offences. That power of arrest is discretionary, that is to say, the constable who witnesses what he deems to be the commission of a street offence may content himself with cautioning the offender, or if he decide to take action has a discretion as to whether he will exercise the power of summary arrest.

Discretionary Character of a Constable's Duty.

§ 5. It is easy to state the legal duty of the constable in such a case, but the question whether in any particular case the constable ought to exercise his power or, what is the same thing, perform his duty, is in many instances one of extreme difficulty, and not very much help is given by the observation in the White Book that "to deprive a person of liberty is a very serious matter, and great discretion is necessary."

White Book, p. 224.

It appears to be contemplated by the authorities that the constable should do his best to prevent the commission of street offences by vigilance, and, where possible, by tactful warning and interference short of actual arrest where his action seems likely to prevent the actual committal of an offence. It seems, however, to be his duty, if the acts of a person are such as to constitute a street offence, to exercise the power of arrest. In most cases the exercise of such a discretion in regard to street offences seems more difficult than in regard to indictable crimes, because in many instances, owing to the extremely vague words of the Statutes constituting the offence, the question whether in any given case the acts and conduct observed by the constable amount to an offence is a matter upon which opinions may legitimately differ

Once a constable has determined to effect an arrest, his duty is laid down with reasonable precision in the White Book. After effecting the arrest it is his duty to take his prisoner to the Police Station to which his patrol or his beat is attached, to there charge the prisoner with the offence for which he has been arrested, and, if the charge be accepted by the Inspector or Station Sergeant in command of the station, to appear and prosecute the defendant at the Police Court.

Each stage in these proceedings is regulated by directions given in the White Book, and as it is a question whether the operations commencing with arrest and leading up to prosecution in the Police Court are or are not properly performed by members of the Force, which forms the principal topic of our Inquiry, it becomes necessary to consider what the duty of the Police in regard to each stage of the process is.

Apprehensions.

§ 6. The question whether in any particular case a constable has a right to arrest is, of course, a question of law which we have to some extent dealt with above.

In regard to the method of effecting an arrest, we find the following Orders and Regulations in the White Book :—

(83) An apprehension is effected by written warrant, or on reasonable belief of facts justifying taking into custody without a warrant. White Book, p. 224,

Arrests for street offences come under the second alternative in this proposition

(84) The Police are not to apprehend any person unless some specific act has been committed by which the law has been broken, for which a right of apprehension exists.

(184) An arrest having been determined upon, the following rules must be borne in mind : In effecting an arrest the officer, if in plain clothes, should state that he is a Police Officer, and say, "I arrest you——," or "I arrest you on this warrant for——," reading it over to the prisoner as early as practicable. This statement or reading over is for the information of the accused, and not for the purpose of obtaining an answer ; but any statement made by him should be carefully listened to, and written down as soon as possible, and, although no question must be asked as to the offence, anything the prisoner says voluntarily must be noted. White Book, p. 249.

(185) Unnecessary violence should be studiously avoided. Care should be taken to make the arrest quietly, without attracting attention or inflicting any needless exposure on the prisoner.

(229) In apprehending a person, and making him or her a prisoner, no more violence is to be used than is absolutely necessary for the safe custody of the prisoner. The usual plan is to seize and keep hold of the arm until the prisoner is in the station, to prevent the possibility of escape. When a prisoner is once in custody he is not to be released except by direction of a Magistrate or on the responsibility of an officer in charge of a Police Station. An exception to this rule is, however, to be made in cases in which street musicians or street singers are given into custody under the Act 27 & 28 Vict., cap. 55, when, if the person complaining does not go all the way to the Station with the Constable, the officer has to release the prisoner from custody without taking him to the Station, reporting the circumstances as soon after as practicable to the Inspector or Sergeant at the Station. If a prisoner resists, the Constable is bound to struggle with and overpower him, but he is to be careful not to injure him unnecessarily. White Book, p. 256, 257.

(230) If necessary, the Constable will blow his whistle for assistance. Truncheons are supplied to the police to enable them to protect themselves if violently attacked, and if a Constable is likely to be overpowered he may draw his truncheon and use it, taking care to avoid striking anyone on the head. The arms and legs should be aimed at to disable a prisoner, as parts of the frame least likely to suffer serious injury. The use of the truncheon is not to be resorted to except in extreme cases, when all other attempts have failed and a prisoner is likely to escape through the Constable being ill-used or overpowered.

In every instance where a truncheon has been used it is to be submitted to the Inspector at the Station, by the officer who has used it, when he next parades for duty. The Inspector is to thoroughly examine the truncheon for any defect, and report the result of his examination to the Superintendent.

(231) Prisoners who are very violent, or who are charged with very serious offences, are, if necessary, to be handcuffed.

(232) Whenever it is necessary to convey to the Station persons drunk or disorderly, and who are unable or refuse to walk, the practice known as the "Frog's March" is not to be adopted except in cases of absolute necessity, when a special report of the circumstance is to be submitted the following day. The ambulance kept at the nearest station is to be sent for, and the person required to be conveyed is to be firmly strapped thereon.

It should be observed that these Regulations are simply declaratory of the Common Law, that both as to effecting the apprehension and as to taking a prisoner to the police station or before a magistrate, a constable is bound to use no more force than is reasonably necessary in that behalf. The directions, however, are, it will be observed, more specific as to the use of the truncheon.

Having effected the arrest, it is the duty of the constable to accompany and take the prisoner to the nearest police station.

Under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, section 69, which is the statutory provision to this effect,

"Every person taken into custody by any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police, without warrant, except persons detained for the mere purpose of ascertaining their name or residence, shall be forthwith delivered into the custody of the constable in charge of the nearest station-house in order that such person may be secured until he can be brought before a magistrate to be dealt with according to law, or may give bail for his appearance before a magistrate, if the constable in charge shall deem it prudent to take bail in the manner hereinafter mentioned."

The exception ("except persons detained for the mere purpose of ascertaining their name and residence") refers to a power conferred upon constables of the Metropolitan Police by section 63 of the same Act, which provides that—

"It shall be lawful for any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police District, and for all persons whom he shall call to his assistance, to take into custody, without a warrant, any person who, within view of any such constable, shall offend in any manner against this Act, and whose name and residence shall be unknown to such constable and cannot be ascertained by such constable."

Charge Room Proceedings.

§ 7. When a constable has brought his prisoner to the charge room it is his duty, in accordance with the Regulations, to prefer a charge to the Inspector or Station Sergeant at the police station against the prisoner which justifies, if true, his arrest.

At the police station we have to distinguish between the duty of the constable who has brought in the prisoner, and the duty of the Inspector or Station Sergeant as to taking the charge, the giving of bail, and the treatment of the prisoner.

The arresting constable having preferred the charge in accordance with the Regulations has, if the charge be accepted and the prisoner be detained, no further immediate duty to perform in regard to the case, but ought to return to his beat or to the performance of the duty upon which he was engaged when the arrest had to be made.

Statements by Prisoners and Witnesses.

§ 8 The following are the principal Regulations as to taking and refusing charges:—

(194) When prisoners are brought to police stations and charged with any offence, the statements of persons charging, of witnesses, and of police are to be made to the officer on duty in the presence and hearing of the prisoners. White Book, pp. 251 to 255.

(195) If there be more than one police witness in a case, each constable is to make his statement out of the hearing of the other, whenever it is so desired by the person charged.

(198) A statement made by a prisoner when charged at a station is to be accurately written down at the time by the officer on duty, and reported to the magistrate who hears the case.

(199) The officer on duty, before receiving a charge, is to ascertain that there is reasonable ground for preferring the complaint against the accused; and unless the circumstances be such as to entitle the accuser to be believed, a charge is not to be taken.

(200) The greatest care is to be exercised in the investigation of charges, as it has occasionally been noticed that even where there have been suspicious circumstances, the officer on duty has shown great readiness in accepting the statement of the constable making the charge, without giving the case that close personal attention which is imperatively demanded.

(201) A constable may well be excused for a mistake as to the nature of a case, or for an error of judgment in respect to it, as he is often obliged to act without much time for reflection; but when once the case is brought to the Station something more is required from the officer in charge, who is supposed to have experience and judgment, and has, moreover, time for full consideration and investigation where such is necessary.

(202) Any Station Officer neglecting these instructions when dealing with charges will incur serious responsibility.

(203) Good order is to be strictly preserved whilst the witnesses are giving evidence, and their statements, and any made by the person charged, are to be patiently and attentively heard.

(204) Charges by constables of assaults on themselves, or of obstruction in the execution of their duty, are to be strictly investigated at the Station, and discouraged, especially when the persons accused are known, so that a summons or warrant may be afterwards obtained. When a prisoner charged with an offence is also charged with an assault on the Police arising out of it, the assault is to be entered separately, but in the same space on the charge sheet.

(207) In apprehending, where the law permits without a warrant, for an offence to which the attention of Police has been first directed by an informant, the name and address of the informant is, if possible, to be obtained

(209) The charge as entered upon the sheet is always to be read over to the prisoner, not with a view of extracting an answer, but to inform him of the nature of the offence with which he is charged; but any observation he makes is to be noted and attended to.

(211) Police officers taking charges at Stations are at all times to be properly dressed in uniform.

(212) Persons who come to the police station as witnesses, when a charge is being made, are not to be taken into custody and charged with being concerned in the offence, unless circumstances strictly justify such a course. Such a practice may prevent persons from appearing who can give important evidence, and has the appearance of a desire by the Police to suppress evidence in the case, especially where the charge is for an assault on the Police themselves, or for obstructing them in the performance of their duty. In cases of assault on the Police, obstruction in the performance of their duty, a rescue, or similar offence, where all the persons cannot be secured and kept in custody, the arrest should still be made, if possible, at the time.

(213) The Police concerned in a charge are to bring forward the necessary witnesses and to use all exertions to have the circumstances of the case fully stated, and afford every facility to the Magistrate in carrying on the investigation.

(217) Charges are to be taken to the nearest police station, especially in the exterior districts.

Charge Sheets.

§ 9. As to the charge sheets it is provided as follows :—

(219) Charge sheets are to be carefully and properly filled up by the officers taking charges in accordance with the several headings.

(220) Prisoners are not to be questioned as to their degree of education, and no reference thereto is to be made on the charge sheet. The occupation should be entered as obtained from the person charged ; if the person declines to state occupation, the words "nature of occupation not tendered" to be recorded.

(221) The description of property found on person is to be put first in the proper column, then a line drawn, then below the line the description of property found elsewhere.

(223) If a fictitious name is entered on a charge sheet and the prisoner's proper name is subsequently discovered, it is to be entered underneath, and indexed in the charge sheet.

Charges Refused.

§ 10. As to the refusal of charges it is provided : —

(227) When a person is brought to a Police Station in custody for any alleged offence, whether by a constable or private person, and the charge from any cause is not received, an entry of the particulars is to be made in the Refused Charge Book. The reasons for charges being refused are to be entered as clearly and briefly as possible.

If, as the result of the charge room proceedings, the Officer in charge of the Station refuses the charge, the prisoner should be allowed to depart. If the charge is, however, accepted, the prisoner is to be detained until released on his own recognisances or on bail in accordance with the provisions stated below.

Character of duty of Officer in Charge of Station

§ 11. It ought to be mentioned here that some doubt or difference of opinion appears to have been entertained as to the exact duty of the Officer in charge of the Police Station before whom a person apprehended without warrant has been brought in accordance with the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 69.

Sir Edward Henry expressed before us the view that the functions of such an officer are strictly executive, and expressly limited to making an inquiry
Q. 52472. with a view to determining whether he will or will not accept bail ; but the Regulations which we have just quoted are certainly based upon the view that his functions are not so limited as Sir Edward Henry urged, but imply that he has the right to determine, though not with a view to the final decision of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, whether he ought or ought not to accept the charge and detain the prisoner at all.

In our view the matter is worth some consideration because we are of opinion that the proceedings in the charge room, affording as they do a convenient
Q. 52472. opportunity for checking any abuse of authority or correcting any blunder by a constable in the performance of his duties in regard to street offences and obviating the necessity of carrying the matter any further where it is reasonably certain that no conviction ought to ensue, are of the utmost importance. Sir Edward Henry formed his opinion as to the limited character of the functions of the officer in charge of the Station upon his construction of Section 69 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, already quoted, and upon Sections 70 and 71 of the same Act, and upon Section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

Sections 70 and 71 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, are as follows :—

S. 70. "Whenever any person charged with any offence of which he is liable to be summarily convicted before a magistrate, or with having carelessly done any hurt or damage, shall be, without the warrant of a Magistrate, in the custody of any constable of the Metropolitan Police in charge of any station house during the time when the police courts shall be shut, it shall be lawful for such Constable, if he deem it prudent, to take the recognisance of such person, with or without sureties, conditioned as hereinafter mentioned."

S. 71. "Whenever any person charged with any felony, or any misdemeanour punishable by transportation, or any other grave misdemeanour, shall be, without warrant, in the custody of any Constable of the Metropolitan Police at any station house during the time when the police courts shall be shut, it shall be lawful for the constable in charge of the station house to require the persons making such charge to enter into a recognisance conditioned as hereinafter mentioned, and upon his or her refusal so to do it shall be lawful for such Constable, if he shall deem it prudent, to discharge from custody the person so charged, upon his or her recognisance, with or without sureties, conditioned as hereinafter mentioned."

Section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is to the following effect :—

S. 38. "A person taken into custody for an offence without a warrant shall be brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction as soon as practicable after he is so taken into custody; and if it is not or will not be practicable to bring him before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction within 24 hours after he is so taken into custody, a superintendent or inspector of police, or other officer of police of equal or superior rank, or in charge of any police station, shall enquire into the case; and, except where the offence appears to such superintendent, inspector or officer to be of a serious nature, shall discharge the prisoner, upon his entering into a recognisance, with or without sureties, for a reasonable amount, to appear before some Court of Summary Jurisdiction at the day, time and place named in the recognisance."

The Chief Commissioner also suggested that the provision contained in section 72 of the Street Musicians Act, 1864, supported this view. That is the section referred to in the Regulation quoted above as an exception to the general rule, that when a prisoner is once in custody he is not to be released except by direction of a magistrate or on the responsibility of an officer in charge of the police station. Q. 52472.

Sir Edward Henry, of course, did not fail to observe that the Regulations contained in the White Book were not framed in accordance with his construction of the legal duty of the inspector or station sergeant in charge of a police station, and considered them as executive directions going beyond the Statutes which were framed as matters of general convenience; and he told us that the officers in charge of a police station used to exercise much more discretion in the early days of the Force "because they used to release as many as from 20,000 to 22,000 persons a year in that way. Then it was realised that this might lead to abuse, and so the Commissioner intervened, and it was gradually reduced to its present position. Of these 6,000 or 7,000 charges which are refused at the police stations I suppose very nearly three out of four are charges brought by private persons, or something like that." Q. 52490.

Sir Edward Henry also told us that the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown had been taken upon the matter, and he was good enough to put in their opinion dated the 18th April, 1907.

Their opinion is as follows :—

"The powers of an officer of police in charge of a Metropolitan Police Station are not magisterial, but those of a constable only, and are clearly defined by the well-known rules of the Common Law and by Statute. Police officers must exercise the powers vested in them with reasonable discretion, and would in no case be justified in detaining in custody a person against whom a charge is made in the absence of some ground for believing that the facts well supported the charge, and that it is one in respect of which the defendant is liable to arrest."

Upon this we think it right to remark that we have no doubt whatever that the duty of an officer in charge of a police station is not of a judicial character. He has no power to administer an oath or to compel the attendance of witnesses before him, and neither at Common Law nor under any Statute has he any jurisdiction, in the strict sense of the word, conferred upon him. It follows from that fact that if he accepts a charge from the constable and detains the prisoner, he is acting simply in his capacity of constable though he has, in the Metropolitan Police Force for the purpose of carrying on its work, a particular rank as Inspector or Station Sergeant, which as between himself and other members of the Force of lower rank gives him certain powers of command and supervision.

In our view the position of an inspector or station sergeant before whom a constable prefers a charge against a prisoner at the station house may be thus stated. He has no jurisdiction to try the case, and ought not to assume any of the functions of the Magistrate, or of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. He has a discretion vested in him as constable whether he will detain the prisoner at the station house or not. That discretion is of an executive character. If, after hearing the statement of the constable preferring the charge and asking him such questions as he thinks relevant, and after hearing any statement made by the prisoner, and hearing the statements of any witnesses who may accompany the constable or the prisoner to the station, he comes to the conclusion that the allegation made by the constable, if true, affords reasonable ground for believing that an offence has been committed by the prisoner he ought to accept the charge, and having accepted the charge he should enter the particulars on the charge sheet in accordance with the Orders and Regulations, and having read over the charge to the prisoner he should detain him, and thereupon the constable who arrested the prisoner is free to return to his duty.

If, after having taken the course just indicated, the constable in charge of the station comes to the conclusion that there is no reasonable ground for believing that the prisoner has committed an offence for which the arrest can be justified he ought to refuse the charge and take the steps prescribed by the Orders and Regulations.

Upon his refusal of the charge, so far as the constable in charge of the station is concerned, the prisoner is free, and in practice is allowed to depart, though the constable who effected the arrest may proceed against him by information and summons if he thinks fit so to do.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the practice established under the Orders and Regulations which are set forth above as to the proceedings in the charge room is founded upon a correct view of the law.

Bail.

§ 12. If the officer in charge of the station accepts the charge preferred against a prisoner, it is his duty to detain the prisoner until he can be brought before a competent Court of Summary Jurisdiction, unless the offence with which the prisoner is charged is one for which he has power to set the prisoner free upon his giving bail to appear before the Magistrate of the district in which the station house is situate at his next sitting, and bail which is satisfactory in his opinion is forthcoming.

In practice the prisoner is taken to the cells provided at the station house until bail is arranged.

White Book, p. 270.

The Orders and Regulations as to bail which it is necessary for us to set forth are as follows :—

See however Q. 76. Qs. 153–155.

(291) Bail, so far as police purposes are concerned, is the guarantee, under pecuniary liability, to appear, or to produce an accused person to be tried according to law at an appointed time and place. It is of two kinds :—

(a) That admitted by a police officer.

(b) That allowed by Judge or Magistrate.

(292) As to police bail, the inspector or other officer in charge of a police station may under the provisions of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1829 (10 George IV., c. 44, s. 9), and the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 (2 and 3 Vict., c. 47, ss. 70 and 72), admit to bail persons charged with any petty misdemeanour, for which they are liable to be summarily convicted by a Magistrate—such as drunkenness, disorderly conduct, carelessly doing any hurt or damage, etc., and by Section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict., c. 49), if the person in custody without a warrant cannot be taken before a Magistrate within 24 hours, bail is compulsory for any trifling offence, even a felony not of a serious nature.

(293) Bail is by recognisance, either by the principal alone or with sureties. The amount of the recognisance may be fixed at any sum within the maximum penalty for the offence with which the person is charged, but it must depend on the circumstances of the accused and the nature of the offence. Sureties may be called upon to prove that they are householders by their receipts for rates and taxes, or otherwise show that they are persons of respectability and substance.

(294) As regards the exterior parts of the Metropolitan Police District, it must be borne in mind that if the case is clearly one to be dealt with summarily, then, although the Police would be legally justified in detaining at a station an unbailed offender until the sitting of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, the inconvenience of a lengthened detention at a police station for several days is so great as to make it desirable to get a magisterial remand with a view to the intermediate detention in a prison. (Although the power to bail given by Section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act is to be borne in mind, the practice generally in the Metropolitan Police District will be exercised under 2 and 3 Vict., c. 47, s. 70).

(296) A person charged with drunkenness, coupled with any other offence for which bail may be taken, may, though still apparently drunk, be admitted to bail as in any other case, if the sureties, on bailing such person, undertake to have him or her sent home or properly taken care of until sober.

(297) Persons charged with being found drunk are to be liberated on their own recognisances when sober. In case of default in appearance before the Magistrate application is not to be made to estreat the recognisance; but should the address given be correct, Form 231 L is to be submitted with a view to the issue of a summons against the offender. White Book, p. 271.

(300) If persons in custody for a bailable offence wish to send for bail, and are willing to pay for a messenger or telegram being sent, the officer in charge of the station is to take the necessary steps without delay.

(301) If prisoners have no money, and are desirous of being bailed, the necessary expenses of sending for bail will be allowed by Commissioner, there being no object on the part of the Police in unnecessarily detaining in the cells a prisoner who can be legally liberated on sufficient bail being offered. The Police telegraph is to be used in such cases whenever practicable.

(303) No bail is to be sent for except with the sanction of the inspector or officer in charge of the station, or in charge of the prisoners at the Police Court.

(304) If application is made for bail and not complied with the cause and other particulars of bail being refused are to be entered in the Occurrence Book.

(305) Money or other property is not in any case to be accepted as a deposit in lieu of bail or of the recognisance of the person charged. White Book, p. 272.

(308) The confining in cells is to be avoided as much as possible, and this is to be impressed on all inspectors and sergeants whose duty it may be to take charge of stations.

Cells.

§ 13. Cells are provided at each station house for the reception and detention of prisoners. They form part of the station premises and are under the general control of the officer in charge of the station

Proper Orders and Regulations as to the sanitary condition and cleanliness of the cells, and also as to the care and safe custody of the prisoners in such cells, have been made.

It is unnecessary, however, for our purpose to set forth the Orders and Regulations dealing with the sanitary condition, dimensions, arrangements, etc., of the cells, but having regard to the object of our Inquiry, it seems well to direct attention to the following Orders and Regulations :—

(242) An inspector, or sergeant, on commencing his tour of duty in charge of a police station, is, on each occasion, to receive from the inspector or sergeant whom he relieves a statement of the number of persons then confined; both officers are then, in company, to make a personal inspection of each prisoner. The inspector or sergeant, for his own security, ought to see that the prisoners are in a proper state when he commences his tour of duty. White Book, p. 259.

(243) Prisoners are to be subjected to as little discomfort as possible.

(244) The confining in cells should be avoided as much as possible for trivial offences, and women should never be confined in cells if it can possibly be avoided.

(245) Prisoners are to be visited in the cells at least once every hour, and, if drunk, once every half hour; in the latter case, they are to be spoken to and aroused on each visit.

White Book, 260.

(248) No conversation is to be held in the hearing of prisoners, nor are improper language or taunting remarks to be used towards them.

(249) No conversation is to be allowed between any person in custody and any police officer concerning a charge, or on any other subject. The police constable only, who is appointed to do duty as gaoler is to communicate with the prisoners if necessary, in the presence of the inspector or officer in charge of the station.

(251) Prisoners are to be supplied with clear water to drink, and enamelled iron mugs, in two sizes—pint and quart—are to be kept for this purpose. One basin and two towels are supplied for use of prisoners who may be confined for several hours, and who may desire to wash themselves. Officers in charge of stations are responsible for the proper care and cleanliness of articles supplied for use of prisoners.

(252) Necessary refreshment for prisoners may be purchased out of the money taken from them, provided the charge against them does not relate to the money; the amount expended for refreshment is to be entered in the prisoner's property book. When it is necessary for prisoners to have refreshment, either at their own or the public expense, no beer or spirit is to be given to them or admitted into the cells, but only tea or coffee, with such eatables as are usually given in those cases. When prisoners are provided with refreshment at the cost of the Receiver, the amount is not to exceed 3d. for each meal, except in special cases of destitution. When prisoners receive more than one meal, or other than ordinary refreshment, the cause is to be stated in the proper column of the printed form of voucher. In exterior sub-divisions where necessary refreshment cannot be obtained for less than 4d. for each meal, that amount will be allowed.

(253) No Police officer is to enter any cell in which a female prisoner is confined unless accompanied by the matron, or another Police officer or person whose services are available at the time. Exception to this rule can only be authorised in cases when, no second person being available, it is absolutely necessary to take action and enter the cell, to prevent attempted suicide for instance. When a cell is thus entered by an officer alone, a report of the particulars is to be made.

Searching of Prisoners.

§ 14. In this connection we may refer to the searching of prisoners. We gather from the evidence that it is an almost invariable practice, even in the case of persons arrested for street offences, with which our Inquiry is concerned, to search the prisoners.

The Orders and Regulations upon the point hardly seem to contemplate this practice as necessary in every case, but it must be noticed that in the form of charge sheet, which has to be filled up in every case by the officer taking the charge, there is a column dealing with property found upon the person of the prisoner, and it seems not possible to fill up that column without a search of the prisoner's person.

The General Orders and Regulations, however, simply say:—

(260) Any prisoner may be searched if it be suspected that he has upon his person any deadly weapon, or any article which has been stolen or unlawfully obtained.

(262) Prisoners insensible from illness, drunkenness, or any other cause, or who are drunk and incapable of taking care of themselves, are to be searched, solely for safe custody of their property and its return to them. In taking possession of property for safe custody, regard should be had not merely to the value of the articles, but to their capability of occasioning mischief or injury. For example serious results have followed from drunken persons being left in possession of knives and of lucifer matches.

(263) When prisoners are searched every article taken from them is to be distinctly called out by a Police officer, and the particulars are to be entered on the charge sheet by the officer taking the charge. The amounts of notes, gold, silver, and copper moneys are to be stated separately. The inspector or sergeant will be held responsible for any loss that may happen through neglect or irregularity. If searched before arriving at a police station every article taken from them is to be immediately handed, on arrival at the station, to the officer on duty, who is to enter the particulars on the charge sheet. White Book, p. 262.

(264) When prisoners are searched the searching is to be done so effectually that all instruments, or articles of property, which they ought not to retain, may be taken from them.

(265) Female prisoners charged with any offence for which they should be searched are to be searched by a female appointed for the purpose.

(266) When prisoners are not searched, the officer taking the charge is to advise them to leave in his hands any article or property in their possession, a receipt enumerating each article is to be given to the prisoners, and the property is to be returned when the charge is disposed of. In all such cases an entry is to be made in the Occurrence Book, stating the names of prisoners, the particulars of each article handed to the police, and the number of the charge sheet on which the charge is entered.

We do not find that in regard to prisoners charged with street offences there is any other provision as to their being searched than that just quoted, which applies to cases in which it is suspected that the prisoner has "upon his person a deadly weapon or any article which has been stolen or unlawfully obtained." The evidence that we have taken shows, however, that in cases where there appears to have been no ground at all for suspecting that a prisoner had upon his person any deadly weapon, he is usually searched. We shall return to this matter again.

Occurrence Book.

§ 15. There is kept at each Police Station, under the supervision of the inspector or other officer in charge of the station, a book called the Occurrence Book, in which there are entered the events happening during each day which the Orders and Regulations require to be entered therein.

We do not find that any Regulation has been made giving a general description of the events or occurrences that ought to be entered in this book, but specific orders require that events of certain kinds shall be entered therein. For instance, when a divisional surgeon is called in to examine a prisoner alleged to be drunk he is required to make in the Occurrence Book an entry showing the result of his examination. White Book, p. 99.

So again officers in charge of stations are to enter in the Occurrence Book at the expiration of their tour of duty a list of constables who have been taken from their beats for any purpose, and for however short a time. White Book, p. 557.

So again a report of the particulars respecting accidents or occurrences entered by a constable on duty in his note book is to be made as early as practicable, and is to be entered in the Occurrence Book for information and reference. White Book, p. 16.

These are but examples of the events which ought to be chronicled in the Occurrence Book. The book may be looked upon as a diary of all the principal events which happen at the station or in connection with the work of the Police Station each day

Prosecution of the Charge.

§ 16. We have now dealt with all the Orders and Regulations which govern the conduct of the Police in dealing with the apprehension of prisoners for street offences, and the treatment of the prisoner up to the time at which he has to come before a Police Magistrate or Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The constable who has effected the arrest, it will be noticed, is in general discharged from any concern with the person arrested, or in regard to his appearance before such Magistrate or Court, from the time that the charge against him has been accepted by the inspector or officer in charge of the station, and he has assumed the custody of the prisoner; but it is the duty of the constable who has effected the arrest to prosecute the charge before such Magistrate or Court.

There is in London no officer corresponding to the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland, or who is bound to carry on the proceedings on behalf of the constable who has effected the arrest. The duty of proving the case against the prisoner is cast upon the constable, just as it is upon any informant who has obtained a summons, or who himself has asked for the aid of the Police in arresting a man and then personally charged the prisoner at the Police Station on his own responsibility.

For the discharge of this duty proper provision is made by the Orders and Regulations, and it is the duty of the constable who has effected an arrest to appear before the Magistrate to prove his case against his prisoner. It is his duty in cases where legal aid is not accorded to him to see that the witnesses for the prosecution are in attendance, and if necessary to see that summonses compelling their attendance are issued.

We need not for our purpose go into details as to Police prosecutions, but it seems well to call attention to the Orders and Regulations which have been made as to the conduct of the Police in regard to their duty in court.

The following Orders and Regulations require attention:—

White Book, p. 274.

(314) The Police are to give evidence with the greatest accuracy.

(315) They are habitually to make accurate observation of all matters relating to duty, that they may be able, if required, to state all the circumstances.

(316) Notes of the particulars of any case are to be made at the time by each officer concerned in order that he may refresh his memory if called on to give evidence; such notes, together with any reports that it may be necessary to make in connection with the case, are to be prepared quite independently of any other officer, and without consultation with other witnesses.

This general rule is invariably to be observed in all circumstances in which the Police are required either to take notes or to prepare reports, each officer stating his own version of the case under consideration. The inspector or other officer giving directions for reports to be made will be responsible that this Order is strictly adhered to.

(317) In all cases where the Police arrest any person, charged, accused, or suspected of felony or misdemeanour, and such person before, at the time, or after being taken into custody, makes any statement respecting the charge upon which the arrest takes place, the Police officer shall, as soon after such statement is made as is practicable, put it down in writing. Such writing must be, as nearly as may be, in the very words used by the arrested person who made the statement, and if the statement made was in reply to any question or questions put by any person, then such question or questions, with the replies thereto, shall be put down.

[Note.—The latter paragraph of this Order does not sanction the putting of questions to accused persons after they are in custody.]

(318) Whether the officer who put the statement down is or is not required to make a written report of the case, he shall forthwith deliver to his superior officer an exact copy in his own handwriting of the person's statement, which shall be preserved at the police station where the original charge is entertained, and this copy shall be forthcoming at the trial and previous examination, if required, for inspection by the Court or prisoner's counsel or solicitor, being delivered for the purpose of such production to the care of some other witness than the officer.

(319) Notes should be made in the official note-book as soon as possible after the occurrence or statement, and should be carefully preserved in order that the officer who has made them may be able to refresh his memory by looking at them before his examination as a witness, and, where exactness to a word is important, look at them at the time he is giving evidence in the witness-box. Whether he looks at his notes or not, he should have the note-book with him and readily produce it if the Court or counsel desire to look at it. Copies of the notes should not be taken to the court, as the witness is not permitted to refresh his memory by looking at a copy, whether he has the original notes with him or not. It is to be specially noted that Police are not to produce in evidence copies of reports made by them in connection with any case, but only the original notes. White Book, p. 275

(321) The witness is not to withhold, or alter, or colour his evidence at the trial in any way, from any misapprehension that a different version appears in the signed deposition. Whatever the consequences may be, the whole truth must be spoken.

(322) The greatest care should be exercised in giving evidence at the first hearing of a case, and nothing whatsoever (although it may apparently be of small importance) affecting a charge is to be withheld, as in the event of committal, or on appeal from a summary conviction, any addition to the evidence given in the first instance may invalidate or cause doubts to be raised as to the reliability of the whole of the officer's statement.

(324) The Police are not to suppress or over-state the slightest circumstance with a view to favour any person, or from ill-will to either side. They are to endeavour, as far as possible, to feel indifferent as to the results of cases, and they perform their duty best by stating accurately, and without malice or favour, all the particulars they know. When the Police are sufferers from injuries received, and are giving evidence against those whom they believe to be guilty, it is specially necessary that they should not allow any feelings, or wishes, as to the decision of the case to influence them. Greater weight will always be given to the evidence of the Police, if they state fully, and without passion, all they know, and make it evident that they are speaking the whole truth.

(325) Any constable who wilfully departs from the truth will be immediately dismissed. White Book, p. 276

(326) The Police, when giving evidence at Police Courts and Sessions, are to stand in an upright, respectful manner, speak calmly and explicitly in a clear, distinct, and audible tone so that the court and jury may easily hear them, and they are to confine themselves strictly to evidence in the case before the court. If they are able to give the exact words used, they should do so ; for instance, if a prisoner had said, "I have done wrong," those words should be given, and not that the prisoner said that he had done wrong. They are not to use any low or cant expressions. They are not to refer to any former conviction against the prisoner, unless called upon by the judge or chairman to do so. When cross-examined by counsel for the prisoner they are to answer with the same readiness, and civility, as when giving evidence in support of the charge.

(327) The Police are not to enter into conversation or make statements when before a Magistrate upon any matters, except such as the charge under investigation makes it their duty to mention.

(329) The Inspector or Officer taking a charge, or the particulars of a case for summons, which appears to rest on the evidence of one constable, is always to make inquiry whether there is any other witness, in the police or not, or other corroborative evidence ; and if so, to see that the additional witnesses attend before the Magistrate.

Legal Aid.

§ 17. Closely connected with this matter are the provisions made as to legal aid. In general it may be remarked that Police Constables are not allowed the advantage of appearing by Counsel or Solicitor in Police Courts when they prosecute prisoners for street offences; but the following orders and regulations seem to apply to these as well as to more serious offences:—

White Book, p. 277.

(333) Should circumstances transpire, during the hearing of a case, which render it desirable that the Police should be legally represented, application is to be made for an adjournment for a sufficient period to enable the case to be laid before the Commissioner.

(334) In all cases of legal aid, an Inspector is to take charge of the case, and attend Commissioner's office with the necessary documents.

(336) In the event of legal proceedings being instituted against any member of the Police arising out of circumstances connected with his duty as a Police Officer, a full report of the case is to be submitted for the information of the Commissioner, and no step is to be taken officially for the defence until express authority has been received from the Commissioner. The Commissioner, if of opinion that the question of legal aid may be entertained, will submit the case to the Secretary of State; and the Secretary of State will then decide either that the defence shall be taken up officially and conducted at the cost of the Police Fund by a solicitor acting on behalf of the Commissioner, or that no legal aid is to be given; or, as an intermediate course, he may, leaving to the constable in the first instance to defend himself, reserve his decision until the case is concluded, and then on a review of all the circumstances decide whether any, and if so what, sum shall be allowed from the Police Fund towards reimbursing the constable, the expenses reasonably incurred by him in his defence.

(337) Legal proceedings are not to be taken by Police without the Commissioner's sanction being first obtained.

Orders and Regulations specially applicable to certain Street Offences.

§ 18. We have now dealt with all the general duties of the Police in regard to street offences coming within our Terms of Reference. It remains for us to call attention, however, to some Regulations which specially affect the duties of the Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness and solicitation.

As to cases of drunkenness it is provided:—

White Book, p. 258.

(233) If prisoners are insensible, from drink, or any other cause, or appear to be ill, or injured in any way, although they do not complain, the Divisional Surgeon is to be sent for immediately. This duty is imperative in all cases where a prisoner appears to be ill, whether or not he has been recently under medical or surgical treatment at a hospital or elsewhere.

(234) It is to be thoroughly understood that in all cases in which persons come into the hands of Police, whether as prisoners or in any other manner, and there is any appearance of their being ill, or suffering from injury, or it is known or believed that they have hurt themselves by falling down, while drunk or otherwise, the Divisional or other Surgeon is to be invariably sent for to see them, although they may make no complaint. The Commissioner trusts that there will be no neglect in carrying out this order. He desires that a liberal interpretation may be placed on all orders and regulations with respect to the attendance of Divisional Surgeons in cases of illness, accident, injury, or drunkenness. Each officer who performs station duty is to distinctly understand that he is expected, not only to attend to any complaint of illness or injury that may be made to him by a prisoner or other person in his hands, but to make close personal investigation in each case, and to exercise care and discretion with a view to the surgeon being sent for to attend on such persons, when there is any appearance or suspicion of illness or injury, whether complaint is made or not.

(235) When the interference of Police becomes necessary, a drunken person may be taken into custody and charged at a Police Station, and under no circumstances is a constable to leave his beat to conduct such a person to his home, or elsewhere.

(236) Persons are frequently found insensible in the streets, and as they may be suffering from apoplexy, or other natural causes, the symptoms of which give them very much the appearance of persons under the influence of drink, in all such cases the Police should first try and arouse them by gentle shaking; if that fails, the neckcloth and collar are to be loosened, and the head raised a little, by which means breathing is made easier, and a message is to be sent to the station for the ambulance and further assistance.

(237) The Police are strictly cautioned to be very careful in conveying persons apparently drunk or insensible to the Stations; when a person in this condition is conveyed on the ambulance, or placed in the cell, the head is to be kept slightly raised by a canvas pillow.

It will be noticed that these orders, so far as they affect drunkenness, or illness caused by alcoholic indulgence, only apply to cases in which the prisoners are so drunk as to be insensible, or appear to be really ill. They do not appear to apply to ordinary cases of drunkenness where, apart from the symptoms produced by drink, the prisoner appears to be healthy and uninjured. It appears from the evidence before us, however, to have become the practice to summon the Divisional Surgeon to the station in cases in which the prisoner denies that he is drunk, in order to make an examination, and for the Divisional Surgeon to make such an examination if the prisoner does not object.

Such a practice seems to be simply an extension of the liberty afforded to a prisoner, who on being charged with drunkenness denies the charge, to send for any medical practitioner whom he may name and whose address he gives, but we do not find any express sanction for the practice in the Orders and Regulations, nor that any obligation is cast upon the Divisional Surgeon to make an examination in such cases.

Primarily the duties of the Divisional Surgeons are to act as advisers and attendants upon members of the Force, and their compliance with a request made by the Inspector or officer in charge of the Station to attend there for the purpose of examining persons and to decide the question whether they are drunk or not, or whether they are fit to be detained seems technically to be merely voluntary and not a duty imposed upon them by virtue of their office.

As to Prostitutes it is provided :—

(84) Prostitutes cannot legally be taken into custody simply because they are prostitutes; to justify their apprehension they must commit some distinct act which is an offence against the law. White Book, pp. 338–9

(85) . . . . In a prosecution under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 54 (s.s. xi.), there must be some evidence sufficient to satisfy the Magistrate that the woman is a prostitute. Next, there must be evidence as to the actions of the woman showing that she was loitering in a thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation. And lastly, there must be evidence that her action was to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers. In the first instance the woman should be cautioned by the police on duty, and told to move on, and conduct herself properly. Should she refuse and persist in misconducting herself, she should be taken into custody and charged with such offence as she may be guilty of, provided some inhabitant or passenger will attend at the police station and testify that he has been annoyed, or the constable himself has witnessed conduct by the woman which was evidently an annoyance to inhabitants or passengers.

(86). Care is to be taken that the duty of dealing with prostitutes in the streets is entrusted to experienced and trustworthy men, who can be relied on to use discretion, and at the same time prevent disorder and annoyance to passers-by.

(87). The police have no power to interfere with men and women talking together in the street, so long as they behave themselves properly, and are not assembled together in such numbers as actually to cause obstruction of the thoroughfares; but if it is absolutey necessary to interfere, it is then to be done civilly and firmly.

Gratuities.

§ 19. Having regard to the allegation of bribery made in some of the communications to us, or suggested in the course of evidence before us, it is necessary to point out the strictness of the Orders and Regulations upon the subject of gratuities, and it is expedient to quote the following rules upon the subject :—

White Book, p. 29.

(32) No gratuity is to be retained by any of the Police without the express permission of the Commissioner.

White Book, p. 30.

(33) A gratuity offered at the time, by a person to whom special services are rendered upon any sudden emergency, except in cases enumerated in par. 38, may be taken, subject to the decision of the Commissioner as to its being retained, or returned to the person giving it; in such a case the name and address of the person giving the gratuity is to be procured, the sum received handed over as soon as possible to the Superintendent of the Division, and a report of the circumstances is to be submitted to the Superintendent for the Commissioner's decision.

(34) The Superintendents, before they forward to the Commissioner their recommendations that gratuities should be allowed, are to make such inquiry as to satisfy themselves that no solicitations, direct or indirect, have been made to the persons by whom the gratuities are given, and if there is reason to suppose that solicitation has been made, or that there are any other circumstances which make it improper for the gratuities to be received, the particulars are to be reported to the Commissioner. Whenever practicable the giver of a gratuity not dealt with under par. 36 (which deals with gratuities from public departments) should be requested to send it to the Station, when the officer on duty is, immediately a gratuity is received from any source, to forward to the donor an official receipt from the authorized Receipt Book, and make an entry in the Occurrence Book to that effect.

(35) When a Chief Inspector is in charge of a Division he is not to receive gratuities for the performance of duties as an Inspector; but at all other times he may, at the discretion of the Superintendent, perform such duties, and be recommended for gratuities the same as the Inspectors.

(38) Police are not permitted to receive gratuities :—

(a) For any service in connection with political meetings.

(b) When given as conduct money with subpœnas in any cases arising under the Licensing Acts, or if given by the Licensed Victuallers Trade Protection Society, or any other person, for services rendered by the Police in the execution of their duty in connection with licensed premises.

(c) With subpœnas to attend courts and give evidence against brothel-keepers nor for any service in connection with the prosecution of such offenders.

(d) For restoring stray dogs, taking stray cattle to greenyards, &c.

(e) Discovering or assisting at fires.

(f) Giving evidence in any case of dust improperly removed without the authority of the contractor, &c.

(g) For calling persons up in the morning.

(h) For preserving order on the occasion of elections, which service is to be performed as a tour of duty.

(i) For general attention shown in the service of summonses and execution of warrants.

White Book, p. 31.

(39) Gifts of meat, spirits, &c., to the constables of a Division, who dine together annually at Christmas, are, like any other gift or gratuity, not to be accepted, unless reported in the usual way to the Superintendent and sanctioned by the Commissioner.

(40) The police are not, in any instance, to ask for a Christmas box from anyone; if any money is offered to them as a Christmas box they must report the circumstances to their superior officer, who will, if it is a proper case, ask permission from the Commissioner for it to be received.

(42) All gratuities received by police of interior divisions, and by those attached to town stations of exterior Divisions, are to be handed to the Superintendent, pending the approval of Commissioner, and in the exterior sub-divisions they are to be held by an Inspector to be nominated by the Superintendent In no case is a gratuity to be left in the hands of any other officer.

General Directions to Constables

§ 20. We have now set forth as clearly as we can what the strictly legal duties imposed upon the members of the Force are. Their proper discharge involves the exercise of the special executive powers with which they are invested by law for the purpose of attaining the general object for which this department of the Government was established.

In order that a police force may be really efficient, and that the police system may work well, it is necessary that the special executive powers given to constables should not only be exercised with strict regard to the law but that they should be exercised with vigilance, with tact, and with reasonable regard to avoiding unnecessary offence to the person immediately affected by police action as well as to those who may be indirectly concerned as friends or relatives of the prisoners.

The range of duty imposed upon members of the Force as to the out of door life of the inhabitants of London and those using the streets and public places is so extensive, and the powers corresponding to those duties and exercisable for their performance are so great that they limit in almost every direction the freedom of action of every person residing permanently or temporarily in the Metropolis. It is, therefore, extremely important, especially in dealing with a people in which the sentiment of liberty is so engrained and intolerance of authority so marked, as is the case in this country, that executive powers should be used in as wise and as gentle a manner as is consistent with the maintenance of public order.

Accordingly the Orders and Regulations made by the Commissioner recognise the necessity of caution, in the exercise of police powers; and directions are given to constables as to their behaviour, which it is worth while to quote, as we shall find it necessary, in dealing with the complaints as to and criticisms made upon the manner in which the police deal with the street offences coming within our Terms of Reference, to comment upon them.

The following directions contained in the White Book are worthy of particular attention :—

(61) A constable must readily and strictly obey the orders of the superior officers in rank in the Police. White Book, p. 13.

(62) He must be very civil and respectful in his demeanour and conduct to the public, giving the best answers he can to the numerous questions which will be put to him, and showing at all times a readiness to do all in his power to oblige, consistently with the rules of the Service.

(63) He is to report to his sergeant or inspector the first time he sees either of them in the street or at the station the particulars of any accident or occurrence which has come under his notice.

(64) He is to speak the truth at all times, and under all circumstances, and, when called upon to give evidence, to state all he knows respecting the case, without fear or reservation and without any desire to influence the result, either for or against the prisoner.

(65) Untruthfulness is the gravest disqualification for the Police Service.

(66) If a constable is called upon to act, he must do so with energy, promptness, and determination, for if he wavers or doubts, the person may escape, or the opportunity to render assistance may be lost.

(67) When called upon to take a person into custody, he must be guided in a great measure by the circumstances of the case and the nature of the charge or offence; but if he has any doubt as to how he ought to act, the safest course is to ask all the persons concerned to go with him to the station, where the inspector will hear and determine whether the charge is to be entered or not, and the responsibility is then taken off the constable.

(68) No constable is to be kept on duty at a police station more than one month continuously without the sanction of the Commissioner having been obtained through the Chief Constable.

(69) The duties of constables are defined under the different heads of the Police Regulations.

Complaints.

§ 21. It is inevitable that in the case of so large a force as the Metropolitan Police Force, concerned in keeping order over so large an area comprising such a vast population as that of the Metropolis, and for that purpose having to discharge multifarious duties, complaints as to alleged misconduct of members of the Force should from time to time be made.

To maintain discipline in so large a force is no easy matter, especially as the Force is one of a civil character, and, accordingly, the procedure appropriate to a military establishment cannot be applied.

The regulations for the maintenance of discipline in the Metropolitan Police Force do not directly concern us, and it seems unnecessary here to explain the system whereby discipline is maintained. We need, therefore, do no more than say that the Orders and Regulations disclose a system well adapted for the purpose of keeping order within the Force, and we pass by the topic of complaints when made by a superior officer against a subordinate in the Force, or by one member of the Force against another.

We must, however, call attention to the manner in which the complaints made by private persons or by Magistrates as to alleged misconduct of members of the Force are dealt with.

In practice complaints are made by private persons either personally or by letter to the officer in charge of the police station or to the Chief Commissioner.

The Orders and Regulations do not deal with such complaints so systematically and completely as we should have expected, though we recognise the difficulty of making absolutely full rules upon the subject, having regard to the different ways in which complaints may be made and the very varying gravity of the accusations which may be brought against members of the Force.

It appears that if a member of the public goes to a Police Station his complaint and any statement that he makes in reference to an alleged breach of duty or want of civility or attention on the part of a constable is to be attended to by the officer in charge, and if necessary such officer is to report the matter to the Superintendent of the Division.

If a complaint is made to the Chief Commissioner it is dealt with at the Central Office and a report is called for through the officers of the Division to which the constable against whom the complaint is made belongs.

The following are the principal Orders and Regulations upon the subject :—

White Book, p. 33.

(56) Complaints against police officers by private persons are, if possible, to be made and recorded in the presence of the accused officer, who will then have an opportunity of questioning the witnesses if he desires.

(57) The statements made by the complainants and witnesses are to be reduced to writing by the police officer dealing with the case, and the persons complaining are to be required to sign their statements.

(58) Any questions the accused may wish to put to witnesses are to be put through the officer conducting the inquiry, and, with the answers thereto, are to be taken down.

(59) When the complainants or the witnesses cannot attend at the Police Station, their statements must be made or taken down in writing at their residence, or elsewhere, by the officer charged with the inquiry.

(60) The accused officer is to submit his reply to any complaint in writing, and any verbal statements made by him in reply to questions, or in addition to his written statement, are to be taken down and submitted.

With regard to comments made by Magistrates as to the conduct of the Police engaged in any matter before them the following are the Orders and Regulations :—

(13) If a Magistrate wishes to communicate through the Police to the Commissioner on any subject, he is to be requested to do so in writing. White Book, p. 302.

(16) An Inspector is always to be present at every Police Court for the better regulation of the Police who attend, and to see that no waste of time takes place on their part ; also to mark up the cards of attendance of the officers engaged, and to report any misconduct on the part of the Police, or any remarks by the Magistrate affecting them. The Inspectors will be supplied from the Division in which Police Courts are situated. Inspectors employed on this duty are to be changed weekly.

(17) When a Magistrate makes any remarks with reference to Police matters, or to matters interesting to the Police, the Inspector on duty at the Court is to show his report, giving particulars of the same, to the Magistrate's Clerk for verification, before it is submitted to the Commissioner.

With regard to reports called for by the Chief Commissioner, it is provided that all reports sent to the Commissioner's office are to be made on certain forms which are supplied and it is the duty of every constable to make and write out a report as to any case or occurrence when instructed to do so by his superior officer ; and it is contemplated that each constable shall make an independent report without consultation with other members of the Force. In this connection it may be mentioned that a note book is supplied to every constable in which it is his duty to enter particulars respecting accidents or occurrences happening while he is on duty.

The Order upon this point is as follows :— White Book, p. 16.

(90) In order to enable each officer to speak with confidence, and prevent the possibility of his evidence being shaken, a pocket book in leather case is provided, in which he is to enter at the time dates and other particulars respecting accidents or occurrences, and to which he can always refer. A report of such particulars is to be made as early as practicable, and will be entered in the Occurrence Book for information and reference. The Station Officer who makes this entry will be held responsible that it agrees with the particulars shown in the pocket book, which he will initial. The pocket books will be replaced from time to time as they become filled with entries, and a supply is to be kept ready for use at each Police Station, care being taken that they are properly paged before issue, after which the leaves are not to be torn out for any purpose, but each officer will provide himself with a supply of loose slips of paper for use in the streets when giving names and addresses, &c.

The pocket books are to be produced for inspection by constables when parading for duty, and when full they are retained in the station for reference.

PART II.

THE MANNER IN WHICH THE METROPOLITAN POLICE DEAL WITH CASES OF DRUNKENNESS, DISORDER, AND SOLICITATION IN THE STREETS.

I.—Introductory Observations.

§ 1. Having reported upon the duties of the Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets to the best of our ability, and as fully as we deem necessary for the proper fulfilment of our task, we proceed to consider the manner in which the Police discharge those duties, or, what comes to the same thing, the manner in which the Police exercise their powers in regard to these three classes of street offences.

We have explained above the interpretation we place upon this head of inquiry. We conceive that what we are asked to do is to report upon the general question whether the Police as a rule exercise their powers as to these three offences with as high a degree of propriety and efficiency as the community have a right to expect, and as is reasonably possible with a view to the realisation of the aims for the attainment of which the Force was established and is maintained.

We have found it by no means easy to decide the method according to which we should answer the question or should inquire into and report upon the matter.

The first difficulty was caused by the limitation of the question to the manner in which the Police deal with certain specific kinds of offences, while the powers and duties of the Police as to those special kinds of offences are practically identical with those they possess and are obliged to perform with regard to many other kinds of crimes and misdemeanours, so that it is by no means easy to separate our special problem from the much larger one, whether the duties of the Police are as a whole properly and efficiently discharged.

We were also to some extent embarrassed by the generality of the question. The terms of reference afforded us no indication as to the respects in which it was or might be alleged that the Police habitually fail to exercise their powers properly and efficiently, or as to the standard by which we ought to test the conduct of the Police in exercising the powers with which they are invested for the prevention, detection and punishment of these street offences. A very large discretion was therefore given to us as to the range and character of our Inquiry, so that while, on the one hand, objection cannot well be taken to our action on the ground that we have travelled beyond the contemplated scope of the investigation; on the other hand, the by no means easy task was thrown upon us of limiting an Inquiry which might easily have become one of indefinite length and prolonged for an unduly long period.

Under these circumstances, two main considerations weighed with us in determining the course that we should take.

First, we felt that the Inquiry was not one which ought to be unduly prolonged, as the continuance of our activity might justly lead to an uneasy feeling on the part of members of the Force which might discourage them in the performance of their duty of keeping order in the streets, since that duty can only be properly performed by zealous and vigilant action continued from day to day with the knowledge that their conduct will meet with the approbation of law-abiding members of society.

Secondly, we felt that if we took the matter into our own hands in an entirely arbitrary fashion, and refused to listen to complaints simply because we thought them trivial or little likely to be well-founded from our own experience and knowledge of the conduct of the Police and of the proceedings in the Metropolitan Police Courts, the consequence would be that those whose confidence in the general integrity of the Police is shaken, might not wholly without reason, be dissatisfied with our Report.

We, therefore, thought it was our duty to afford every person in the Metropolis who conceived that he had substantial grounds for complaining of the action of individual Officers or Constables a reasonable opportunity of coming before us and having the matter inquired into, if facts were laid before us, which amounted to a prima facie case of misconduct on the part of the Police.

We believe that the course which we have taken, and which has been set forth in our preliminary observations, justifies us in saying that every person who had up to the end of the year 1906 any ground for complaining of the action of the Police in dealing with the three classes of street offence coming within the terms of our Inquiry during recent years has had a reasonable opportunity of coming before us and being heard.

The full significance of this proposition will appear more clearly when we consider the results of our inquiries into the specific complaints, and into the effect of the general evidence which we have taken.

The consideration of the communications which we have received, and of the complaints which we have investigated, now enables us to form an accurate notion as to the character of the misconduct, whether arising from mere error of judgment or from wilful or reckless misbehaviour, of which, according to some of the suggestions which have been made to us, many of the members of the Force are often or even habitually guilty.

We find that in the great majority of cases, when the complaint is analysed, the misconduct alleged relates to one or more of the following stages in the regular process of the exercise by the Police of their powers. First, the fact of arrest itself as being unjustified; secondly, the manner in which the prisoner is apprehended and his treatment on the way to the station; thirdly, the proceedings in the charge-room; fourthly, the prisoner's treatment at the station; fifthly, the conduct by the Police of the case at the Police Court.

It is in regard to the first of these matters, the fact of arrest, that the greater number of complaints is made, and as to which, in case misconduct is alleged, public interest is most vividly aroused. That is naturally the case, because the security of every person using the streets is threatened if a Police Force habitually abuses or exercises without justification the power of summary arrest, whereas improper conduct in the treatment of prisoners or impropriety in the charge-room is only brought home to the limited class of persons who have had actual experience of arrest and its consequences; yet, from the point of view of one concerned in maintaining the thorough efficiency of the Force, scrupulous regard to the law and to the Orders and Regulations on the part of all Constables, in regard to the treatment of prisoners and to the conduct of prosecutions in the Police Courts, is of an importance quite equal to the question whether a particular arrest was or was not justified. Accordingly, in inquiring into the specific complaints, and in arriving at our conclusions upon them, we have in every case carefully considered not simply the question whether the Constable was right in intervening and arresting the complainant, but whether he conducted himself through all the stages of the case in the manner pointed out and required by the Police Orders and Regulations. So, also, in taking the general evidence which we have before us, we have carefully borne in mind the necessity of satisfying ourselves as to the conduct of the Police in regard to the details of their action in performing their functions.

This being so, we are able to put to ourselves the question submitted to us in such a concrete form as to enable us to answer it in a practical manner and as confidently as the difficulty of the problem allows. The more concrete question is: Is there any reason for believing that the Police in general exercise their powers as to these street offences wrongly, either by unjustifiable arrest, or by breach of duty in regard to the prisoners at any subsequent stages of the proceedings against their prisoners?

In endeavouring to answer this question we naturally ask ourselves: How ought the Police to exercise these powers? What are the tests as to the propriety of Police action in this regard which ought to be applied? and What qualities may the Government and the community concerned expect the Police to display in the execution of these duties?

First of all, every Constable ought to act lawfully; that is to say, he ought to take the utmost possible care not to use his powers in a manner which involves any breach of the law of the land. This is, of course, only a statement of the primary and absolutely essential obligation of a Constable. But secondly there are other obligations connected with the manner in which he should exercise his powers imposed upon him by virtue of his office which though of less importance, ought still to be discharged, if he is to be deemed a thoroughly efficient member of the Force. He ought to exercise his powers honestly, that is to say, without being biassed by pecuniary reward, corruptly given, or by considerations of personal interest such as the hope of promotion. He ought also to do so with discretion, that is to say, he ought to bear in mind that these street offences are for the most part created by statutory provisions, which are intentionally worded in such a form as to give a wide and almost paternal power to the Magistrate ; and, bearing that fact in mind, he ought to be careful not to interfere and arrest an offender unless the interests of public order make that course necessary. Further, he ought to exercise his powers humanely, that is to say, he ought to be as gentle as possible in dealing with prisoners and those connected with them. Lastly, his manner should be courteous, that is to say, he ought not to behave in an overbearing and unnecessarily offensive manner towards an offender or towards persons who may be witnesses of the arrest or subsequent proceedings. These are the principal obligations of a secondary character which are imposed upon the Force, and it should be observed that the Police Orders and Regulations in effect impose them upon the officers and members of the Force.

It is obvious from this description of what is expected of a Metropolitan Police Constable in the exercise of his duty that the standard of efficiency is high. The proper performance of his duties postulates the possession of very considerable intelligence and moral qualities of a high order.

But for efficiency as a Constable, a man requires something more than mental capacity and good moral character. He ought to possess the physical advantages of stature and strength above those of the average members of the community. To these must be added general good health, for without it he cannot stand the strain of duties to be performed in the open air at all hours of the day and night and at all seasons of the year and retain proper command of his faculties and sobriety of judgment during long hours of duty. It is clear that unless a man is physically stronger than the ordinary individual he cannot be a thoroughly efficient Constable for a long time. When one reads in the Instruction Book the discipline to which members of the Force have to conform one cannot help realising that it either presupposes in recruits or creates in Constables a condition of mental and physical strength and health of a degree greater than that possessed by average workers in this country.

The more one reflects on the character and the extent of a Constable's duties, and the conditions under which they have to be exercised, the more one feels that in order to make a man a really efficient Constable a somewhat rare combination of mental and physical powers, which can only be found in a comparatively small percentage of the total male population of the country, is required. The higher the standard of efficiency, or the greater the demand made upon the capacity of the individual, the more difficult it is to fill the places in the strength of the Establishment made by resignation, dismissal or death, with fit recruits, and the greater the chance that an accepted candidate may turn out to be not adequately competent for his work. The larger the demand of the Community, the more critical it is in regard to Police methods and action, the more impatient it becomes of any blunder made by an individual member of the Force, the higher must be the tests upon candidates for the service and the more difficult must become the task of securing fit recruits. Whether the standard of efficiency and conduct applied to members of the Force be high or low, it is, however, impossible to ensure that every individual in an Establishment of 17,000 men can always habitually satisfy, and always act up to it, or that no one should ever be guilty of any misconduct. To expect anything of the sort would be to expect a perfection, which experience shows it is impossible to reach in regard to any aggregate of men, whether organised for military or industrial or any other purposes. Having regard to the infirmities of mankind, the complex conditions of modern life, the multiplicity of duties cast upon the Police, and the discretionary character of the work they have to perform, the utmost that can be expected, in regard to any Police Force, is that the number of inefficient men in the Force at any time, and the number of cases of misconduct, whether due to accident or mistake, or wilful wrong doing, should be so small as not to damage to any appreciable extent, the efficiency of the Establishment as a whole.

This appears to us to be a clear and reasonable statement of the degree and kind of efficiency that the Government and the Community, whose servants the Police are, have a right to expect in the Metropolitan Police Force; and impressed with these considerations we approach the task of reporting upon the questions submitted to us, so far as the materials at our disposal enable us to come to a conclusion.

We have now taken all the evidence and collected all the data or materials which, without undue delay, we have been able to obtain, and which we deem sufficient to enable us to report upon the matters into which we have been commanded to inquire.

Before stating what these data or materials are, and the conclusions at which we have arrived by analysing, examining, and considering them, we think it right to make some general observations or reflections which occur to us as things which ought to be borne in mind by those who may think fit to examine for themselves the facts disclosed by our Report.

Difficulties of a Constable's Work.

§ 2. No one can read the Instruction Book issued to members of the Metropolitan Police Force with care without becoming impressed with the fact that the work of superintendence and general direction discharged by the Chief Commissioner and his subordinate officers is extremely arduous and responsible, and requires great administrative ability, and sound judgment, and the possession of those indefinable qualities which are naturally involved in the power to command. But he will be still more impressed by the fact that the share of the work thrown upon individual Constables is larger and more difficult of performance than that usually allotted to units in a body of men organised for the attainment of practical ends.

Broadly speaking, the Force acts by, and through, individual Constables. An army, for the most part, does its work through groups of its units, through divisions, brigades, regiments and companies, and the responsibility of a private soldier is, in practice, reduced to such a point that he becomes little more than an automatic part of a machine. So, even in a great industrial organisation, the individual worker is allowed little or no freedom of action as to his work, and its performance, as a rule, does not involve much thinking on the part of the individual operative. The position of a constable in a police force differs greatly from that of the private soldier or the artisan. A Constable is, as a general rule, placed alone, to perform his duty on one or more beats or patrols. It is expected that, in general, he should not call any other Constable to his assistance, because that involves a disturbance of the arrangements made for the safety of the whole area. It is presumed that if intervention is necessary he can deal with the emergency adequately by his own unaided action, and if he arrests a prisoner he is expected to take him alone to the police-station. However difficult and novel may be the circumstances which confront him in the course of his ordinary duties, he has, unless the matter brooks delay, to decide instantly, and on his own responsibility, whether they call or not for his interference. It follows that a great deal of the most difficult work of the Force is left to the initiative and capacity of the humblest unit in each Division; and this is especially true as to Police action in reference to the classes of offence with which we are concerned.

The Responsibility of the Individual Constable.

§ 3. It appears, therefore, to us that in criticising and passing judgment on the efficiency of the Metropolitan Police Force, it is only fair to bear in mind the following considerations:—

First, that the proper performance of the greater part of police work depends upon the skill, integrity, and general capacity of individual men, who have, upon the spur of the moment, to exercise a discretion on matters of difficulty, and to act promptly and decisively, with but little time for reflection. For the blunder or misconduct of an individual on any given occasion, the whole Force, or, at any rate, those who are at his head, are properly enough held responsible in public opinion; but, in endeavouring to appraise the efficiency of the Force as a whole, great allowance ought to be made for the special difficulty of the task imposed upon the individuals composing it, and therefore for failures due to no want of care or forethought but to the infirmities of human nature.

Subordination of the Constable.

§ 4. Secondly, not only is the work of the individual Constable of a specially difficult and responsible character, because of the extent of the discretion permitted to, and the confidence resposed in, him, but the difficulty is, in some respects, increased by the fact that he is a very subordinate member of an organised Force. Though so much is left to his discretion, yet, he is not simply the strong and capable citizen patrolling the streets permitted to exercise his powers as seems good to him, but he is a member of an organised and severely disciplined force. He is subject, as to nearly every action that he performs, not only to the general Orders and Regulations in the Instruction Book, but to the orders of his immediate superiors with whom he comes in contact while on duty, whether he approves or not of the commands which they may give. It thus comes about that at a critical moment, when he is carrying out what he rightly believes to be his duty, he may be interfered with by those in authority, and that interference, though it relieves him from further responsibility as matter of discipline, yet does not relieve him from liability towards those who may conceive themselves to have been aggrieved by his original intervention, and in some cases may tend to compromise him in the event of any complaint being made by such persons.

In making this observation we are not, of course, forgetful of the fact that his being a member of an organised and carefully disposed body of men is a factor of the greatest importance in enabling him to perform his duty. It is, of course, the knowledge that he has only to blow his whistle to bring to his assistance on any critical occasion an adequate number of his comrades that gives him confidence in his ability to discharge his duty, and it is the knowledge possessed by all observers that this is the case which invests him in their eyes, whether law-abiding citizens or not, with that dominating authority which enables him to act freely and effectively. Still, one ought, in criticising the action of a Constable, always to bear in mind that he is, to some extent, hampered by the rules of a rigid discipline.

Danger of Constables' Occupation.

§ 5. Thirdly, it must never be forgotten that a Policeman's business is a dangerous occupation. It is dangerous, first, because it involves exposure at all hours of the day and night, and all seasons of the year, in the open air, and, secondly, because it involves actual physical conflict with offenders.

It is worth while, in order that the extent of the danger involved in Police work may be appreciated, to submit some statistics for the year 1906.

Statistics as to Diseases arising from Exposure in 1906.

Exposure to inclement weather is not, of course, an incident confined to work in the Police Force, but we are not aware of any other occupation on land in which any considerable number of persons is employed, in which exposure during the night is so continuous throughout the year, and so prolonged on each turn or shift of duty, as in the case of Constables, except perhaps some branches of railway service. The result is that certain diseases become prevalent among Constables, and have to be reckoned with in estimating the number of men required in the Force, in order that the Police arrangements may be properly carried out. These diseases, according to the Report of the Chief Surgeon (Mr. Clinton Dent) in 1906, which we may take as a fairly typical year, are rheumatism (chronic and muscular), catarrh, bronchitis and tonsilitis.

THE FOLLOWING IS A TABLE SHOWING THE TOTAL NUMBER OF POLICE ON THE SICK-LIST ON ACCOUNT OF DISEASES OF EXPOSURE IN 1906 :—

Disease.	Half-year ending June.	Half-year ending December.
Rheumatism (Chronic and Muscular)	568	492
Catarrh	1,323	1,121
Bronchitis	131	132
Tonsilitis	234	246
Totals	2,256	1,991

STATISTICS AS TO NUMBER OF MEN INJURED.

Mr. Clinton Dent, who was good enough to give evidence before us, submitted a return showing the number of Police injured whilst in the execution of their duty during the four years 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, compiled from figures taken from the Commissioner's Reports for the first three of these years, and from material collected at the Commissioner's office in anticipation of the publication of the Report for 1906.

THE FOLLOWING IS A COPY OF THE RETURN:—

Return of the Number of Police injured whilst in the execution of their duty during the years 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906.

Upon these figures Mr. Clinton Dent observed that they showed :—

"That approximately 16 to 17 per cent. of the whole Force (a little less than one-sixth) are injured annually in the execution of their duty." Q. 48338.

Mr. Clinton Dent also pointed out that the figures showed :—

"That a remarkably small number of persons are wholly incapacitated from injuries. It will be noticed in the last column on the right of the Return that the number of officers actually placed on the sick-list for injuries is not large ; for example, in 1904 out of 2,807 Police who were injured in the execution of their duty, 109 were on the sick-list for less than seven days, 277 were on the sick-list for seven days or over, 9 were incapacitated for further service from injuries received, and 2,421 were not placed on the sick-list at all. I presume that those figures are gathered from Reports, for a Constable is bound to report any injury, however trivial, at the station. Reports are sent in, and I presume that the figures are arrived at in that way. The figures for 1903, 1904, and 1905 approximate very close indeed, and the figures for 1906 show that there is a diminution of, roughly, 500 on the total. The average, taken over four years, works out to 2,611. Then, taking the figures for 1904 as a fair sample, of the 2,807 men injured, 1,754 were injured, in making arrests, by drunken prisoners, and 982 by other prisoners." Q. 48341.

Mr. Clinton Dent also made the following comment, with which we see no reason to disagree :—

"Figures like these appear to me to give a very imperfect measure of the effective loss, and for this reason : The duties of a Police Constable require him, of course, to be thoroughly sound in body, and thoroughly stable as regards his nervous system, putting it in not too technical medical language. In that respect a Police Constable is particularly prone to break down as the result of injury. If a Police Officer has been seriously assaulted in the execution of his duty, even although the physical injuries may be apparently trivial, his value as an efficient Constable, save in exceptional cases, is likely to be diminished ; he will not, in other words, be likely to take such risks as he would have if he had never been assaulted in the execution of his duty, and, to use an ordinary phrase, he is a little more nervous about doing it. I think one can understand that that would be the case. Broadly speaking, a Constable is usually worn out as regards the efficient performance of his duties at the age of forty-five ; and if he has met with injuries sustained under trying conditions, and especially with those sustained in the execution of his duty, he is liable to break down earlier in life. If I may explain what I mean by 'trying conditions,' it is practically this : A small injury received by a man who falls, say, from a great height, so to speak, may do a man more harm than more extensive injury ; for instance, a man might fall from a very great height, and he might receive very few injuries except a few bruises ; another man might slip off the kerb and break his leg and receive a greater injury than a few bruises, but the man who has fallen from a great height will not get well like the other man, and he will be much more likely to be permanently affected. In the case of the police that applies especially. However willing, keen and courageous an officer may be, he is not, save in exceptional cases, quite as efficient after an injury as he was before. Initiative is more likely to be lacking, and the sense of responsibility will weigh on him a little more heavily. To a certain extent, therefore, the public suffer as his efficiency as a Constable diminishes. Of men temporarily pensioned, perhaps half are content with the pension they have earned, and have little desire to rejoin the service, but fully one-half are anxious to rejoin. They are very seldom fit to do so. With regard to temporary pension, if a man has been seriously injured, and his illness is likely to go on for, say, a year, or something of that kind, if he has been injured in the execution of his duty he is recommended for a temporary pension, which, I think, is at the rate of full pay. I certify that there is a reasonable prospect of his being able to rejoin. If he does rejoin, he rejoins in the ordinary way ; if he does not rejoin, his pension is modified accordingly. I have to send in a special report with regard to any man who is on the sick-list for six months to the Home Office. I do not know whether I might mention to the Commission, just very briefly, one or two very typical cases of the results of these injuries. The first is that of a man who had had twenty years' service. He was patrolling a northern beat in the neighbourhood of, I think, Caledonian Road, and he was set upon by three men and a woman and injured. His truncheon was wrested from him, and he was struck several blows on his head with the truncheon. I saw the man myself not very long after the accident. I desire to mention that case because he was a most admirable Constable, as I was given to believe, and a man who was extremely anxious to continue his work in the Force. However, I advised him not to rejoin for some months. He was put on a temporary pension. He was injured in January, 1906, and he rejoined in October of that year. I confess I felt nervous as to the effect of his rejoining, but he was very anxious to do so. In one month he had broken down again altogether ; he was sleepless, irritable, nervous and useless, and he had to be again returned as unfit for service. . . . A still more typical case was that of a man who had no head injury at all, but he had two of his fingers chopped off by somebody whom he was endeavouring to arrest. That man was very anxious to rejoin and rejoined, and he broke down ; he had fits, and his mind was completely gone. . . . Those are severe cases, and in a milder degree the same sort of effect is likely to happen as the result of a smaller injury." Q. 48342.

Special Conditions of London.

§ 6. Fourthly, the special conditions of London, in the broad sense, as the Metropolis of the United Kingdom as well as the greatest city in the world, present some special difficulties in regard to Police work.

The area entrusted to the Metropolitan Police is exceptionally large in extent for an Urban Police District. The population inhabiting it, and using its streets, is vast in point of numbers, and is, in the inner divisions, dense, and, in some places, congested. Though the great majority of the persons composing this population are of British origin, and may be deemed permanent residents, yet, as compared with the other great cities of the Kingdom, it contains an unusually large proportion of foreigners, and of persons who have come to live there temporarily, or, at any rate, with no intention of becoming domiciled within its boundaries.

London, too, it should be observed, is not simply the Metropolis of the United Kingdom: it is the social and political centre of a world-wide Empire. It is also a great sea-port; within it numerous and varied manufacturing and industrial concerns have been established and are carried on, while it is a commercial market in which the volume of trade may be properly described as immense; it is the resort of pleasure-seekers from all parts of the world; and it is the safest refuge for political offenders, criminals, and undesirable men and women fleeing from persecution or punishment from all countries.

Without making any aspersion upon the character of the foreign and temporary inhabitants of London as a whole, it must be pointed out that it is certain individuals and classes among them who are least conducive to the general good behaviour of the community, who most frequent certain of its streets and public places, and cause the greatest anxiety to those responsible for its good government. It is, of course, upon the Criminal Investigation Department that the burden of dealing with the added difficulty created by this element in the population mainly falls; yet the evidence before us warrants us in believing that its existence appreciably adds to the difficulty of ordinary Police Officers and Constables in the discharge of their duty as to those street offences, which form the subject of our Inquiry.

We wish it to be thoroughly understood that we are not suggesting that the existence of these special difficulties in London affords any excuse at all for wilful misconduct on the part of any member of the Force. We mention them simply as matters that ought to be considered by every fair-minded person who wishes to arrive at a just conclusion in reference to the question whether the Metropolitan Police, as a whole, deal with the prevention and punishment of these street offences rightly or efficiently, or tries to determine the extent to which a particular member of the Force is to be blamed for any mistake that he may make in exercising the special powers with which he is invested.

Arrangement of Materials.

§ 7. We propose to arrange and set forth the materials before us, for coming to a conclusion on the matters referred to us, into two divisions as follows:—

Division I.—A Summary of the general evidence we have taken as to the manner in which the Police deal with the three classes of street offences coming within our Terms of Reference.

Division II.—Certain general statistical information as to these three classes of offences.

DIVISION I.

GENERAL EVIDENCE.

Introductory.

§ 1. We proceed to deal with the general evidence which we have taken as to the manner in which the Police deal with the three classes of cases coming within our Terms of Reference.

At our first sitting we announced that we were anxious to have the fullest information concerning the matters coming within the scope of the Inquiry, and that we should be glad if any persons wishing to give evidence before us, or to supply us with information, would communicate with the Secretary.

Except persons who have come forward to make complaints as to the conduct of particular officers and constables in regard to cases in which they themselves were concerned, no person who wished to give general evidence criticising the action of the Police except Mr. James Timewell came forward. This gentleman is, as is stated above, the Secretary of a Society called the Police and Public Vigilance Society. Soon after the appointment of the Commission he saw the Secretary, and explained his position, and said that he had a considerable number of cases which he wished us to inquire into, and indicated that he himself was prepared to give evidence.

Neither the London County Council nor the councils of any of the recently created Metropolitan boroughs approached us. We infer from this that these bodies, who represent the ratepayers, by whose contributions the Metropolitan Police Fund is sustained, have no reason to complain of any want of efficiency in the manner in which the Police discharge their duties in keeping order in the streets.

We considered the question whether we ought to invite any of the officers of the London County Council, or any of the municipal officers to appear before us, but as it did not appear to us prima facie likely that they would have any special knowledge of the manner in which the Police deal with the particular classes of offence with which we are concerned, for the relations between the Metropolitan Police Force and the local authorities are different from those which exist between the ordinary County and Borough Constabulary and the Standing Joint Committees and Watch Committees in the country, and as the Terms of our Reference precluded us from inquiring into the conduct of the Police in regard to places of public entertainment, theatres, houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and so forth, we decided that it was unnecessary to trouble any representatives of these authorities to give evidence.

Evidence of the Police Magistrates.

§ 2. We thought, however, that the opinion of the Magistrates upon the question of the general efficiency of Police methods in dealing with these street offences, and particularly in effecting arrests and taking the consequential steps in these cases, would be of the utmost value. The action of the Magistrates in regard to every case in which a person is arrested, and the charge preferred by the arresting Constable is accepted at the police-station, is prima facie the test of the lawfulness and propriety of the action of the individual Constables concerned. Every person arrested, and against whom a charge is accepted, is brought before one of these Magistrates with the utmost possible celerity, and the trial of the case not only involves a decision of the question whether the prisoner ought to be convicted or discharged, but also affords the Magistrate an ample opportunity of detecting any irregularity or misconduct on the part of the Constables concerned.

Considerations of time and convenience made it inexpedient to examine all the London Police Magistrates, who are now twenty-six in number. We therefore wrote to Sir Albert de Rutzen, the Chief Magistrate, informing him that we desired to examine him and such other of his colleagues as might be inclined to assist us. The reply of the Chief Magistrate was to the effect that he and his colleagues were ready and willing to give evidence before us.[1]

The result was that we summoned the following Police Magistrates :—Sir Albert de Rutzen, Chief Magistrate; Mr. Alfred Chichele Plowden; Mr. Horace Smith; Mr. Ernest Baggallay; Mr. Albert Rowland Cluer; Mr. E. C. Tennyson D'Eyncourt; Mr. H. Curtis Bennett; Mr. George Paul Taylor; and Mr. E. N. Fenwick Fenwi .

Considerations analogous to those which led us to think it expedient to hear some of the Police Magistrates induced us to summon Sir Forrest Fulton, K.C., Recorder of London, and Sir Ralph Littler, C.B., K.C., Chairman of the Middlesex Quarter Sessions.

With a view to suggesting to these gentlemen the topics upon which we believed their learning and experience would enable them to give us information relevant to, and very useful for, the purpose of our Report, we caused a Syllabus or Memorandum of questions for their consideration to be prepared for and submitted to these witnesses, and we print in the Appendix to this Report the Syllabus or Memorandum so submitted.

Appendix p. xx.

To the body of evidence given by these gentlemen we attach the highest importance, and we are greatly tempted to give lengthy extracts from their evidence. Upon the whole, however, seeing that there is absolute unanimity in their answers to the principal questions which we submitted to them, we feel it unnecessary to add to the length of the Report by taking that course, and deem it sufficient to call attention to the general effect of the evidence, and to extract only such portions of what they said as amount to qualification on the part of individual magistrates to the general answers which they gave to our question.

General Views of the Magistrates.

§ 3. To the question whether, as a rule, the Police exercise their powers in regard to these street offences with honesty, discretion and efficiency, they all, in slightly varied language, answered in the affirmative. All, however, admit that the answer must be taken with the general qualification that there have been exceptional cases in which individual Constables have been guilty of misconduct of one kind or another. And it was because we thought it was likely that some qualification of that kind might be made by these witnesses that we asked the second general question whether any recent cases of misconduct on the part of Police Constables had come under their notice.

Sir Albert de Rutzen, in reference to that general question said that he had no hesitation in saying that after a long experience of over thirty years he could most certainly affirm that the duties of the Police are discharged, as a rule, with honesty, discretion and efficiency, and that he had not noticed any cases of misconduct recently. Sir Albert de Rutzen said :—

Q. 44,139 "I have never known a single instance where I had any kind of reason to believe that the Inspector so far forgot his duty as to take a charge of drunkenness where he believed the man was sober."

Again :—

Q. 44,141. "No such cases have come before me which would make me believe that a man in a superior station would go the length of taking a charge simply for the purpose of protecting his subordinates."

Mr. A. C. Plowden was equally emphatic in stating that, as a rule, the Police exercise their powers properly. Being asked whether he recollected any case in which Constables had wrongly arrested a man, he replied :—

Q. 44,298. "Oh, yes, I have, but they are few and far between, and perhaps for that very reason they made more impression upon me, but I can recall cases where undoubtedly they have blundered. . . . I do not recall any blunder which is due to temper. With all respect to the Police, I should say their blunders, when they do occur, are due to stupidity. I hope they will not mind my substituting one word for the other there. . . . I can give you the broad outline of a case where I thought they behaved very wrong-headedly some years ago—four or five years ago, at least—at Marlborough Street. Roughly speaking the case was this. A woman had been taken to the police-station on a charge—I am not certain whether it was disorderly conduct, or drunk and disorderly—but she did not appear, and thereupon process was issued, but she could not be found. Then, some weeks or months afterwards, the Police took into custody a woman whom they persisted in saying was this woman who had not answered to her bail, and she was brought to the Court. In point of fact, you must take it from me there was a mistake—she was a thoroughly respectable woman. As the case proceeded, and she outlined her defence, which was not only a denial, but consisted of a very strong alibi (she was ill at the time, and doctors were called who were at her bedside, and there was no question about the alibi at all), when I found the way the case was shaping I adjourned it in order to give the Police an opportunity of reconsidering the matter. Before

I adjourned it, I recalled the principal Constable, and asked him what impression the evidence for the defence, so far, had made on him, and whether he still adhered to his own story. He said he adhered to his own story, and he was satisfied he was right. There was nothing for it but an adjournment of the case. In the course of the adjournment a notification came to me from the Police that they were satisfied that they had made a mistake, and they asked to withdraw. Well, I thought at that stage that was the wrong course to take, and I thought some public reparation was due to this lady, and so the case came on in due course, and there was a formal withdrawal by the Police. I had no power to fine them that I know of, but I know it resulted, on my suggestion, in their paying considerable costs for their mistake. The point of the story is that they persisted in the charge, and I think they might have withdrawn it at an earlier stage. There was absolutely no foundation for the charge—none."

Later on, he said that that was an instance of the kind of case in which he thought the police went wrong, and added:—

"I think they are apt to go wrong in all that district of which Marlborough Street is the centre, I think that they not infrequently are mistaken in cases of drunkenness simply from their inability, through no fault of theirs, to understand the foreign temperament. A foreigner, when he is taken into custody on a charge of disorderly conduct, gesticulates and throws himself about, and he is more vehement than an Englishman. These gestures are strange and novel to the Police, and they do not recognise them in Englishmen at all, and they do not know what name to put to it except 'drunkenness.' The more the foreigner gesticulates, the more positive the Police are that they have got hold of a drunken person. That happens frequently, and it may be a perfectly honest mistake." Q. 44307.

He was asked: "I understand your position is this, that though you have been on the Bench now for nearly twenty years you cannot recollect any instances of the misconduct of a Constable coming to your notice, except in which the matter may be explained either by reference to the stupidity or want of intelligence or obstinacy of the man?" to which he replied:— Q. 44308.

"I should say a want of imagination. I think that is borne out by this, which shows it is not an inherent fault of the Police. The district of London with which I am best acquainted is the district of which Marlborough Street is the centre, and I do not recall any case of mistake in Marylebone. It is in this difficult district of Marlborough Street, which is teeming with foreign bad characters and foreign good characters as well, that the work of the Police becomes much more difficult."

Again, he was asked whether misconduct or indiscretion or stupidity on the part of a Police Constable was a thing of frequent occurrence before him, and his answer was:— Q. 44310.

"I should not say it is frequent, and it is associated almost exclusively with Marlborough Street, and in these cases where they have to decide the thing very rapidly they may mistake the symptoms."

Mr. Horace Smith, who has had nearly twenty years experience on the Bench, during which time he has been attached to different districts, expressed the opinion that the duties of the Police as to these street offences were most certainly, as far as could be, discharged as a rule with honesty, discretion and efficiency. Q. 44458. He added that allegations are frequently made against the Police by persons before him either as complainants or defendants. Q. 44459. He said he had had recent cases of misconduct which he had had to inquire into, but he had had no alleged ill conduct on the part of the Police proved before him. Q. 44460. Since he had been at Clerkenwell he could remember nothing of the sort occurring. He recollected that while he was at Clerkenwell he was on one occasion entirely dissatisfied with two Police Constables, and they were afterwards dismissed from the Force. That was fifteen or sixteen years ago, and he said he had had no reason to complain in that way since. And, in answer to a question from Mr. Rufus Isaacs, he said that during the last fifteen years he had never had to complain of the conduct of the Police. Q. 44462.

Mr. Ernest Baggallay, who has had over twenty years experience on the Bench, was of opinion that the Police Constables as a rule discharge their duties with honesty, discretion and efficiency, and added:— Q 44722.

"And in that respect I would say that during the twenty years I have seen a distinct improvement. . . . . The improvement is shown by the fact that there have been less complaints made to me, as time has gone on, of the Police exceeding their duty either with regard to violence or false evidence." Q. 44733.

Some cases have come before him in which there has been misconduct on the part of a Constable, but he could not remember any such case during the last six years during which time he has been Magistrate at Greenwich and Woolwich. Qs. 44734. 44735. 44736.

Mr. Edmund Charles D'Eyncourt, who was appointed Police Magistrate more than ten years ago, in answer to our general questions said:—

"As far as I can say, I think they" (members of the Police Force) "discharge their duties with all three—honesty, efficiency, and discretion, and I may add, perhaps, in spite of what a learned colleague of much greater experience has said, with very great intelligence." Q 45129.

Being asked as to whether any recent cases of misconduct had occurred in his Court, he replied :—

Q. 45130. "I have only had in the last few years one at all serious charge of misconduct in the way of assault against a Constable, and that occurred not very long ago at Clerkenwell. It touches really on another point, but it arose through a man being charged with disorder and using obscene language, and the Inspector at the station did not think there was sufficient to justify him in taking the charge. The man whom the Constable sought to charge made no complaint at all at the station of any ill-usage or assault, but he afterwards applied to me for a summons against the Constable, and I think brought a witness on the application. I granted him a summons. I heard it at considerable length. His case was very ably put by Earl Russell, but I dismissed the summons against the Constable. It was one of those cases in which the man was a notoriously bad character, and the Constable had seen him outside a public-house where he had no doubt committed an assault on the previous day, and he asked him to move on. The man, according to the Constable, used bad language, whereupon the Constable arrested him, and it was in the course of this arrest that this man who brought the summons said that he had been assaulted, but, on the hearing of the case, I came to the conclusion that there was no assault of a definite character. Of course, these were two very powerful men, and the
Q. 45132. prisoner resisted, that was all. . . . . The man who took the summons out said that he was moving away
Q. 45133. when the Constable kicked him and then struck him. No doubt the Constable followed him. . . . I came to the conclusion that there was not enough evidence."

Mr. Curtis Bennett, who was appointed a Magistrate as far back as 1886, in answer to the general question as to the manner in which the Police as a rule discharge their duties made the following statement : —

Q. 45304. "Speaking as a Magistrate, from my long experience I have no hesitation in answering that question in the affirmative in each individual case. The Police Constables are drawn from an intelligent set of men of the class to which they belong, they have multifarious duties to perform in the streets of London, requiring an enormous amount of discretion, and an enormous amount of thought, and I can only say that in my experience they do perform their duties with discretion. With regard to that, I know the difficulties that the Constables have to cope with in the district which I had under my jurisdiction for a period of nearly twenty years, in what was called the Avernus of London (the Notting Dale district—probably the three worst streets in London). I know the class of characters that were resident entirely in those streets, and given up to them, and I know the terrible assaults that were committed upon the Constables in those districts when they were serving very often singly, and how they were kicked and battered about, and many and many a time a man has gone home wounded and injured, and has had to leave the Force, because of injuries received in that district to which I have referred. I am bound to say that I have never known a Constable use his baton without occasion, but it is very difficult, and it must be enormously difficult, when a man is surrounded by rogues and evil-doers, who are ready to take advantage of him, to know the psychological moment when he must use his baton to protect himself against the assaults of these people. Personally, I have never yet known a Constable who has used his baton before the time came when it was absolutely necessary for his own protection that he should use it. I know full well, being a Magistrate, and hearing the evidence, that if I had been in the position of the Constable, I should not, I fear, have waited so long as that man did in order to take steps in order to protect himself, and on almost all occasions when he has used the baton, he has used it on a part of the body of the man whom he was arresting where it would be least dangerous to use it. It may have happened that in the struggle a man may have had a blow on the head which has cut the head open, but the usual course has been to use it about the arms or legs of the man whom he has had to take into custody."

Q. 45305. He also said that undoubtedly instances of misconduct on the part of the Police had come under his notice during the twenty years he had been on the Bench. He added :

"There cannot be a body of 17,000 men all Simon Pures, but I believe if a man is not upright and is not straightforward, it is soon discovered by his superiors, and that man is very soon sent out of the Force."

Q. 45306. No recent instance of misconduct had, however, come under his notice. His
Q. 45307. practice had been when a case of what might seem to be misconduct was called to his attention, and he thought from what he noticed in the course of a case that there should be an inquiry made about the matter, to either mark the sheet or speak to the Inspector, and request him to lay the matter before the Police Authorities, leaving the Police Authorities to do what they considered right, as they (the Magistrates) had nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the Police except as witnesses.

Mr. Paul Taylor, who has been a Magistrate since 1895, in answer to our general question as to the efficiency and propriety of the conduct of the Police in regard to these street offences, said :—

Q. 44565. "In my opinion they certainly do possess those qualities in quite a remarkable degree. I consider they are extremely intelligent also, and in my opinion, too, the stupid Constable is very much the exception. I should like to add that in my opinion the general bearing and discipline of the Police reflect great credit upon the system under which they are trained, and upon the officers at Scotland Yard who are responsible for it."

He could recollect in his own experience no case in which a Constable had been guilty of misconduct. Later on in his evidence he said :— Qs. 45566. 45567.

"I have never, in the course of my experience, known a case in which, in my opinion, the truncheon was unnecessarily used. May I say in connection with that that, on the contrary, if I may say so, I have frequently been struck by the astonishing forbearance the Constables have displayed."

He admitted that prisoners had recently complained to him of harsh or cruel treatment. He added :— Q. 45587.

"The complaint very frequently made in Police Courts, generally by women charged with being drunk and disorderly, is that their arms are bruised by the Constable on their being taken to the station. I may say with regard to that matter that I pay no attention whatever to that complaint, and for this reason, that I know from my experience, and from what I have seen in the Courts in my twelve years' experience, that it is extremely easy to bruise the thick part of the arm, which is the portion of the arm generally taken by the Constable, and especially when the arm is the arm of a woman, and the bruising, in my opinion, represents a minute amount of force, and would not represent substantial ill-treatment, but may very easily be caused, so far as the external appearance is concerned, by comparatively slight pressure. That is my belief."

Again, he said :—

"My experience is that the Police are extremely cautious, and that Inspectors are extremely cautious in the way in which charges are taken against people. That is my experience, and I can say nothing more than that. . . . It is not an uncommon complaint to have made by a very rough class of persons that they have been roughly handled by the police—not at all an uncommon complaint. I can only say that my experience is that the more ruffianly the prisoner, the more likely are you to have the complaint made. Personally, I have never found any ground whatever for believing that an assault was committed in the station, either in the charge-room or the cells, upon the prisoner in the case. That is my own experience. When I have inquired into it—that is to say, when I have had the Inspector who took the charge placed in the witness-box—I have generally found that the people who made the accusation simply refuse to cross-examine him, and very often admit that nothing of the kind occurred." Q. 45608. Q. 45712.

Mr. E. N. Fenwick-Fenwick, who has been a magistrate since 1887, expressed the opinion that all grades of the Metropolitan Police Force discharge their duties extremely well, and most certainly with honesty, discretion and efficiency. He had had no recent complaint of misconduct. Qs. 45914. 45915. Q. 45917.

"Of course, in little matters one has to give a word of warning to a Constable owing to want of tact, or something of that sort, but I myself have had no reason to make any serious complaint against them. Nine years ago, when I was at Southwark, I remember there was a case which was rather a serious case, where a Constable, or two or three Constables, it may be, arrested a man who they alleged had been very violent, and who had assaulted them, and who was taken to the station. When he was brought up before me cross-charges were made against the Constables that they had used him in a violent manner, and had assaulted him. I said, 'Very well, then the best thing you can do is to take out a summons against these Constables, and have the whole thing thrashed out. We will hear the charges preferred by the officers first, and then hear the charge preferred by the prisoner against the officers.' I committed them on both charges of assault to take their trial—the prisoner for assaulting the Constables, and the Constables for assaulting the prisoner. The result of it was that it went to the Sessions—I forget which, but I know in one case the Grand Jury threw out the Bill, and, in the other case, the Petty Jury stopped the case before it had got very far. That was the end of that charge." Q. 45218.

In answer to another question he said that he had never had occasion, in consequence of what he had observed in the case, to think that there had been such misconduct as to justify him in calling the Chief Commissioner's attention to the matter, but he added :— Q. 46025.

"I have had cases where I thought a Constable sometimes acted with a want of tact, and I have seen the Superintendent, and I have pointed out to him that he had better have a word with him. He has said, 'Do you wish it reported to the Chief Commissioner?' and I have said, 'No, I do not think that; I think the man only wants a word to tell him to be more discreet in the future.' They have always come and told me what they have done, and I have been satisfied with what they have done. But those have not been serious matters at all. They have been matters of advice to a young officer rather than anything else."

Mr. Cluer's Illustrations.

§ 4. Mr. Cluer, who has been a Police Magistrate since 1895, and who for several years has been attached to the Old Street Police District, though he expressed the opinion that, on the whole, as a rule, the duties of the Police in regard to these street offences are discharged by the Police admirably and with honesty, discretion and efficiency certainly, added that he thought there were a good many exceptions to that which certainly came before him; and he gave us by way of illustration several instances in which, in his view, there had been misconduct on the part of the Police. Q. 44947.

The instances appeared to us to be of sufficient importance to justify our calling the attention of Sir Edward Henry to them, and asking him as to whether any inquiries had been made into those cases, or whether he could give us an explanation in regard to them.

We accordingly, as to each of the instances given by Mr. Cluer, give his account, and we also give the answer of Sir Edward Henry.

We think it better to give Mr. Cluer's statements as to each of these cases in his own words.

I.

Richardson's Case.

§ 5. The first case was that of a lad named Joseph Richardson, who came before him on April 29th, 1907, charged with gambling in the street.

Mr. Cluer said :—

Q. 44950. "Now, only this week, last Monday, a lad was charged before me with gambling. The evidence was that at forty yards distance the Policeman had seen him with twenty others throwing up the coins in the air, and the Police Constable swore that he walked round, met him two minutes afterwards at Hoxton Street, at the corner of Old Street, and arrested him. The lad said: 'I was doing nothing of the sort; I had been in an ice-cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes.' He called an independent person, who did not know him, who satisfied me that he had been in the shop all the time, and I dismissed the case."

Upon Mr. Cluer being asked whether he (the Constable) invented the whole thing, he replied :—

Q. 44952. "No, not the whole thing. He saw a lot of people gambling; he saw this lad, who stands outside our Court selling newspapers; he knew him perfectly well by sight, he had met him, and there was no doubt about that, but he was not quite right."

Mr. Cluer, being also asked by the Chairman whether he thought that the Constable, seeing some people gamble, and meeting this lad, trumped up the charge, replied :—

Q. 44954. "He may have thought it was so. How can you get to the bottom of his mind? He is sent out for the special purpose of catching these lads, and he has got to catch them, otherwise, when he gets back, somebody wants to know the reason why. That is a risk a man specially sent out always has to run; and I say that, because in gambling cases I apply a test which I think is a fair one. I say: 'What money have you got in your pocket?' 'None.' How can he gamble if he has got no money? I dismissed it. But that is sure to happen when officers are specially sent out to stop what is a not uncommon nuisance in our district. It really is a crying difficulty, and it is very obnoxious to lots of the inhabitants, but I so often get the wrong person."

Further, Mr. Cluer, being asked whether he thought it was an honest blunder on the part of the Policeman, answered :—

Q. 44955. "I cannot say. I do not know the man, and so I have no experience of him to say whether it was or not."

Then Mr. Cluer stated that the Constable swore he saw the boy there; and Mr. Cluer continued as follows :—

Q. 44956. "I sent afterwards somebody whom I can trust, in ordinary clothes, to say to this boy, 'You were jolly lucky yesterday,' and the boy said, 'I was not; I was not gambling.' I thought I might satisfy myself that I was wrong, perhaps, by trying to catch him by a person who went up to him as a friend, but he did not admit it."

Sir Edward Henry's answer in regard to Case I. is as follows :—

Q. 52079, &c. "The next case Mr. Cluer deals with is that of Joseph Richardson, a case which was before him on April 29th, 1907. The Magistrate's opinion clearly was that the Constable had not seen this youth gambling, but because he knew him by sight he thought it was safe to arrest him, whereas the youth himself said that he had been in an ice-cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes before, and called a witness to prove this. Mr. Cluer says that in gambling cases he applies a test which he thinks a fair one. He says: 'What money have you got in your pocket?' Answer, 'None.' 'How can he gamble if he has got no money? I dismissed it.' Now, as a matter of fact, the charge-sheet shows that 10d. in coppers were found upon Richardson, so that he had money. Mr. Cluer says that the person who came forward to prove that Richardson had been in the ice-cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes did not know him. This person lives close by the corner where Richardson stands every day selling papers, and it is unlikely that he did not know him. Richardson at the Police Station did not plead that he had been in the ice-cream shop; what he said was that he had been looking on, and had not actually been gambling. The learned Magistrate admits that gambling is an intolerable evil in the neighbourhood; if so, the Police deputed to cope with it were not impelled by necessity to invent charges to justify themselves."

II.

Cole and Schrier's Case.

§ 6. The second case to which Mr. Cluer referred as an instance disclosing misconduct on the part of Constables was one in which two men, named Cole and Schrier, were charged before him on April 29th, 1907, with insulting behaviour. Mr. Cluer's statement as to this case is as follows:—

"There were two men on the same day who were charged under that section with insulting behaviour, and the evidence was that they were linked arm-in-arm, pushing people off the pavement. The pavement is 30 feet wide, and the policeman knows, I know that. He means pushing into people. It was in the Whitechapel Road. One of them was arrested; the other one waited about to take a tramcar to go away, and he was also arrested while he was waiting for his car. They both called a witness to say that they had been at a certain mission in the district the same night, that they had been practising athletics there, and they were carrying home a pair of boxing gloves wrapped up in a handkerchief, and they were going along perfectly peacefully. I think they must have been mistaken for some rough people. There had been some roughness going on there, but they were certainly innocent persons, and one of them was charged with disorderly behaviour, and with insulting a person a little smaller than myself." Q. 44956.

Sir Edward Henry's answer to Case II. is as follows:—

"The next case is that of two men who on the same day were charged with insulting behaviour. The evidence, according to Mr. Cluer, was that they were linked arm-in-arm, pushing people off the pavement, the pavement being 30 feet wide. Both called a witness to say that they had been at a certain mission that night, and that they had been practising athletics there, and Mr. Cluer thought they must have been mistaken for some rough people. In dismissing them he said: 'They do not look like men who would do such a thing.' As a matter of fact, the allegation against them was not that these two alone, but that they, with several others, were pushing each other about the footway against people, and using filthy language. Cole and Schrier are their names, and the friend they called in to testify to their conduct was a man named George Crease. I think it may be said that they are rough and not respectable persons, for Crease got nine months hard labour at the North London Sessions in 1905 for stealing, after previous convictions; Cole got twelve months in May, 1906, at the same Sessions for shopbreaking, after previous convictions; and Schrier got twelve months in January, 1906, for stealing, he also having previous convictions recorded against him. I mention that because the Magistrate says they were not rough people." Q. 52084.

III.

Davis's Case.

§ 7. The third case referred to by Mr. Cluer was the case of a man who was charged before him with drunkenness in March, but he was at once discharged by the Magistrate. Q. 44959.

Mr. Cluer's account is as follows:—

"The case of Mr. Davis was rather a different case. He was a respectable man, the manager of a business, and he went into the London and Westminster Bank in Commercial Street, had a business conversation with the manager of the bank, drew £50 for wages for his employer, went out of the bank, and fell down in a fit. It happened that two friends of his were passing on an omnibus, and they got off the omnibus and said to the Policeman: 'We know this man; we will take him away.' The Policeman declined to allow it. Probably the Policeman was not sure what was the matter with him. The man was taken to the station, and he was brought before me in about an hour and a quarter, and charged with being drunk. The Policeman then swore he was drunk, the doctor said he was drunk, and said he smelt of drink, and the Inspector swore he was drunk. There was the bank manager, there were half a dozen of his friends, and there was his own doctor to prove that he had epilepsy, and that for four days—as he assured me himself, and he was evidently speaking the truth—he had drunk absolutely nothing . . . . . Mind, these are only isolated cases; they are not typical. I have already said that, on the whole, everything is done honestly and efficiently; I do wish to assure you of that, but it is not fair to keep back such cases as admit not of a possibility of a blunder, but of combined wilfulness." Q. 44958.

The Chairman then asked the witness whether his view was "that there was a regular conspiracy on the part of the Constable, the Inspector and the doctor," and he replied:— Q. 44960.

"Having once taken the man into custody against the wish of his two friends who got off an omnibus to say so, then they foolishly prefer the charge against him, and, once the charge is preferred, then, unfortunately, the witness-box is used to give evidence which is not true."

Then occur the following questions and answers which, in view of Sir Edward Henry's comments on this evidence, it is necessary to set out verbatim :—

"Q. 44961. (Chairman.) What was the medical evidence in that case on the side of the Constable ? (A.) That the man was drunk. I forget whether actually the doctor said that he smelt strongly of drink or not.

"Q. 44962. It seems that the man had drunk nothing for four days. If the doctor said that the man's breath smelt of drink, either he was a very incompetent doctor or he was telling a lie ? (A.) Or he had been having a drink himself.

"Q. 44963. (Mr. Dickinson.) Did you have a certificate ? (A.) No ; I never look at certificates. I never have, and never will.

"Q. 44964. Why was he brought to the Police Court ? (A.) Because he was charged with being drunk.

"Q. 44965. Why did he come ? (A.) Because they brought him. He was charged about eleven o'clock in the morning, and he came to me about half-past twelve or so.

"Q. 44966. And all the officers at the same time gave evidence of the same kind ? (A.) Yes.

"Q. 44967. What was the name of the Inspector ? (A.) I cannot tell you.

"Q. 44968. (Chairman.) The defendant pleaded Not Guilty ? (A.) Yes.

"Q. 44969. And he called witnesses ? (A.) I think he called two of his friends. I forget how many witnesses he called. I did not go through all his witnesses. I saw them all there. I saw the manager of the bank, whom I knew by sight, waiting there to give the same evidence. I think the man having £50 in his pocket ought to have been sufficient to have discharged him at the station."

Sir Edward Henry's answer to Case III. is as follows :—

Q. 52084. Q. 52086. "I now come to the case of Davis, which is rather an important case. . . . . There is one rather important thing perhaps you will say. Mr. Cluer says in answer to Question 44960 :—'Having once taken the man into custody against the wish of his two friends who got off an omnibus to say so, then they foolishly prefer the charge against him, and, once the charge is preferred, then, unfortunately, the witness-box is used to give evidence which is not true.' The facts are as follows :—A Mr. Delmont, who was standing on the footway, saw Mr. Davis come out of the bank and go into the roadway, where he fell down (as he thought) from an epileptic seizure. He ran to the bank and told the clerks there, and then went into adjoining premises to get a glass of water. On his return he found that the 'point' Constable and a Sergeant had helped Mr. Davis out of the roadway, and taken him to the bank steps, where they were tending him. He made the water over to them, and they laved Mr. Davis's face and brushed the dirt off his clothes ; and, while they were looking after him, the bank manager appeared at the top of the steps and said, 'Look well after him ; he has a lot of money on him.' When able to walk, Mr. Davis was taken to the station, Mr. Delmont following, and when they were near the station a Mr. Tabaserman, a friend of Mr. Davis's who was passing on a tram, saw him and got out and followed to the station. Mr. Delmont, having heard the doctor sent for, left. Mr. Tabaserman remained, and offered to take charge of Mr. Davis, but the Police said they must await the doctor's decision. The doctor arrived quickly, he having been called to see a person alleged to be recovering from a fit. Having examined Mr. Davis, he recorded the opinion that he was not recovering from the effects of an epileptic seizure, but was unmistakably suffering from the effects of alcoholic intoxication, and he made an entry in the register accordingly. Tabaserman then left, he having been told that upon the doctor's certificate a charge of drunkenness would be preferred against Davis.

"I wish to emphasise the point that it was not upon the testimony of the Constable, but upon the medical testimony that this charge was taken. This is the course taken in case of doubt. I find that during 1905 no less than 2,801 charges of drunkenness were only accepted after hearing medical opinion. Mr. Cluer's account therefore is incorrect in various respects.

"Mr. Cluer has told the Commission that he saw Mr. Davis within one and a quarter hours of his arrest. This is not a very material point, and I only notice it because the Commission might infer that the conditions were favourable for the Magistrate forming an independent opinion as to Mr. Davis's state. Mr. Davis did not leave the station until 1.55 p.m. ; he reached the court at 2.7 p.m. but did not appear before the Magistrate till 2.30 p.m., about three and a half hours after his arrest. Mr. Cluer has told the Commission that the Policeman swore he was drunk, and the Inspector swore he was drunk. I have Mr. Cluer's notes, and I have also interrogated the Inspector, and find that the Inspector did not give evidence at all, and that Mr. Cluer is quite mistaken in saying that the Inspector swore that Mr. Davis was drunk. I have already stated to the Commission that when the doctor was sent for he was asked to come and see a person alleged to be recovering from a fit. The doctor, having made an examination, recorded it as his professional opinion that the man was not recovering from a fit, but was recovering from the effects of alcoholic intoxication. Mr. Cluer does not appear to have questioned this witness as to the grounds upon which he based his opinion. I am advised that the symptons of persons recovering from the effects of drink, and of an epileptic seizure respectively, can, as a rule, be easily discriminated. The chief surgeon wrote to the surgeon who certified in Mr. Davis's case, and received back an explanation which completely satisfied him that this gentleman had very strong grounds for the opinion he had formed. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Cluer, before this Commission, has said that as the doctor made this statement, he must either be a very incompetent doctor, or have told a lie, or must have been drinking himself. It appears to me that the privilege that attaches to the proceedings of this Commission has been abused to publish a most damaging imputation which must have a tendency to do him harm socially, and harm professionally, and one which, if correct, would certainly disqualify him for the office to which he has been appointed by the Home Secretary, but it is an imputation from which he cannot, in the circumstances, publicly clear himself by recourse to a Court of Law. From the Magistrate's notes it appears that neither the bank manager nor Mr. Davis's doctor, nor the two friends who followed to the station, gave evidence on Mr. Davis's behalf.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It does not seem to me that Mr. Cluer said that the doctor was telling a lie. It is at Q. 44962. The question which is put to Mr. Cluer by the Chairman as a suggestion is: 'If the doctor said that the man's breath smelt of drink, either he was a very incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie.' That is the question. The answer was: 'Or he had been having a drink himself.' (A.) Could he say it in more explicit words? (Q.) What I want to know is this. We can form our own opinions as to what the answer means. That is the question, is it not, upon which you make that statement? (A.) Yes. That is the construction I put on his answer. (Chairman.) The Magistrate said: 'I forget whether actually the doctor said that he smelt strongly of drink or not.' Mr. Cluer does not give a positive answer. Then I said: 'It seems that the man had drunk nothing for four days. If the doctor said that the man's breath smelt of drink, either he was a very incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie'? (A.) Quite so. (Q.) Then all Mr. Cluer said was, 'Or he had been having a drink himself.' He did not positively assert that the doctor had been having a drink? (A.) I must leave the construction of it entirely to the Commission, but that is the interpretation I put upon it. (Q.) What you suggest is that he ought to have answered 'I know the doctor, and I know him to be quite a respectable man'? (A.) It is so very damaging to the doctor that it is a matter for the Commission to consider whether they would not, with the permission of Mr. Cluer, delete what he said from the evidence, because it has not been published as yet practically, and it may do the doctor very grave harm. (Mr. Dickinson.) I do not think it necessarily means that the doctor had been drinking or was drunk. That is the construction you put upon it. I do not. (A.) You may not, but the construction that I put upon it is that Mr. Cluer said, 'Either this man was an incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie, or he had been having a drink.' (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I do not read it so. I read it quite differently. I read it thus. The Chairman was putting a question to Mr. Cluer that if the man had drunk nothing for four days, and if the doctor said that his breath smelt of drink, either the doctor was a very incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie, and Mr. Cluer adds another alternative—'or he had been having a drink himself, and therefore smelt of drink.' (A.) Mr. Cluer believed that the man had not had a drink for four days, because he told you so. (Q.) I am putting to you what Mr. Cluer meant, which I do not think quite bears out the inference you draw? (A.) You are putting a much more charitable construction upon it, I am afraid, than I do, because it appeared to me to be a very strong imputation. Of course, I may be wrong. (Q.) I do not think it was. (Chairman.) The Chief Commissioner suggests that Mr. Cluer should have answered, 'I know the doctor, and I know him to be quite a respectable man.' That is what you suggest he ought to have answered? (A.) Yes. (Mr. Dickinson.) Mr. Cluer meant, undoubtedly, that it might have been the doctor's own breath that confused his sense of smell. I take it Mr. Cluer's answer meant it was possible that the doctor himself had had a drink, and that fact confused his sense of smell? (A.) Do you mean to say taking a glass of wine would confuse your sense of smell? (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) There was a smell of drink somewhere. If the other man had not had a drink for four days, and there was nobody else there but the man and the doctor, and there was a smell of drink, it must have been the doctor's own breath. I do not think Mr. Cluer meant to make any imputation on anybody? (A.) That is not the way in which the doctor looks at it. I think, in justice to the doctor, the best way would be to delete it, if Mr. Cluer has no objection. (Chairman.) I do not think Mr. Cluer meant to say he had been drinking. I do not find that the name of the gentleman is mentioned? (A.) No. I have not mentioned his name on purpose, and you have not mentioned it either. From the Magistrate's notes it appears that neither the bank manager nor Mr. Davis's doctor, nor the two friends who followed to the station, gave evidence on Mr. Davis's behalf, the only two witnesses heard for the defence being the employer, Mr. Hyman Chissick, and the employer's son, who spoke as to his character, and to having seen him that morning, when he was sober; and it is not possible, therefore, to say what their statements, if made, would have amounted to. Mr. Cluer finds fault with the Police for not having made Mr. Davis over to his friends, but even if the two friends had got off an omnibus, as stated, and had asked for the custody of Mr. Davis—which is not a fact—the Police would not have been justified in making over, especially in such a neighbourhood, a person more or less unconscious, and in possession of a large sum of money, to two men whom they did not know. (Mr. Dickinson.) You have told us that from information that you have got out. What you are reading is from information which somebody has given you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) You have told us that the information that has been given to you points to the fact that the Inspector, at any rate, gave no evidence? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What do you say about the evidence that Mr. Cluer says the Policeman gave? Mr. Cluer said, 'The Policeman swore he was drunk'? (A.) Yes. (Q.) We have heard nothing about that? (A.) What do you wish me to tell you about that? (Q.) Did he or not? (A.) Yes, of course he swore he was drunk. He heard the doctor's testimony, he saw him in a more or less comatose state, and it was either drunkenness or epilepsy, and, as the doctor said it was drunkenness, he had no hesitation —the man had the smell of drink on him, and the Constable swore he was drunk. (Q.) The Constable swore he was drunk, because he thought the man had a fit? (A.) The Constable never said he thought the man had a fit, but his friends who came into the station said they thought he had a fit, and consequently the message sent to the doctor was: 'Come and see a man who is alleged to be recovering from a fit.' (Q.) Then the Constable did think he was drunk? (A.) I do not know what the Constable thought. (Q.) He must have thought he was drunk if he swore it? (A.) Yes, he probably thought from the beginning the man was drunk, and in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred it is drunkenness, and not epilepsy."

IV.

William Ashendon's Case.

§ 8. In this case a carman named William Ashendon in the employ of Mr. Fardell, a contractor, was charged with being drunk while in charge of horses on June 5th, 1906, when Mr. Cluer dismissed the case.

The learned Magistrate's statement is as follows :—

"Then, on June 5th, 1906, there was a carman selected by Mr. Fardell, a contractor—it was a Whit Monday—especially to take some apparatus to Paddington in connection with salving the 'Montagu' from Lundy Island. The man had been specially selected by Mr. Fardell, a well-known contractor in our district. He had been looking after ten or twelve other people from 10 o'clock, getting their tackle ready, and at 1.15 Mr. Fardell was with him in the Commercial Road. At 1.45 he was arrested for being drunk in charge of the horses. He said, 'I slipped as I was walking by the side of my horses on some mud, and the Constable got hold of me by the throat and very nearly choked me.' The Constable and the Inspector who came up both swore he was drunk while in charge of the horses. Here was this contractor with valuable horses and valuable tackle which he was sending to Paddington, and he came and satisfied me that he had been with the man all the time, that they had not had a drink, and that he would not have sent a man on to Paddington to take valuable stuff like that on a Bank Holiday if he had been drinking, and of course I dismissed it. It may have been a mistake, although, as the man could walk to the station, it is difficult to see how one could think that such a condition of things was drunkenness."

Q. 44970. Mr. Rufus Isaacs asked the witness: "Will you tell us what evidence there was of drunkenness in that case—how many witnesses?" and Mr. Cluer answered :—

"Only the Inspector and the Constable. The Inspector was in the street, and I think he came up."

Mr. Cluer added that they alleged that :—

Q. 44971. "They saw him walking along, and then suddenly fall down."

Q. 44972. Qs. 44974. 44978. It appears that Mr. Cluer had not taken down detailed notes of the evidence, but no doctor was called before him; and he thought it was probable that no doctor was called in at all.

Sir Edward Henry's answer to Case IV. is as follows :—

Q. 52107. "The next case is that of a man called William Ashendon, a carter in the employ of Mr. Fardell. The Police version is that this man Ashendon, who was in charge of a lorry on which was a boiler, pulled by a couple of horses tandem, was seen by the Constable on the beat to be driving from one side of the road to the other, and then fall off the lorry into the roadway. He got back on to his lorry again, and tried to drive away, but drove on to the footway, the leading horse turning right round and facing the wheeler, the other being at a standstill on the footway when the Police came up. Mr. Cluer says that the employer, Mr. Fardell, satisfied him that he had been with Ashendon all the time, and that they had not had a drink, and consequently dismissed the case. According to my information, Mr. Fardell stated that he had passed Ashendon on the road about an hour before, at which time he appeared to be sober. It is quite certain that, unless his behaviour had been very noticeable, the Police would not have arrested a man in charge of a trolley and boiler, and a couple of horses, on a charge of drunkenness, such an arrest entailing considerable trouble to themselves, as they would have to look after the horses and the trolley and send for the owner to take them away. I may add that I am informed this man, who was convicted on June 24th, 1905, of drunkenness at the Thames Police Court, has since been dismissed by his employer on account of his habits, and lost his next place from the same cause. A doctor was not called, because Ashendon at the station did not contest the charge, or ask to see one."

V.

William Littlemore's Case.

§ 9. In this case William Littlemore, who was arrested for disorderly conduct and using obscene language, was tried by Mr. Cluer on July 28th, 1906, for that offence, and discharged.

Mr. Cluer's statement is as follows :—

Q. 44977. Q. 44978. "On July 28th, 1906, a man was charged with being disorderly and with using obscene language. . . . . The name I do not know. He said the bailiff broke his door in to distrain for rent. A Police Sergeant was outside, and he said to the Sergeant: 'Is that right?' The Sergeant said: 'You pay your rent.' The Sergeant went on to say that the man was using obscene language, that he went in and came out two or three times, and still continued to use obscene language; 'I took him into custody; he was very violent, and struggled, and threw himself down.' There is nothing much in that. The man said, 'You threw me down, and you forced your knee in my stomach.' I did look at the doctor's certificate in that case, but it was about the only time I did so, and there was no charge of being drunk; but the doctor said the man had prolapsus recti. I sent the man to the hospital at once, and what became of him afterwards I do not know. There was, however, evidence that the man, who could not pay his rent, had been treated very violently. You do not get prolapsus recti by throwing yourself down on the pavement. . . . He (the Police Sergeant) said the man threw himself down.

Q. 44979. The man was evidently in such frightful pain that it was charity to send him away at once."

Sir Edward Henry's answer to Case V. is as follows :—

"The next case is that of Littlemore, arrested for disorderly conduct and using obscene language, who said he had been thrown violently down by the Sergeant; the implication being that the prolapsus recti he was suffering from was caused by this violence. Mr. Cluer says: 'There was, however, evidence that the man who could not pay his rent had been treated very violently. You do not get prolapsus recti by throwing yourself down on the pavement.' I have a copy of Mr. Cluer's notes in this case, from which it appears that the only witness examined was the Police Sergeant, who said that Littlemore threw him down, both falling together. The doctor was called at the station and recorded the following certificate, which the Magistrate admits he took into consideration in dealing with the case: 'Called to station at 9 p.m. to see William Littlemore. He was suffering from prolapsus recti and abrasions on right knee. I advised that he be bailed.' This is the certificate of the doctor who was called in to see Littlemore." Q. 52100.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs then asked the Commissioner: "You think the Magistrate took that into consideration?" and the witness replied :—

"Yes, he read it. He says he never looks at certificates, but that was an exception, because he did look at it there. 'I advised that he be bailed. He had been drinking.' (Signed) 'M. L. Clift, M.R.C.S.' The prisoner's wife was in Court, and the Sergeant asked the Magistrate to hear her upon the point of the prisoner's complaint being of old standing, but his request was refused. Dr. Clift has since been referred to, and states, as he informed the Police at the time, that the prolapsus recti, in his opinion, was of old standing. I have a certificate from him to that effect. The Police intervened in this case on the complaint of the neighbours, who felt aggrieved at Littlemore's conduct." Q. 52111.

VI.

A Betting Case.

§ 10. This instance by Mr. Cluer was one in 1895 where a man, whose name has not been supplied to us, was summoned for betting, and charged before him on the summons. Mr. Cluer said :—

"The reason why the Policeman had not arrested the man was this, that as soon as the man saw him coming, knowing him, he went into a house on each of the three days, and remained there at least five minutes, so that the Policeman could not see him. Being a little doubtful about it—the man was strenuously denying it, and he was not defended—I sent for the occupier of the house, who turned out to be a man out of work; the Policeman had to fetch him to give evidence in his favour; and he told me that on two days, the Thursday and Friday, the door was open, but that it was almost impossible for the man to have come in at that time, because his children came home from work, and he was at home, and that on Saturday they did not come home then, and the door was absolutely shut, that he had never seen the man, and that he had never had the man in his house. I think that was a case of a betting man being summoned, because he was a betting man, on wrong evidence. That, I think, is bolstering up a possibly genuine case by untrue evidence to account for the fact that on those days two people had gone up to him at the same time and the man had not been arrested." Q. 44979a

The Chief Commissioner found it was not possible for him to make an independent inquiry in regard to this case, but he said as to it :—

"In the case of the bookmaker the allegation of the Police was that he had run away into a house, the door of which was open. The case was remanded, and when it came on again the owner of the house appeared as a witness. My recollection is that this man said it was very unlikely that the bookmaker could have got into his house and remained there for five minutes, because there was a servant downstairs, and his children would probably have noticed it. That is as far as I remember." Q. 52111.

VII.

The Case of Simons and Eugene.

§ 11. The next instance is one in which Simons and Eugene were charged with being drunk and disorderly in the neighbourhood of Brick Lane on April 30th, 1907, when Mr. Cluer dismissed the case.

Mr. Cluer said, in reference to this case :—

"Now, only last Thursday there were two young Jews of our district, because, as you know, it abounds with them, who were charged with being drunk and disorderly. They said they were coming home from a party, and it was at a quarter to four in the morning, but they were neither of them drunk, and they were not arrested for being drunk. A Police Sergeant heard a woman scream in a street Q. 44979a.

round the corner; he saw these two men, and he slipped hurriedly round to Brick Lane and he stopped them, and quite rightly too, I think, until he could find the woman; but when they found no woman, then he said they both began to shout, and said: 'We will get £50 damages against you.' As they would not be quiet, and disturbed the neighbourhood, he arrested them, and then he charged them with being drunk and disorderly. He could have found out whether they were drunk long before, when he first met them, it seems to me, and he could not by himself have taken two young people like that drunk and disorderly to the station except with great difficulty. I think that was a foolish charge to bring. I think perhaps they were making a little too much noise. As to one of them, who told me he made all this noise, I said: 'You ought to be bound over not to make a noise in the street,' but as to the other I dismissed it altogether, and I did not ask in that case for the doctor, but I believe in that case there was a certificate of the doctor attached to the charge-sheet. I know that because 7s. 6d. or 3s. 6d. is put in my register. I never see the certificate nor the charge-sheet unless I ask to look at it. It may be that some of these people put their defence before me because they think I am more willing to listen to them; and it is only fair to put the other side. About six years ago I asked a Police Constable: 'Did the prisoner say anything in answer to the charge,' and the Constable seemed very nervous and unwilling to answer, so I pressed him, and at last he said that the prisoner said, 'I hope old Cluer will be sitting, and then I shall get off.' It may be therefore that I err the other way, and that that induces people to set up before me defences that they might not be willing to set up
Q. 44981. before other Magistrates. . . . I think mistakes such as one has are quite pardonable, because it is difficult very often to distinguish between a man who is in a fit and a man who is drunk, because he is lying helpless and cannot speak."

Sir Edward Henry's answer to Case VII. is as follows:—

Q. 52111. "The next case is one of April 30th last, in which two young men named Simons and Eugene were charged with being drunk and disorderly in the neighbourhood of Brick Lane. Mr. Cluer is of opinion that they were not drunk at all. The facts appear to be that a Section Sergeant on his rounds hearing a woman scream, and, seeing the prisoners coming from that direction, stopped them, asked them what had happened, and said they must accompany him back to the spot from which the scream had come. But the woman was not to be seen, and the two young men, who, in the Sergeant's judgment, were drunk, became troublesome and caused disturbance, and, as they would not go away, he took them to the station. As in answer to the charge they denied being drunk, the doctor was sent for, and he recorded the following entry:—'Called at 4.45 a.m. to H. Simons and N. Eugene, who deny being drunk. I have carefully examined them, and find that neither is yet sober. Fit for cells, 30—4—07.' As the Magistrate bound over Simons to be of good behaviour for twelve months, he evidently at the time was satisfied that the Police action was not wholly unjustified."

VIII.

The Case of Walter Mason.

§ 12. The next case referred to by Mr. Cluer is that of Walter Mason, who was charged in February, 1899, with being drunk.

Mr. Cluer said in reference to this case:—

Q. 44981. "I remember the case of a man who had attended a Band of Hope meeting until a quarter to ten, and he was arrested in Hoxton Street. He had a fit in Hoxton Street. I think that is a mistake that is quite pardonable. I remember very well the Constable in that case was exceedingly fair in the way in which he gave his evidence, and, on being asked about it, he said: 'I cannot tell, but, on hearing the evidence, I should think he had a fit.'"

Q 44982. Mr. Rufus Isaacs then asked: "You say a Constable sometimes makes a mistake, but how does the Inspector taking the charge make a mistake?" and Mr. Cluer replied:—

Q. 44983. "That I cannot say. . . . That was an undoubted case on March 11th, 1899. I see my note on that is: 'This Constable swearing that the man was drunk and smelling strongly of liquor,' and so on, 'is deplorable.' I do not know why it is, but I think it is because it is part of one's business, and so many people are drunk that sufficient attention is probably not paid to the hundredth person, after the ninety-nine, who happens to be ill instead."

Upon being asked whether he meant that the Police get into the habit of treating every case as a case of drunkenness, he answered:—

Q. 44984. "Yes, and I think there is that risk also if we do not take care of it ourselves."

In regard to this case, Sir Edward Henry made the following observations:—

Q 52111. "The case last mentioned is that of Walter Mason, of the Band of Hope, charged in February, 1899, or more than eight years ago, with being drunk. The officer concerned having left the Service, I have not been able to make an independent inquiry into the facts, and for the same reason I cannot go into the case of the bookmaker Vale, the Constable who gave evidence having lost his life not long ago. Those are the only two cases I have not been able to go into independently. I can tell the Commissioners the facts of those two cases. In the case of Mason the only points that I noticed, on looking at the papers, were that he was there for five hours before being bailed, and that he did not appear at the Court the next morning, and he had to be proceeded against. That is all I know about that case."

We did not think it necessary to inquire minutely into the facts of these cases, but we give some prominence to them here, because they seem to us to be good illustrations of the difficulties surrounding the exercise of the power of arrest by the Police, and of the differences of opinion that may arise as to the propriety of an arrest, and as to the truthfulness of the Constable between Police witnesses and the Magistrates.

For our purpose it seems unnecessary to express an opinion upon the issues raised upon the evidence of Mr. Cluer and Sir Edward Henry. None of the persons referred to have appeared before us with a request that we should examine into their complaint, and we find it difficult to express a categorical opinion upon the evidence as it stands before us in regard to these particular cases.

So far as we can form an opinion, the decisions of Mr. Cluer in these cases do not necessarily involve any misconduct on the part of the Police concerned. Sitting as he was in a Criminal Court, he was bound to give the benefit of every reasonable doubt to the person accused, and, as we read his evidence, he does not wish to be taken as saying that in all these cases there was wilful misconduct on the part of the Police, either as to the arrest or as to the evidence they gave before him, but that he refers to them simply as instances which illustrate the kind of exception which leads him to qualify the general opinion that he has formed as to the efficiency and integrity of the Police Force. As such, they are materials to which, in forming our conclusions, we attach considerable weight, and to which we shall have occasion to make further reference. Here we need only add that the explanations given by Sir Edward Henry satisfy us that the conduct of none of the constables concerned in these cases calls for censure.

Summary of Magistrates' Evidence.

§ 13. With regard to the questions on matters of detail which we put to the Magistrates, there is such absolute unanimity in their answers as to make it unnecessary to do more than briefly summarise its effect as follows:—

(1) The Police Orders and Regulations framed for the guidance of the Police, and issued to Constables, are well suited for their purpose and require no amendment.

(2) The Police method of effecting arrests, and taking prisoners to the Police Station, the treatment of prisoners at the Police Station, and the practice as to accepting bail, are satisfactory.

(3) As to the alleged bribery of Constables by prostitutes and by street bookmakers, their evidence is almost entirely negative, and its effect is that no facts have come to the knowledge of the Magistrates which afford any basis for believing either that there is any systematic and widespread system of bribery, or that cases of bribery of individual officers or Constables are of frequent occurrence.

(4) As to the proceedings in the charge-room, the application of the statutory provisions under which these street offences are dealt with, and as to complaints made to Magistrates by prisoners or other persons as to alleged misconduct on the part of the Police, there is some, but still slight, divergence of opinion.

Proceedings in the Charge-Room.

§ 14. All agree that the Inspector or Station Sergeant, before whom the prisoner is taken at the Police Station, is, in taking or refusing the charge, discharging an executive and not a judicial function. His duty is partly for his own protection as being himself a Constable, and partly in the general interest, to satisfy himself before accepting a charge that there is a prima facie case that the prisoner has committed some offence punishable by law, and it is no part of his duty to try the question whether the allegations of the arresting Constable are true or not.

They are all of opinion that the Regulations as to taking or refusing a charge are in substance satisfactory; and that the Inspectors and Station Sergeants as a rule exercise a sound discretion in taking or refusing charges.

They are emphatic in their statements that their decisions in favour of a defendant do not usually imply that there has been any error of judgment or blameworthy conduct on the part of the officer taking the charge.

Their experience does not lead them to believe that Inspectors are, from professional bias, habit, or any other cause, unduly prone to take charges that a Magistrate or other competent unbiassed person not connected with the Police Force would, if he were in command of the charge-room, refuse.

Q. 44377. All the Magistrates, except one, in answer to the question, "Having regard to the damage to reputation sometimes sustained by innocent persons in consequence of their being publicly put upon their trial for these street offences, are you of opinion that some reform is desirable in the Regulations as to taking and refusing charges?" replied in the negative.

Q. 44337 to 44339. Mr. Plowden, whose answers upon this point were not in agreement with those of his learned colleagues, told us that he did not remember any complaint by prisoners that they had not been treated fairly in the charge-room, but he had had complaints sometimes to the effect that they have not understood the proceedings that have taken place, that it has not been sufficiently explained to them so that they could understand what was going on, or what they were doing. He added that undoubtedly there are complaints from time to time that they have been treated with roughness; but he explained that he did not think that there was any blame to be attached to anybody with regard to it, because the person complaining had found himself in a novel position, and he did not grasp it fully, and he did not know that the prisoner in any case had suffered any injustice in consequence of it.

Q. 44342. Mr. Plowden was good enough to make some suggestions for an Amendment of the method of proceeding in the charge-room, and at the Police Court, with regard to the manner of dealing with these street offences. He said:—

"I think that something—in fact everything that can be done—should be done to protect the public from the risk, the constant overhanging risk, of unfounded charges which are not the less unfounded because they may be made in perfect good faith. I think no one will deny that this risk is a real one. Of course, to some people it is of little consequence whether they are brought into a Police Court or not, or what happens to them when they are there; but to others, and many others—persons of position and character—Police Court proceedings, even with an acquittal, cause annoyance and humiliation. More than that, such is human nature that I think the more conspicuous a man's reputation may be, the more likely is it that it will be believed against him that there was some truth in the accusation which he had to face, even although he was acquitted. Now, it is easy to imagine cases of that character. Under the present system, such cases would come, in the first instance, before the Inspector at the Police Station. There it would have to undergo what is, in effect, a judicial inquiry. I do not mean to say that it is an exhaustive judicial inquiry. The Inspector, of course, cannot convict, but he can discharge; and, not only that, but he is responsible to no one but himself. I am aware—at least, I believe this to be the case—that he has to make some note of every charge which he refuses, which is sent up to his superiors. But that is a very small check. The note is entirely in his own discretion as to how he makes it, and whether it is short or long, and so on. The inquiry, therefore, which takes place—that is to say, the inquiry before the Inspector—takes place virtually with closed doors. When an accused person crosses the threshold of a Police Station, the curtain, so to speak, drops behind him, and no one knows what takes place within that station except the Police and the accused person. It is only the following day, when the accused comes before the Magistrate that the curtain lifts and daylight is let in. That is the system. I do not for a moment suggest that these powers, which are undeniably great, and the responsibility, which is undeniably great, are in any way abused by the Police. I know I am the last person to make such a suggestion—even if I had the wish I have not got the materials, and I do not suggest it—but they themselves must feel the responsibility to be very great, and I think safeguards might be devised in the interest of the public to protect them from risks of this nature. It is easy to criticise, and recommendations are difficult, but I should suggest as one recommendation, that in cases where there is present to the mind of the Inspector taking the charge a reasonable doubt that the Constable who has brought a man, say in a public position, into a station, is making a mistake, and the accused person is there with his card, and his name and address, and his denial all before the Inspector, then I think the Inspector should have power to take the accused person's bail to appear, not the next morning before the Magistrate, but, say, in a week's time. During that week the Inspector would have opportunities of meeting with his superiors, or with the very able legal adviser whom the Police have, with the result that the charge might be dropped altogether, or it might take the form of a summons. At all events, it would prevent that appearance of, I will not say indecent haste, but haste which may tell very harshly against the accused person under the present system. We must all have cases in our minds where that has occurred—a most painful thing. I know, not only as a Magistrate but as a man of the world, that this kind of risk is ever present to the minds of the public at large, and I think they would be glad to see any safeguards introduced to check these risks. Then, beyond that, where perhaps such delay as I have indicated is undesirable, or not easily indulged in, I think the Inspector should have an opportunity of consulting with some superior officer, say the Superintendent of his district. The more you increase the position of the man who has this great authority, I think the greater the safeguard to the public. Then, as an alternative idea, a Magistrate might be consulted before a charge is inquired into, with a discretion to hear it in his private room. I am quite aware that there are strong objections which could be taken to that, but, if you come to think of it, this would hardly be giving the Magistrate more power in his private room than the Inspector has at this moment in the Police Station. The reputation of a public man does not belong only to himself; it belongs to the public as well. It is in the interests of the public that the character of people who enjoy deservedly great reputations should not be lightly tampered with, or written about in the public Press in great detail, and at great length, and, therefore, I think it would be to the interest of the public that in cases of this kind a Magistrate should have discretion whether he should hear the case in open Court or not. I should suggest that if he was allowed to hear the case in his private room, if he saw cause to convict—that is to say, to inflict a fine—a notification of that fact should be given tersely and shortly to the Press, but no details, and that if he acquitted the defendant, then the thing would drop, and nothing more would be heard about it. After all, I believe a Police Magistrate has power to exclude the public when he tries indictable cases. The power is never exercised, but I believe there is that power; and it has been held there is that power. Of course, we are all familiar with the discretion exercised by the Judges of the Divorce Court, when they hear cases in camera. They do not hear them in camera for the sake of the people whose cases are being investigated, but in the interests of the public; and if the public can be brought to have, as I hope they have, sufficient confidence in the discretion of their Magistrates, I think it would be a lesser evil to entrust the Magistrates with this power, which would be very rarely exercised indeed, rather than that the present system should go on of the Police conducting a judicial inquiry at the station before the case comes into Court."

Mr. Plowden, though he did not agree that the inquiry in the charge-room could be correctly described as "executive," and though he told us that he would call it a general inquiry by the Inspector investigating whether the charge was sufficiently well founded to bring it into Court, did not, we think, intend to disagree with the view taken by his learned colleagues as to the legal position of the Inspector, but rather disagreed with them as to the proper adjective to employ in characterising the duty to be performed by the officer in charge of the station, though at the same time the effect of his evidence does seem to imply the view that the proper discharge of his duty by such an officer involves a larger inquiry into, and a wider consideration of, the case than that contemplated in the views taken by the other learned Magistrates. We shall later on return to Mr. Plowden's suggestions.

Statutory Provisions dealing with Street Offences.

§ 15. All the learned Magistrates agree that the application of the statutory provisions dealing with the street offences with which we are concerned affords no special difficulty, but their evidence does disclose some slight differences of opinion as to the nature of the evidence which they regard as sufficient proof of some of the material allegations constituting the statutory offence (e.g., of the acts or of the misbehaviour amounting to a prima facie case of "riotous or indecent" conduct on the part of a prostitute under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, or of "annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers" under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 11, or of "insulting words or behaviour whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned" under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 13).

We need not dwell upon these differences for the moment as we discuss the question raised by them below.

Complaints made to Magistrates with regard to Misconduct on the Part of the Police.

§ 16. It appears from their evidence that the ordinary course which a Magistrate pursues in regard to complaints of misconduct by the Police which are made to him during the trial by the prisoner or others is to call the attention of the Sub-Divisional Inspector or other officer who is in attendance at the Court to them, in accordance with the Orders and Regulations, leaving it to him to make such report to his superior officer as he thinks right.

That also appears to be the usual practice when a complaint is made, not by a prisoner in regard to something occurring in regard to his own case, but by some person coming forward to make an independent complaint.

In some cases Magistrates have called the attention of the Chief Commissioner to the conduct of members of the Force, but none of them, except Mr. A. R. Cluer, had any comment to make upon the way in which the Chief Commissioner deals with their communications.

We shall have, in the last part of our Report, to make some observations upon the method of dealing with complaints by Magistrates and by the public, and we therefore postpone further observation on the matter.

Passing on to the evidence of Sir Forrest Fulton and of Sir Ralph Littler, it seems only necessary to say that their experience is in general accord with that of the Magistrates, and that they are of opinion that the Police as a rule exercise their powers rightly and efficiently. The favourable opinions which they expressed as to the trustworthiness and veracity of Police evidence strike us as being of great value as confirming from experience in other Courts those of the Magistrates in the Police Courts.

Home Office Evidence.

§ 17. Sir Mackenzie Chalmers, the Permanent Under-Secretary of State at the Home Office, and Mr. C. E. Troup, the Assistant Secretary of State at the Home Office, were also good enough to give us evidence as to the general conduct of the Police based upon their official experience, and as to the manner in which complaints as to misconduct on the part of the Police are dealt with at the Home Office.

Both these gentlemen confirmed the evidence of the learned Police Magistrates that the duties of the Metropolitan Police as to street offences are discharged as a rule with discretion, honesty and efficiency.

Sir Mackenzie Chalmers described the work in the Criminal Department of the Home Office, and, in view of some observations which we shall have to make concerning the treatment of complaints by members of the public of misconduct on the part of the Police, we extract the description of the work of that department which he gave us.

Q. 47596. "The Criminal Department consists of a principal clerk and three junior clerks, and is under an assistant secretary, Mr. Troup, who will give evidence before you. The work of that Department is roughly classified as follows :—Prerogative of Mercy—that means any petition from any person who is convicted, or on behalf of any person who is convicted, including of course, capital cases, which are always reviewed, whether there is a petition or not. The second head is Extradition. The third is Prisons and Prisoners. The fourth head is Broadmoor and Criminal Lunatics generally. The fifth head is Police, County and Borough, including also the Metropolitan Police in certain aspects. The sixth head is Disturbance and Riots—communications generally about disturbances all over the country. The seventh head is Coroners. The eighth head is Production of Prisoners. The Secretary of State, as you are aware, has the duty of producing prisoners whenever it is necessary for the interests of justice. The ninth head is Commissions Rogatoires. That is rather a troublesome head—Commissions Rogatoires, issued by Foreign Courts to get information with reference to foreign criminal proceedings. They go through the Home Office. The tenth head is the Removal of Prisoners. That involves a good deal of correspondence. The eleventh head is Salaries and Fees of Justices' Clerks or Clerks of the Peace. Then there are miscellaneous matters relating to the administration of Criminal Justice. That is the summary of the headings into which the work of the Criminal Department is divided."

Sir Mackenzie Chalmers informed us that there were about 5,000 petitions for the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy in each year in connection with convictions in England and Wales, and that a certain number of those petitions are from convictions by Metropolitan Magistrates.

Mr. Troup subsequently handed in a Return of complaints received at the Home Office during the years 1904–5–6 against the Metropolitan Police, of which the following is a copy :—

Complaints received in the Home Office during the years 1904–5–6 against the Metropolitan Police :—

1. Year.	2. Number of Cases.	3. Complaints of wrongful arrest included in Column 2.
1905	20	5
1906	34	10
Total	68	18

Among the cases referred to above there are :—

Complaints as to arrest for drunkenness, etc. - - - - -	4
Complaints as to arrest for other disorder - - - - - -	2
Complaints as to arrest for solicitation - - - - -	None.

From this Return it appears that the number of complaints in 1904 was only fourteen, in 1905 twenty, and in 1906 thirty-four, making for the three years a total of sixty-eight.

In reference to this Return Mr. Troup observed :—

"The whole of the complaints relating to drunkenness in the three years were four, the complaints relating to disorderly conduct two, and there were none relating to solicitation in the three years. In considering those figures it ought to be borne in mind that ordinarily persons bringing complaints against the Metropolitan Police would be referred by the Home Office to the Chief Commissioner. We do not consider that complaints relating to the discipline of the Force properly come in the first instance to the Home Office." Q. 48161.

Mr. Troup explained that he had included in the Return

"everything of which we have got any paper or record in the Home Office, but I only wish to make it clear that we do not consider the Home Office the disciplinary authority, and that if anybody came to the Home Office and said : 'I have a complaint against a Police Constable,' the natural or ordinary thing would be to tell him to go on to Scotland Yard." Q. 48164.

In the next Division of our Report we give statistics as to the number of convictions for street offences during a period including two of the years to which Mr. Troup's Return relates, and it will be found that the percentage of Petitions for the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy in regard to those cases works out at an extraordinarily small percentage.

We gather from the Home Office evidence that the Secretary of State does not deem it part of his duty to exercise any control over the discipline of the Police Force but throws upon the Chief Commissioner full responsibility for the conduct of members of the Force. We see no reason for thinking that the Secretary of State in taking that course is not correctly interpreting the relationship between him and the Chief Commissioner contemplated by the Police Act. It is the immediate duty of the latter to direct and control the whole system of Police within the Metropolitan Police District, though it ought to be observed that the Chief Commissioner is appointed by and acts under the authority of the Secretary of State, who is the Minister responsible for his acts.

Seeing that neither the Secretary of State nor anyone at the Home Office has any independent power or machinery for effective inquiry into the question whether any complaint about a particular officer or Constable is well founded, the only course which is taken in practice is to refer any such complaint for inquiry and report to the Chief Commissioner.

Complaints made to the Home Office in regard to matters in which the conduct of the Police is or may be involved fall into two classes :—

(1) Petitions for the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy made by or on behalf of persons convicted by Metropolitan Police Magistrates ; and

(2) Complaints by persons who conceive themselves to be aggrieved by the action of the Police, whether there have been Police proceedings or not, alleging misconduct of some kind on the part of a member or members of the Force.

As to petitions for the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy, it is obvious that they may be based upon the allegation that the conviction was due to the commission of perjury by Police witnesses, or may contain allegations as to the conduct of the Police which may be used for the purpose of showing, without its necessarily being alleged that the conviction was wrong, that the Petitioner is entitled to some exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy. In all such cases the consideration of the complaint, though it may involve a decision as to whether some members of the Force have been guilty of misconduct, is matter for the consideration of the Secretary of State.

In practice, where the Secretary of State considers a complaint against the police, made with a view to his exercise of this Prerogative, he consults the Magistrate who decided the case, and then asks the Chief Commissioner to inquire and report upon the conduct of the members of the Force of whom the complaint has been made.

As to the second class of communications to the Home Office, it is the practice, unless the matter is one of a trivial nature, to refer the person aggrieved to the Chief Commissioner or to send on the papers laid before the Secretary of State to the Chief Commissioner, with a request that he should inquire into and report upon the matter.

Where questions are asked in Parliament of the Secretary of State concerning matters affecting the conduct of members of the Police Force, it is usual for the Secretary of State to send on the questions to the Chief Commissioner asking for information, or, if necessary, for inquiry and report. Where such a question refers to a case which has been before one of the Courts, it is usual to communicate also with the Judge or Police Magistrate who dealt with the matter.

The Late Sir Howard Vincent's Evidence.

Q. 45740. § 18. The late Sir Howard Vincent, who was formerly for some time connected with the Metropolitan Police Force as Director of Criminal Investigations, and who was the author of a well-known book entitled "The Police Code," which has passed through many editions, and which is very extensively used both by Constables and the general public, had had a very long and close personal acquaintance with the Police system of London and also opportunities of examining personally the Police systems of all the principal capitals throughout the world.

Sir Howard Vincent gave it as his opinion that the duties of the Police in regard to street offences

Q. 45752. "are discharged with such discretion and such honesty and efficiency as to command the approval of the public and the admiration of every foreign visitor."

Being asked whether he had any qualification to make to that statement, he replied:—

Q. 45753. "It is of course only natural that in a Force which is very nearly 18,000 strong, and with a population of between six and seven millions of people, and tens of thousands of strangers, a large proportion of whom are bent on pleasure or amusement, occasional mistakes and errors of judgment are inevit-
Q. 45754-5. able. . . . I do not think my view of that could be so well expressed as it was by Sir William Harcourt, when he was Home Secretary, if I might be allowed to read what he said on a public occasion: 'When we consider the temptations to which the Police are exposed, none perhaps greater than the hardships they have to encounter in the withering blasts of a wintry night, it is to my mind not so surprising that they should sometimes go astray, but it is marvellous how seldom. Their work is done with a fidelity and diligence and discipline which is the admiration of all who take the trouble
Q. 45756. to make themselves acquainted with it.' He attributed such mistakes as do occur 'to ignorance and deficient and defective theoretical knowledge and practical experience.' He thought that was proved 'to a large extent by the considerable number of young Constables of short service who get involved in difficulties, who are the victims of assault, compared with those of more experience.'

Q. 45775. "With regard to the way in which arrests are affected in London, I have seen arrests probably in every country in the world, and I think the arrests in London are made more quietly and with more humanity than in any other country, and I am quite sure that the system which is in force here of having men of great physique has a beneficial effect, because they see at once that resistance would in all probability be useless, and the moral effect of a man of great stature and physical force is very large indeed. We see that in other countries—for instance, in Paris, where I am very intimately acquainted with the whole system and with the very able Prefect of Police, M. Lepine—the difficulty of finding men of stature is very great. They have small men, and these small men, having less confidence in their physical power, and their own strength, are very apt to endeavour to strike awe into
Q. 45776. the people they arrest by extremely rough methods. The moral effect of stature is very considerable, I am convinced. . . . . I have known cases where truncheons have been improperly used no doubt; but, of course, it is much more easy to judge of the improper use of the truncheon at a distance and long after the event, than face to face with all the excitement, and all the rough-and-tumble of the circumstances of the moment. There have been no doubt cases, but, on the whole, the truncheon is exceedingly seldom used, and I think perhaps I might tell the Commissioners this, that other Police of other countries all have a revolver, and some have a sword as well, but our Police only have the truncheon, which is at most a very inferior weapon except at close quarters. I think that Rural Police might have a stick, and the companionship of a dog would be a great advantage. At one time, about twenty years ago, murders and attempted murders of Police were very frequent. There were about six or seven cases in one year, and I took a vote of all the Police going on duty on several days through the stations, as to whether under the circumstances they would like to have a pistol themselves, and although there were a few of the young men who answered in the affirmative the very large majority of the men of experience said 'On no account.' They thought it would be both dangerous to themselves individually, and might involve them in such severe cases of improper use and undue use and trials for murder that one could not think of making the change at all."

There are other portions of this witness's evidence which deserve attention, but in regard to which it is not necessary for us to do more than to refer those who are interested to the notes of the evidence where they will be found printed in full.

Relations of the Police to Prostitutes.

§ 19. We felt, after considering the communications that we received, and the evidence in regard to the cases of complaints as to alleged misconduct of the Police in dealing with solicitation cases laid before us, that the duties of the Police in regard to the third class of street offence with which we are concerned, and the charges that they are exposed to in discharging their duties, were more difficult and delicate than in regard to the other classes of offence.

The application of the statutory provisions dealing with solicitation to the facts of any particular case is by no means easy, and involves the exercise of much tact and sound judgment. Having regard to the very small number of complaints as to wrongful arrests of women for solicitation in comparison with the considerable number of arrests followed by convictions for solicitation, we consider that there is no reason whatever for thinking that the Police habitually exercise their powers unjustly and arbitrarily, though some representations made to us went to show that the Police did not exercise their power of doing what may be called clearing the streets with as much vigilance and zeal as might be expected.

Allegations that Constables are in the habit of receiving money from prostitutes were made to us with a suggestion that in some cases the money was given by the prostitute as a bribe to the Policeman not to exercise his powers, and, in others, that it amounted to the levying of blackmail by the Policeman upon the prostitute.

With regard to the allegation that has sometimes been made as to the Police receiving money from these women, Sir Edward Henry made the following statement :—

"I have often, since I have been Commissioner, received letters, sometimes anonymous and sometimes authentic, alleging that bookmakers gave money to the Police, but I have not received a single letter, and no complaint, oral or written, has been made to me during the three and a half years I have been Commissioner charging the Police with levying blackmail from women of the unfortunate class. From what I know of the tone of the men themselves, I am satisfied that if any individual man were to take money from these women it would certainly come to the knowledge of his comrades, and I am also satisfied that his comrades would look upon him as an unmitigated blackguard, and that he could not remain in the Force for long. I do not of course say that individual instances of taking money may not occur, but the whole Force know that any proved misconduct of this sort would be dealt with with severity. I think, too, that the system which I have endeavoured to explain to the Commission makes it quite impossible that there should be any systematised form of blackmailing like this, because the variation in the beats is so great, and in a street like Regent Street, where, I suppose, on either side you would have parts of ten beats, it would not be of the slightest use a woman bribing the first Constable she came to, because she would only go a few yards before she came to another beat; I suppose on both sides of Regent Street there are probably twenty beats; and then, besides that, there is continual patrolling by the Police. Therefore it seems to me that anything like a system of blackmailing these women is more or less impracticable, and certainly it could not exist for many days without becoming known to the authorities. I have had many allegations of the Police being corrupted at times by bookmakers, and I have had to deal with those cases where they have occurred. There have been cases, of course, of men charged with taking money from these women in the past, but they have been extremely rare, and none have come under my personal cognisance." Q. 85.

Though we could not fail to be struck with this statement on the part of the Chief Commissioner, and though in none of the cases of special complaints made to us was there any suggestion on the part of persons complaining that they had been wrongfully arrested for solicitation, nor was it suggested that there had been any attempt on the part of Police Constables to extort money, we thought it right to probe the matter so far as was reasonably possible. It does not seem practicable to obtain direct personal testimony from any woman of this class as to their relations with Constables, and even if we had taken steps to compel the attendance of any such witnesses before us, whether their evidence should turn out to be favourable or unfavourable to the Police, it would be open to such plausible suspicion as to be practically worthless. No such criticism could be reasonably made upon the evidence of philanthropic persons engaged in different forms of rescue and charitable work which brings them into close relation with this unfortunate class.

We received from the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of London, as Chairman of the London Council for the promotion of Public Morality, a communication to the effect that that body would be willing to give us evidence in regard to the manner in which the Police discharge their duties as to solicitation in the streets, and, as a result of this communication, Mr. William Alexander Coote, the Secretary of the National Vigilance Association, and the Deputy-Chairman of the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, attended and gave evidence before us.

We also took the evidence of a number of persons connected with various religious or philanthropic societies whose work had brought them into close touch with prostitutes with the general object of rescuing them from a life of vice and misery, and who had had opportunities of observing or making themselves acquainted with the relations existing between the Police and women frequenting the streets for the purpose of solicitation, and of forming an opinion as to the results of Police action in the matter.

We examined Mr. William John Taylor, the Secretary of the London Female Prevention and Reformatory Institution; Mr. Solomon Cohen, Secretary to the Gentlemen's Committee of the Jewish Association for the Protection of Girls and Women; the Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., the well-known Minister of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, and an Ex-President of the Free Church Federation; Miss C. E. Matson, who is commonly known as Sister Mildred, and who is in charge of a Rescue Home called Winchester House; Miss Lucy Colson, who is in charge of the Church Army Training Home for Rescue Workers at 9, Stourcliffe Street, Edgware Road; Miss E. C. Knight, Secretary of the Continental Department of the Young Women's Christian Association, and of the International Union of Friends of Young Women; Miss Harriett Hillyar, a staff captain in the Salvation Army attached to the branch of the Army established at 259, Mare Street, Hackney, as the headquarters of the Women's Social Work Committee; and Miss Eilidh MacDougall, who has been engaged for some years in outdoor rescue work in connection with the Southwark Diocesan Association for the Care of Friendless Girls.

We have no doubt that we might have obtained a larger number of witnesses connected with other organisations or themselves independently engaged in rescue work, but we felt that the evidence of those whose names we have just enumerated was sufficient and representative. They are all persons whose beneficent activity has given them a real insight into the condition of the lives of prostitutes and their relation to the Police, which not only entitled them to the fullest credit as to the facts to which they testified, but enables them to form an opinion as to the character of the general relations between these women and Constables, as well as on the question whether there is good ground for believing that Constables are habitually bribed by women of the unfortunate class, to which great weight ought to be attached.

Mr. Coote's experience in regard to foreign women resorting to London for the purposes of prostitution is unrivalled, and as to the general condition of the London streets very great, while the knowledge of all the other witnesses is derived from systematic work carried over several years.

The tenour of the evidence of these witnesses is extremely favourable to the Police. The impression left upon our minds after considering it is that Constables in exercising their powers in regard to solicitation cases do so not in a perfunctory manner but with a commendable degree of vigilance and activity, and that at the same time they habitually render every assistance in their power to those engaged in rescue work, and in many instances, of their own motion, do acts of kindness to young women just about to begin a career on the streets, or who are ready to accept kindly words of warning and direction as to the quarters in which they may look for help and protection.

None of these witnesses, except Mr. Coote, have made any special intentional effort to discover whether the Police blackmail prostitutes, or whether the latter habitually bribe the former; and that in itself is a circumstance which seems to lend additional weight to their opinion. They have conversed with many hundreds of young women who were or had been on the streets during the last few years, and it appears that not a single one of them suggested that the Police had been in the habit of demanding or accepting money from them.

Mr. Coote, in his evidence, goes further than the other witnesses, because he has made an effort to discover whether there is any truth in the current rumours as to the blackmailing of women by the Police. The interesting statement which he made to us is printed in the Minutes of Evidence, but we think it well to call attention to the passages which are of special importance for our purpose.

Mr. Coote said :—

"As Secretary of the National Vigilance Association for the Repression of Criminal Vice and Public Immorality for the past twenty-one years, and for seven years DeputyChairman of the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, I have personally, and through the agents of the two above-named societies, had a great deal to do with the Police of the Metropolis. In connection with our work our agents have been about at all hours of the night in various parts of London, and have been brought in personal contact with a large number of the unfortunate women who solicit in our streets, and whose lives are given up to public immorality. In connection with the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, we have specially dealt with the closing of disorderly houses, and this has naturally not only brought our agents in contact with women of the unfortunate class, but also with those who trade upon their vice. Having had such exceptional opportunities of judging of the way in which the Police throughout London discharge their duties in connection with one section of your Inquiry, the Earl of Aberdeen, as President of the National Vigilance Association, and the Rt. Rev., the Lord Bishop of London, as President of the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, thought that in justice to the Police, and to assist, as far as possible, the inquiry undertaken by the Commission, I should offer to lay before you the evidence that has come into my hands. I should like also to mention that both the Earl of Aberdeen, within the last ten days, and the Rt. Rev. the Lord Bishop of London, are prepared to stand to the statements which are made in this Statement which I am about to make. During the twenty-one years that I have acted as Secretary of the National Vigilance Association the question of public morality, with special reference to the condition of the streets in certain parts of the Metropolis, has been one of the principal sections of our work, and in this connection I have interviewed hundreds of women of questionable character with the view of ascertaining how they became such, how they maintained themselves as such, and what treatment they received from the Police in the various districts in which they plied their calling. While I have gathered interesting materials on various phases of the social problem, I have not in one instance had a charge made against the Police as a body, or against an individual Policeman, of levying blackmail or of exacting bribes of any kind from these unfortunate women. On the contrary, I have known many instances in which the Police have helped them with both money and advice. For many years I have made it my private business, in connection with my official duties, to question these women as opportunity offered, as to their relationship to the Police in the pursuit of their calling, and the treatment meted out to them, in order to verify or otherwise the current statement as to blackmail. I have done this because in certain circles of good and bad society amongst men, it has always been taken for granted that blackmail and bribes were weapons commonly used by the Police in dealing with this class of women. Neither by foreign nor English women has it ever been admitted to me that they were asked to supply the Police with hush-money, or that they were made the subjects of Police tyranny, owing to their refusal to give money. The following case came under my notice, and as it relates to the Police at Piccadilly Circus, I quote it as emphasising the view I am stating :—A young woman, deserted, hungry, and in a fit of despair, betook herself one evening to Piccadilly Circus. She had been walking about for a short time when a Policeman on duty spoke to her, and suggested that she was a stranger to that kind of life. She admitted that it was her first essay on that quest, and said that she had not a farthing in her possession, and was there from sheer necessity. He urged her not to start such a life, and told her of a home where she would be cared for. She agreed to go, and he saw her to the omnibus, and gave her the fare to Edgware Road, which was close to the home of which he had spoken to her." Q. 6945.

Mr. Coote gave us several instances which tend to show that the Police exercise their powers of arrest for solicitation with sound judgment, and as they are quite relevant to our Inquiry, and he himself had investigated them, we think it worth while to give the particulars here :—

1. (M. G. 26, a French woman.) A Magistrate sent to ask our help on behalf of a French girl who had been charged with soliciting and was on remand. We at once visited her in prison, when she strongly denied the offence with which she had been charged, alleging that she earned her living honestly at charing and needlework in order to support herself and her illegitimate child. Believing her story to be true, we attended the Police Court on the second hearing, and on our undertaking to look after the girl the Magistrate handed her over to our care. As she expressed herself anxious to return to France, we sent her back the same day, recommending her to the care of friends in Paris. From subsequent inquiries which we were able to make, we found her statement to be utterly untrue. During her six months' stay in London she had been living in a disorderly house with a well-known procuress. Q. 6946.

2. (The case of J. G., 22, French.) Our help was asked by a Magistrate on behalf of this young woman, who had been charged with soliciting, and was in Holloway Prison on remand. We interviewed the girl. She denied the statement of the Constable who had arrested her, and so strongly protested her innocence that there appeared to be more than the possibility of a doubt in the matter. She consented to be repatriated, whereupon the Magistrate discharged her. Feeling, however, that in justice to the girl the case should be further investigated we placed her in a home for a day or two and made inquiries. Within a day or two we obtained overwhelming evidence that she was a well-known prostitute. When taxed with this, she stubbornly adhered to her former statement, but finally admitted that for three years she had been leading an immoral life in London. As she proved very troublesome we had to send an agent with her to Paris who placed her in the care of her relatives. In that case, I should like to say, the investigation took a long time. We got addresses from her which were not always accurate, but we investigated the whole matter, and she finally capitulated in the office, after having been on her knees swearing—and I believed her—that she was perfectly innocent of the charge which had been made against her.

3. (E. F., 22, German.) A Police Court worker called at the office, on instructions from the Presiding Magistrate, to ask our help respecting a German girl who had been charged with soliciting and remanded for a week. We at once sent to Holloway to interview her. She strongly denied the charge made
Q. 6947. against her, and protested that she was living respectably by needlework. Here again on investigation we found the charge to be fully justified. . . . : She practically admitted it, and all I did with her was to ask her whether she admitted that the charge was true, and whether there was any way of preventing getting run in by the Police, and whether she had ever done anything to offend them, or anything like that, and whether she had ever been asked for money.

4. (J. D., 20, French.) At the request of a Police Court missionary we sent to Holloway to interview a French girl who had been charged on remand with solicitation. Her parents were respectable people, and she was most anxious that they should not know of her disgrace. She practically admitted that she had gone wrong, but did not admit the present charge. She was willing to be repatriated, and we put her in the hands of ladies in Paris who work in connection with us in connection with this work.

5. (M. R., 22, French.) This case was also reported to us by the Police Court authorities. The girl had been arrested for soliciting. When interviewed she stated that she came to London a year previously to seek employment, failed to do so, drifted into bad company, finally took to the streets, and, while soliciting in Euston Road, was arrested. I took the girl in hand myself, and questioned her as best I could in endeavouring to get from her some declaration with regard to the Police. I put my questions all round with a view of finding out for my own information. She denied from start to finish that she had ever been asked by a Policeman for money, or that she had ever been threatened by a Policeman
Q. 6948. if she did not supply money. . . . . In every one of these cases I made that (the behaviour of the Police) a special point. When a girl admitted that she was run in, I put the question to her, 'Why did the Police select you? Why did they run you in when there are so many others? Is there any reason? Have you ever been asked for money?' I put these questions plainly sometimes for my own personal satisfaction, and in every case I have got this absolute denial. Only within the last three weeks I was sending a girl to Hamburg, and I said to her, 'Well, but surely there must be some reason why the Police got you. You do not give them money.' 'Oh,' she said, 'they would not take money; you dare not approach them.' In fact, my evidence goes to prove that there is a wholesome fear amongst these girls. I cannot speak so authoritatively on the English side of it as I can on the foreign side of it, but in the case of the foreign girls there certainly is."

Being asked why there was this wholesome fear of the Police, Mr. Coote replied :—

Qs. 6949. 6950. "Because of the way in which they are run in if they are found loitering about, or if they are discovered approaching men. My workers who are out at midnight have seen girls run away on the approach of a Policeman in the distance."

Further, being asked whether he meant that there was a wholesome fear on the part of these women to offer the Police money, he answered :—

Q. 6951. "A wholesome fear of coming in contact in any way with the Police either through bribes or their occupation being discovered."

Q. 6952. "6. (R. S., 33, Swiss.) The Police Court missionary at Clerkenwell asked our help for this woman, who was under remand in Holloway Prison for soliciting. She strongly denied the offence, but her story was obviously untrue, and there was no doubt but that she had been leading an immoral life for the last fifteen years in London. We inquired of her as to the treatment she had received from the Police, and she made no allegations whatever against them. We finally sent her to friends in Amsterdam.

"7. (E. N., 20, German.) While at Police Court in connection with the case of J. D. we were asked to interview a girl who had that morning been charged with solicitation, and was under remand, awaiting transfer to Holloway. We questioned her as to her experience of the English Police, and while complaining of the arbitrary way in which she had been treated, she stated that she had never been asked for or had given them money. She was handed over to our care, and we subsequently repatriated her."

Those cases came under the notice of Mr. Coote in the discharge of his duties in connection with the National Vigilance Association.

In his work as Deputy-Chairman of the Society for the Promotion of Public Morality he had had to investigate evidence with regard to disorderly houses in the Metropolis. After sifting the evidence obtained by them as a Committee he explained that they passed the evidence on to the borough councils. He said :—

Q. 6952. "We have thus been in a position to unofficially obtain the actual facts concerning the Police treatment of this unfortunate class. Here, again, the evidence corroborates my former statements. Many of these women have complained of the unfair way in which the Police treat them, but have never uttered a suggestion as to bribery or blackmail being levied on them under any circumstances. The unfair treatment of which they complain is that they are compelled to keep moving, and that they are not allowed to speak to men, and that they are always in danger of being run in. I do not think it is absolutely a fact, but that is their feeling, and that is what they say. I do not say it is true. The question of the character of the streets has also formed the subject of much deliberation, and, while the Council feel that of late years a great improvement has undoubtedly taken place in what is understood and known as the area of vice, they would respectfully suggest that something further might be done to clear those thoroughfares of the flaunting vice, which is still too much in evidence there."

Mr. Coote made some comments upon the state of the law as to solicitation in the streets, both by men and by women, and he made some suggestions for its amendment, with which we deal in a later part of the Report.

Incidentally, Mr. Coote gave us some information about prostitution in the Metropolis, and the condition of the streets. In his opinion, there is a great deal of fiction as to the number of women, either foreign or English, who are walking on the pavement of shame in London. He admitted that the figures were not trustworthy, but he put the figures at 8,000, which he admitted was startling in view of the fact that it had been publicly stated that there were no fewer than 80,000 prostitutes. Q. 6973.

He considered that the number of prostitutes had diminished very much during the last forty years, and he added :—

"From a public point of view I am glad to believe, on the evidence, that prostitution does not pay from an English point of view—that is after they descend from the theatres and the music halls into the streets. From eighteen to twenty-four, yes; but then they leave the different music halls, and they are out of the proprietorship, and on their own account, and it does not pay. That is my conviction from what I have seen, and I am glad to know that honest industry pays better than most of the forms of vice so far as the English girls are concerned. Some it may pay, but only for a time." Q. 6975.

He also added, in answer to Mr. Dickinson :—

"Under the existing law, if the Police might only go back to the time before this Commission, and act as they were acting then, I do not think we should have much to desire in London. I think there have been since this Commission a few more in Piccadilly." Q. 6976.

It does not appear to us necessary to make lengthy extracts from the evidence of the other witnesses giving general evidence on the point with which we are now dealing, but one or two striking answers may be profitably referred to.

Mr. William John Taylor told us that he had never met with any case in which he had been able to discover that a Constable had ever accepted money from a prostitute. He also told us that he had never met with any which he could call authenticated cases of complaint against the Police on that ground, though he had heard rumours, and added :— Q. 40328.

"I know that the Police are very often exceedingly kind to these women in the streets. There are a great many instances of what I should call touching instances of kindness on the part of the Police to poor women, and respectable women too, who might be found destitute in the streets. . . . . I have heard girls say they have heard of cases" (in which the Police have blackmailed women). Q. 40330. "When I have put it to them, 'Has it ever occurred with you?' they have invariably said 'No.'"

Testimony, be it observed, very remarkable coming from a man who had seen from first to last in the course of his work nearly 40,000 women, half of whom were undoubtedly prostitutes. Q. 40337.

Mr. Solomon Cohen's evidence is equally emphatic :—

"I can say quite definitely that I have not heard of any occasion in which any payment has been made by a woman to the Police, or any occasion on which any demand has been made by the Police upon these women. That I can state quite definitely. . . . . The Police treat them" (Prostitutes) "very considerately, I think; in some cases I think they treat them too leniently. . . . . I have often thought that the women were allowed a great deal too much licence." Q. 40406. Q. 40408.

Miss Lucy Colson told us that rescued women who had told her a good deal about their past life had referred to the Police very often :—

"But only in terms of appreciation of their kindness. I have had a great many talks with them, and there have been many opportunities for their telling me; and very many times the Police have brought girls to me, or have introduced to my notice some girl who they wished to be helped and thought would be in danger of going further. . . . I have often heard them speak very gratefully of the kindness the Police have shown them; and very very often it has been because the Police have sent for me that I have come into touch with them." Q. 40474. Q. 40477.

In one instance Miss Colson recollected that nine years ago a girl had complained "that an officer had taken her into a building for a purpose," but she was not able to verify it. Q. 40481

With regard to the supposition that many Police Constables receive money
Q. 40489. from women she said that it had not come to her knowledge, and that she had got the impression that there was nothing in the supposition from conversations with the girls.

Staff-Captain Harriett Hillyar, who explained her method of carrying on her work by offering a card containing an intimation that Mrs. Bramwell Booth would
Q. 45461. be glad to help any woman or girl in need of a friend, and so on, said that she had interviewed a great number of women and had never heard any complaints against the Police, nor had any one of the women suggested that they had had to pay money
Q. 45469. to the Police in order to be allowed to go about and accost men. She said that more than seven years ago she remembered seeing a foreign woman put a coin, half a
Q. 45470. crown or a two-shilling piece, on the ledge of a shop window in Regent Street, but she did not see any Policeman pick it up. Miss Hillyar spoke very highly of the way in which her work as an officer of the Salvation Army was assisted by the Police.

Miss Eilidh MacDougall, whose evidence was to the same effect as that of the other
Q. 45539. lady witnesses, said, in reference to the allegation of bribery by the Police, that during the last few months she had asked every girl with whom she conversed, and
Q. 45540. who seemed likely to know anything about the matter, whether there was any truth in the rumours, but such girls denied that anything of the kind took place.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer informed us that as President of the Central South London Free Church Council he had for the last twelve years been working with a view of dealing with the suppression of immorality in Central South London; and, after referring to the aid given by the Police in the putting down of disorderly houses, expressed the opinion that the Police discharge their duties in regard to solicitation with honesty, discretion and efficiency, but added :—

"Of course, the agitation which has lately been set on foot has been very prejudicial to the Police, Q. 45722. I mean the general rumours that have been in vogue, and therefore I do not know at all what effect those rumours have had on them, but, as far as my observation goes, which carries me up to the last month or six weeks, they have been very straight and strong in their dealings."

Q. 45729. He also said that in his district of Lambeth the streets are very much clearer at night
Q. 45730. than when he first went there. Being asked whether he attributed that to the active work of the Police, he said :—

"I think so, certainly, and I think the Police have been encouraged by the fact that they feel that a number of Christian men were backing them up, as it were, and were in sympathy with them. I do not know but what they would have done their duty equally well apart from that; still it has been a great moral help to the Police, and I hold that if more Christian people did that kind of thing it would be of great benefit to the community."

We have now sufficiently indicated the substance of the evidence given by these representative witnesses.

Evidence given on Behalf of the Police and Public Vigilance Society.

§ 20. So far, the general evidence to which we have called attention has been strongly in favour of the view that the Police, as a whole, discharge their duties in regard to street offences remarkably well, and for the moment we reserve any attempt to criticise it or to estimate its value.

When we commenced our Inquiry we were aware that in connection with the D'Angely and Gerothwohl and Lavalette cases many attacks had been made upon the Police and many public comments made upon the methods of the Police as a whole, which, prima facie, indicated that there was a somewhat widespread feeling of want of confidence in the Force, and a considerable amount of dissatisfaction with the methods in which the Police exercised their powers. We, therefore, thought it not unlikely that persons might come forward, either independently or as representing some organised bodies, to represent the existence of that want of confidence in, and discontent with, the Police Force. As matters have turned out, no one, except Mr. James Timewell, as Secretary of the Society above mentioned, approached us with a request to give us information upon the subject of our Inquiry in a sense adverse to the Police. To this fact we naturally attach considerable significance, and we think it reasonable to infer from the general silence hat, those who in the Press or in private conversation make allegations against members of the Force, founded probably largely on rumour, did not feel sufficiently sure of their ground to come forward and repeat them in public.

In making this statement we must not be deemed unmindful of the fact that men and women who have been in the hands of the Police and have been brought into the Police Courts, even though the decision of the Magistrate has been in their favour, feel great reluctance in coming forward with the knowledge that what they deem to be their misfortune would be advertised afresh, and perhaps obtain greater publicity than before. Still, a considerable number of such persons did come forward, and making adequate allowance for the existence of this reluctance, we believe that if any considerable number of our fellow-citizens entertained a genuine opinion that the Police habitually exceeded their duty, or that in regard to such matters as taking money from prostitutes and bookmakers there existed any widespread and systematic corruption amongst members of the Force, the voice of public dissatisfaction would have reached us from many quarters, and would have been expressed by respectable and responsible persons representing different classes of the community.

So far as we are aware, after diligent inquiry, the Police and Public Vigilance Society is the only body which has been formed with a view to watching the action of the Police in the Metropolis and calling public attention to alleged excesses and irregularities on the part of Constables, or defects in the Police organisation.

As we have stated above, Mr. Timewell communicated with the Secretary very soon after the appointment of the Commission, and he expressed his wish to give general evidence, but, as the result of the interviews that he had with the Secretary, it appeared that his general evidence would be mainly based upon the facts of a series of cases more or less recent which had come before his society, in which persons who had been arrested by the Police, and tried in the Police Courts, complained of misconduct on the part of particular officers and Constables. We accordingly informed him that if he would send in a statement of the complaint in each of the cases upon which he intended to rely we would consider each such statement, and intimated that we should inquire into and report upon such complaints as might come within our Terms of Reference, and which we might deem helpful for making our general Report. That course was taken, and we hardly expected that Mr. Timewell would wish to give personal evidence, but finding towards the close of an inquiry that he was desirous of doing so we examined him.

Mr. Timewell's evidence divides itself into two parts :—

(1) Certain general allegations against the Police, for the proof of which he relies upon his own personal experience ; statements made by persons who have made representations to him as Secretary of his Society ; and the facts disclosed in the special complaints into which we have inquired, or contained in the papers which he forwarded to us in regard to cases into which we have made no public investigation for the reasons we have assigned above :—

(2) Recommendations or suggestions.

As to the first part of Mr. Timewell's evidence, after stating that in his opinion he was very sorry to say that the Police did not discharge their duties as a rule with discretion, with honesty, and with efficiency, he made certain broad statements of opinion with reference to the general conduct of members of the Force. Q. 52540.

First he said :—

"It is my honest opinion that a very large proportion of the charges brought to the station and to the Police Courts are really the result of unnecessary interference by Police Officers." Q. 52541.

He suggested as an instance of what he meant by that, that Police Constables are often called to deal with one set of people and by the time they arrive on the scene the persons they were originally called upon to deal with have disappeared and that then rather than go back without a charge they will take any person or two ; and then in order to secure a conviction by some means or other—

"They will get their comrades, even although they were not present, to give evidence in support of the charge and so obtain a conviction against an innocent person." Q. 52548

Q. 52551. Secondly, he alleged that a great deal of the evidence given in Police Courts by Police Constables is untrue.

Q. 52550. "Police officers are expert witnesses, and generally most ordinary people would accept the evidence of one Policeman as against two inexperienced persons who do not know how to give evidence; and, consequently, you cannot blame the Magistrate. My idea is that you should blame the officers who encourage and do this sort of thing."

Q. 52554. He also averred that the Police "are generally encouraged to get cases, and to
Q. 52555. secure convictions by their superior officers," and suggested that promotion is determined
Q. 52556. to some extent by the number of charges that a Constable makes.

Thirdly, he attacked the sobriety of the Police. He said:—

Q. 52561. "I think the most serious matter that we ought to consider is the persistent drinking on the sly of Policemen. I think that is the most serious matter we have to contend with. They have regular places of call at all hours of the day and at all hours of the night where they drink on the sly—at public houses, at general shops, at receiving offices, and at all sorts of places, and I think it is quite a common thing for Policemen between the hours of ten and twelve at night to get six or eight, or even nine
Q. 52562. drinks before midnight. . . . My contention is that 50 per cent. of the night duty men are more or less under the influence of drink, and they are quite incapable of doing their duty; they are quarrelsome, and they interfere with people unnecessarily, and, as I say, when once they get a charge they go through with it somehow. I can assure you that what I am speaking of now I know as a fact, for I have seen it, and I have, I think, on more than one occasion had to complain to the Police Commissioner with regard to secret drinking. The most recent complaint I sent in he acted upon, and the men were punished."

Upon its being pointed out to him that it was odd that in not one of the numerous cases in which the Commission had taken evidence had there been any evidence of misconduct on the part of the Police due to drunkenness, except Dubery's case, he replied:—

Q. 52564. "We hesitated to bring it forward, but I think we could have brought forward quite a number of
Q. 52566. instances, and he went on to say that 'it was not from want of evidence, but simply because the witnesses would not speak out.'"

He added:—

"On that particular subject it is very difficult to get evidence, because the Policemen are generally alone, and you will hardly ever get them so that you can produce two witnesses seeing them drinking at the same time; they take such care that they are not seen. But I could give you times and places and everything if you want it, if you doubt my word as to it, and I could tell you, in fact,
Q. 52569. where you could go and see it at any time you wish to go and see it—quite a number of cases; you only need to go there to see it, and I can tell you exactly where to go."

He also said —

"I think the most serious thing that I can mention, as a matter of fact, is the drinking on the sly. Everything else follows from that—improper duties, false charges and interfering unnecessarily with innocent persons."

Fourthly, he expressed dissatisfaction with the method of effecting arrests, and cruel and rough treatment of prisoners. In reference to this head of attack, he said:—

Q. 52572. "One of the first things that Policemen do when they think they have a drunken man or woman is to twist the arm, and that I consider to be a most brutal thing. I can give you another case, if I may, in which I saw the whole thing from beginning to end. I mean it is not hearsay evidence at all. This was a case of a woman with a baby in her arms who fell down in some sort of a fit, and when I arrived on the scene there was a Policeman on his knees attending to the woman, and a navvy standing assisting him holding the woman, and another navvy, a friend of the first, nursing the baby. That is just what I saw when I arrived, and they were doing everything they possibly could to bring this woman round. We stayed there, I should think for twenty minutes or half an hour watching them. They got water, and rubbed the palms of her hands, bathed her forehead, and did everything they could for her and in time she revived. Just as she was coming to a Sergeant arrived on the scene, followed by another Policeman. They were just about lifting the woman up as the Sergeant came. The first thing that he did was to take hold of the woman's arm here by the wrist, and twist it back, which made her jump so that she screamed. She said, 'You beast.' He said: 'That is the sort of thing to bring you round; it is so much better than medicine.' So he went on ill-treating her down the hill. This occurred, too, in the New Cross Road, just by the Metropolitan Station. They followed down until they got in the hollow, and then he threw the woman violently against a shut up shop. Then she said: 'You can do anything you like with me; I do not care what happens.' I stood by with some friends, and eventually I said to the Sergeant: 'What are you going to do with this woman?' He said: 'What is that to do with you?' or words to that effect. 'Well,' I said, 'I want to know what you are going to do with her, as she is not drunk.' He said: 'Who are you?' I said: 'I will take your number and I will give you my name.' After I had given my name he calmed down a little bit, and asked me what I thought he ought to do with the woman. I said: 'I think something should be done other than locking her up. I do not know what else you can do, but she should either be taken to the infirmary or somewhere where she would be taken care of, and where she should have a lodging for the night. Something should be done for her; it is not a case for imprisonment.' After considerable argument, he eventually agreed to go with the woman and the child to East Greenwich Workhouse, where she was put up for the night, and one of my children went with them to see that it was all right, and to see that she was really taken care of."

Further he observed:—

"They twist the arm and ill-treat them. If you would take it, I could bring before you a case now very similar to that where three persons were locked up, and there were no less than eight witnesses, all respectable people, there who would tell you the whole story from beginning to end, and would bear out exactly what I have told you with regard to the Police that I saw." Q. 52579.

Fifthly, he complained that sufficient care is not taken in the charge-room with regard to the taking down of statements or complaints. He informed us:—

"I have frequently heard accused persons say: 'I said So-and-so and So-and-so,' when the charge was being taken; 'I denied the charge,' and all that sort of thing, and you may say that in nearly all cases the Police present will say he did not deny the charge." Q. 52598

Sixthly, he complained that in cases where a prisoner was charged with drunkenness there was often undue delay in letting him out on bail. The suggestion he made was that by keeping a prisoner in the cells for a long time it was made more difficult for him to prove that he was sober when arrested. Referring to the case of a woman who had been arrested at about two o'clock in the afternoon, and was kept in the station till six o'clock or afterwards, he said:— Q. 52623.

"My suggestion is that that would allow time for her to get sober according to the Policeman's idea, and the next day it would be most difficult, unless the woman had a first rate character, as happened in this particular case, for her to prove that she was not drunk at two o'clock because she was kept till seven o'clock before she was released and allowed to go and see a doctor." Q. 52636.

Later on, he said:—

"I cannot say whether that is a general thing or not, but I think the Police have got an idea that if a person is allowed out too soon they will be able first of all to go and see a doctor and begin to see witnesses in order to prepare their defence for the next morning—that is my idea—so that the greater and the more obstacles they can put in the way of persons under arrest getting up their cases to defend themselves the better chance they stand of getting a conviction." Q. 52640.

Seventhly, he said:—

"I think the Magistrates ought not to allow previous convictions to be read out in Court, because the officer, as you know, is not sufficiently careful to make sure that all the convictions against John Smith before the Court really refer to the John Smith in his mind; and if an officer brings forward six or seven convictions, and reads them out before the Magistrate comes to a decision, he is bound to go on with it. Then there is another thing. I think all previous convictions should be given on oath, and not simply read out by a Policeman at the back of the Court. He should be sworn and put into the witness-box." Q. 52643.

Eighthly, he also complained that in some instances prisoners have asked for a doctor and that no doctor has been brought to them.

Those, as we understand the evidence, are the principal general charges which Mr. Timewell has to bring against the Police.

As to the second part of Mr. Timewell's evidence, he handed in a list of twelve suggestions put forward on the part of his Society, which we have caused to be printed in the Appendix, and to some of which we shall have to refer in the course of discussing our recommendations. Appendix, p. x

Evidence from Provincial Cities.

§ 21. The interesting and valuable evidence given by the head Constables of Liverpool, Leeds, and Glasgow, does not directly touch upon the manner in which the Metropolitan Police discharge their duties. It discloses the fact that the fundamental principles of the Police system of these great cities are, to all intents and purposes, identical with those according to which the Metropolitan system is established and carried on. In regard to Glasgow an important difference is disclosed.

In the Metropolis and elsewhere in this country the burden of prosecution is thrown upon the Constable who makes the charge just as it is in the case of some private individual who procures the arrest of an alleged offender without warrant with the assistance of a Constable, and then makes a charge at the police-station. In regard to offences punishable summarily, the process which gives jurisdiction to the Court is either by the laying of an information, whether by a Constable or a private individual, followed by the issue of a summons from the Court to the accused, directing his appearance before the Court, or, in cases where power of summary apprehension exists, by the attendance before the Court of the Constable who has effected the arrest, and his information on oath that an offence has been committed. In either case, the person making the charge is under an obligation to prosecute the case in the name of the King.

The system in Scotland, which is different, was admirably explained to us by the Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, the present Lord Advocate; and, in view of some observations that we have to make below, we extract a passage from his evidence which fully explains the system in vogue in the adjacent country :—

Q. 51971. "It might, in the first place, I think, be of help to you if I stated in a few sentences what I consider to be the broad distinction between the two systems of criminal jurisprudence in the two countries. That distinction arises in this way. In England there is not infrequently—in fact, I understand very frequently—the system of private prosecution. In Scotland that system, I may say, is substantially unknown. The general rule of the Scotch jurisprudence is that when an offence is committed, it is committed against Society, and that Society protects itself through the public officers whom I shall mention; and in this way a system of public prosecution universally prevails. It may have certain disadvantages (I do not know them), but at all events, you will agree that it has this advantage, that it eliminates from criminal prosecution all idea of the wreaking of private vengeance and all those suggestions of personal antagonisms or hostilities which may be mixed up with, and are always, at least conjecturally, mixed up with private prosecution. Now the head of all that system is the Lord Advocate for the time being, and the Lord Advocate in these matters of criminal jurisprudence represents His Majesty; and in the language of Hume, who is our great authority, in the 2nd Volume of the 1844 Edition, at p. 130, you will find the situation stated with accuracy thus: 'Prosecution at the instance of the Lord Advocate' (then he defines it) 'the public accuser who insists in the name of the King, and for His Majesty's interest in the execution of his laws, and in the tranquility and welfare of his people.' That is the situation of the Lord Advocate. That being the authority with which the Lord Advocate is vested, you can see for yourselves that to carry it out executively demands a staff. In my own case, being engaged largely in Parliamentary duties and administrative work, I do not attend in Court except in cases of extreme gravity, such as serious murders, poisoning, and the like of that; those cases fortunately in our country are very rare, but I have, with regard to cases even of gravity, the great advantage of the assistance of the Solicitor-General for Scotland, who acts in criminal matters as my Advocate-Depute, and who has to pass as Advocate-Depute his commission before the Court, and in that capacity, being named the Solicitor-General for Scotland, he is at the head of my Advocates-Depute. Then there are in addition, four salaried gentlemen who act as Advocates-Depute for Scotland; they receive a salary from the Crown of £700 a year; they are appointed by me; and they have certain travelling allowances when they go upon circuit. But the development in recent years in Glasgow has been so great that it has for many years been the habit to appoint what is called an extra Advocate-Depute for the Western Circuit. He has a salary amounting to so much per circuit, but in all it reaches about £300 a year, and, as he is a rising man, I make it a point in Crown consultations to bring the Advocate-Depute for the West, as he is called, into consultation, along with the Solicitor-General, the four Advocates-Depute, and myself. Now these four Advocates-Depute have Scotland partitioned out amongst them. There is the Western Circuit, the Northern Circuit, and so on; there is a rota of Advocates-Depute, and they take, we will say, three months apiece on the particular circuit. The reason of rotation is that upon the West there always is more business, and sometimes on the North there is more business than on the South, and by taking three months they average up their official time in that way. That brings us, you see, to myself as the centre of the various districts of Scotland through the Advocates-Depute. The next point upon which I know this Commission is anxious to have information is what is the position of Scotland in its minor units. Now, that position is covered by each county having a Procurator Fiscal. The Procurator Fiscal, be it observed, is also my Depute. He, too, in a minor and local sense, represents the King's interest and the preservation of peace in the locality. The situation with regard to the counties is this: In former days the Sheriff of the county (I suppose you would call him a County Court Judge) held a high administrative position, traces of which to a considerable extent still remain. One of the traces of that position was that he was the person who appointed the Procurator Fiscal. Now that has been seen to be incorrect in point of principle for this simple reason—that once the Procurator Fiscal in the county is appointed, the person to whom he is responsible for the discharge of his duty, and the person from whom he takes his instructions with regard to prosecution, is the Lord Advocate. Accordingly, with the consent of all parties, if I may bring you up to date, I obtained the other evening in the House of Commons the assent of the House to a Sheriffs' Courts Bill, and in Sections 22, 23, and 24 of that Bill, which I hope within a fortnight or three weeks' time will become part of the law, I have transferred the appointment of the Procurator Fiscal to myself. That is done with the entire consent of all concerned, because the principle is (I have put in the words: 'from and after the passing of this Act,' and so I propose to legislate, if Parliament gives assent to the proposal) that the right of appointing to the office of Procurator Fiscal should be vested in the Lord Advocate. He being thus appointed by me, the position will be the same, his duties being, as I have already explained, duties flowing from the King's Advocate, namely, the person holding my office."

Mr. Stevenson, the Head Constable of Glasgow, explained to us the way in which this system worked in that City. There is a Procurator Fiscal appointed, as described by the Lord Advocate, who is entirely independent of the Municipal Government of the City. All proceedings against persons accused of criminal offences are commenced technically by an Information laid by him, but as it is impossible for him to attend personally to all the numerous petty cases that occur, such as street offences, analogous to those coming within our Terms of Reference, he delegates his duties to the persons in charge of the various police-stations in the City. These officers are members of the Glasgow Police Force, occupying a position analogous to that of an Inspector under the Metropolitan organisation, but are called Lieutenants. There is at all times such a Lieutenant in attendance at a police-station, and when a Constable or other person brings in a prisoner it is his duty to accept or to refuse the charge. If he accepts the charge, he as a Depute of the Procurator Fiscal becomes the prosecutor in the Court of Summary Jurisdiction: he, and not the Constable who made the charge, becomes the prosecutor.

The practical result of the two systems is very much the same. Both the Metropolitan and the Scottish procedure result in the accused being brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and there the matter is dealt with in substantially the same way in both countries.

But there is this difference in regard to the proceedings in Court to which we wish to call particular attention. In the Scottish Courts the Lieutenant of Police as deputy of the Procurator Fiscal has the right to conduct the proceedings, that is to say, to address the Court and to examine and cross-examine the witnesses, if he thinks fit to exercise his right. According to the English system, which imposes the duty of prosecuting upon the arresting Constable, his superior officer cannot be heard because he is not a party to the proceedings and therefore, but for the vigilance of the Magistrate, the prosecutor may be placed at some disadvantage in cases where the prisoner or defendant is represented by Counsel or Solicitor.

Major Tarry informed us that at Leeds he had been impressed by the difficulties in which the Police are sometimes placed by the rule that only the informant (i.e., in practice the Constable who has made the charge) is allowed to conduct the case in the Police Court, and that he had attempted to get over the difficulty by making superior officers in important cases lay their own information; and he told us that he had recently issued a short Instruction upon the point. He said:—

"I feel, rightly or wrongly, that to impose upon Constables the responsibility of conducting their own cases in the Police Court is not quite fair, and I think also it is bad from the sense of responsibility. I think we superior officers of Police are apt to think that this is a matter which immediately concerns the Constables, and does not so immediately concern ourselves, and in that way our responsibility to the public is not quite, perhaps, sufficiently brought home to us in cases such as I have mentioned. I cannot see (and I say it with all respect to you) in a case where legal advice has not been called in on the part of the Police, and it is a Police Information, any difficulty in a superior officer of Police being given a locus standi to conduct the case and to examine the witnesses, instead of having, as he does at present, to sit there mute; he has no right to open his lips, and he sees his case perhaps being blundered and mismanaged by a very well-meaning but young and inexperienced Constable." Q 39342

He said that he did not suggest that the Superintendent who at Leeds is the officer, who attends to watch the proceedings on behalf of the Head Constable, should intervene in every case, or that legal assistance should be always retained, because he said:—

"There are perhaps hundreds and thousands of cases which occur where no question arises, and the expense involved would be enormous of always having a Solicitor or Counsel in attendance for some of the trivial cases that we have day after day in the Police Court." Q. 39344

He suggested, therefore, that the Superintendent representing the Police should be given a locus standi, and have the right to address the Court:—

"Examine the witnesses, and really assume the responsibility of conducting the case, instead of placing it on the shoulders of a Constable, who, I think, is overweighted in those matters." Q. 39345

In this connection one of the learned Magistrates (Mr. Horace Smith) made a statement which suggests that he feels that sometimes Police Officers are placed in an unduly difficult position through not having legal assistance in the conduct of the case. He said:—

"I do not know how far it can be done, I hope it is not an odd thing for me to say, but I think that the Police require some protection in the Magistrate's Court; that is to say, that the defendant is Q. 44463 now a witness, and supposing that the witness makes allegations against the Police, who is to cross-examine and who is to protect the Police against these aspersions that are made? I can hardly do it from the Bench. I cannot undertake to cross-examine all the witnesses on behalf of the Police; I do not think that would be right, and the Policeman cannot do it himself, because he is not educated sufficiently to cross-examine the witnesses, and therefore it is left with the charges made against the Police which they are unable to meet. Of course, if charges of that sort are made against the Police, I remand the prisoner, and say that somebody must appear from the Chief Commissioner's staff to cross-examine the witness."— though other Magistrates expressed the opinion that their own action on the Bench was a sufficient safeguard for the Police.

We shall have some remarks to make upon this matter in the final part of our Report, and we need not dwell upon it further in this place.

Evidence as to the City of London Police.

§ 22. Captain Nott Bower, who has been Commissioner of Police for the City of London since 1902, after a lengthy experience as Chief Constable, first of Leeds and then of Liverpool, was invited by us to give his views upon the questions which we had suggested to the learned Magistrates and to the Chief Constables to whom we have referred.

Notwithstanding that Captain Nott Bower is the head of the Force, and in very intimate relations with the Metropolitan Police, we feel bound to attach very considerable weight to the high but carefully-worded testimony which he gave as to the manner in which the Metropolitan Police deal with street offences. He said:—

Q. 47871. "I have had a knowledge of their work generally, and I have naturally felt a strong interest in observing it for the last twenty-five years, and for the last five, during the time I have been Commissioner in the City, of course, I have had a very intimate and constant knowledge. I am convinced that the duties, generally of the Metropolitan Police, are performed with intelligence, discretion, consideration, and trustworthiness. In saying this, of course, I admit there have been errors of judgment and some black sheep occasionally. If that were not so, the Police Force would be more than human, but I do not hesitate to say that if you take any other class of the community—even the higher professions, such as the Army, the Navy, the Law, or the Church—I do not believe you could find any body of 16,000 men, and subject their actions to close scrutiny over a very large number of years, who would come out of that scrutiny with a better record than the Metropolitan Police do. I have seen them under all sorts of circumstances, their tempers often very severely tried, and I must say I have the greatest admiration for the way in which they perform their duty, and I have an absolute faith in their honesty and trustworthiness."

Captain Nott Bower was good enough to explain the organisation of the City of London Police Force, and their relations with the Force with which we are concerned. We find nothing in his evidence which leads us to believe that in point of general efficiency the Metropolitan Police Force compares unfavourably with that of the City of London, or that the ordinary officers or Constables in the former are at all inferior in any respect to those of the latter.

As to the difficulties and dangers attending the execution of their duty by Constables when they have to deal with drunken and violent prisoners, or to effect the arrests of criminals in dangerous quarters of London, the evidence of Captain Nott Bower confirms that which we have received from other witnesses.

He also described a system of self-defence which the Constables of the City of London Force are taught when they join the Force. The essence of the system, of course, is to teach the Constables certain methods and tricks by means of which a violent man may be overpowered by the skilful application of force instead of the more usual and natural process.

Division II

STATISTICAL INFORMATION AS TO THE THREE CLASSES OF OFFENCES.

Returns Supplied by Police Authorities.

§ 1. In the course of our Inquiry we have been supplied by the Metropolitan Police Authorities with a large number of returns containing statistics relating to apprehensions for Drunkenness, Disorder, and Solicitation in the Street and to other matters relevant to our Inquiry, and we give in the Appendix a complete list of the returns which we have received from them. (Table II.) Appendix p. x.

These returns are derived from official sources, and may be roughly classified according as they were compiled for the information (1) of the Royal Commission, (2) of the Commissioner of Police, or (3) of Parliament. We think it will be seen from Table II. that the returns for the most part do not require to be dealt with in our Report. Those in Class (1), while affording us valuable assistance in our Inquiry, have mostly served their purpose now that we have arrived at our conclusions. Those in Class (2) we have decided in the public interest to treat as confidential documents and not to publish, though we shall presently have something to say about the matters dealt with. Of those in Class (3), it will, we think, be sufficient for our purposes if we set out in the Appendix to our Report the Returns numbered 7, 21, 22 and 26 respectively in the above-mentioned Table, which we shall refer to by those numbers, leaving the other returns in this Class to be published (so far as we think desirable) with the Minutes of Evidence. Appendix, pp. xii-xix.

We have also been supplied with certain returns relating to police action in the following places, viz.:—the City of London, Liverpool, Leeds, and Glasgow, in regard to the three classes of street offences with which we are concerned, and we shall have occasion to refer later to these returns, except those for Glasgow, which, owing to the different procedure there, cannot be easily used for comparative purposes.

Statistics as to Arrests for Street Offences.

§ 2. We now turn to Return 7. This Return shows the number of apprehensions with results for prostitution, drunkenness or drunk and disorderly conduct, and disorderly conduct only, during the years 1883 to 1905. It gives thus a bird's-eye view of police action in these matters extending back a quarter of a century from the present day, but for our purpose it is unnecessary to consider in detail the figures for any year earlier than 1901. Taking the years 1901 to 1905, the apprehensions for prostitution have risen year by year from 2,409 in 1901 to 4,206 in 1905; the apprehensions for drunkenness or drunk and disorderly conduct rose year by year from 49,685 in 1901 to 60,899 in 1904, but declined to 59,189 in 1905 (and it may be added, though it is outside our Table, that there was a further decline to 55,515 in 1906), and the apprehensions for disorderly conduct only have risen year by year from 7,464 in 1901 to 11,375 in 1905. In connection with the increases in apprehensions, it must be remembered that the estimated population in 1901 was 6,678,808, and in 1905 was 7,086,638, the annual increment amounting roughly to 100,000. Appendix, p. xii.

With regard to drunkenness, as has been pointed out, there was no power of arrest for simple drunkenness until the Licensing Act, 1902, gave power of apprehension in the case of persons found drunk and incapable, see ante, p. 29 and it was to be expected that the year 1903 would show some rise in the apprehensions for drunkenness. The actual rise was from 50,813 in 1902 to 59,714 in 1903, being a rise of 8,901 or 17 per cent. Unless the activity of the police has been wholly misdirected in these matters, we cannot but regard the figures in Return 7 as conclusively showing the need in the interests of good order for constant vigilance and energy on their part in dealing with street offences.

Percentage of Discharges to Arrests.

§ 3. We have worked out the percentage of discharges to arrests in each of the three classes of street offences for each of the five years 1901—1905, and the following Table shows the results :—

TABLE showing the percentage of Discharges to Arrests in cases of Prostitution, Drunkenness or Drunken and Disorderly Conduct, and Disorderly Conduct only during the Years 1901 to 1905.

Year.	Prostitution.				Drunkenness or Drunken and Disorderly Conduct.				Disorderly Conduct.
	Apprehended.	Convicted.	Discharged.	Percentage to Arrests.	Apprehended.	Convicted.	Discharged.	Percentage to Arrests.	Apprehended.	Convicted.	Discharged.	Percentage to Arrests.
1901 - -	2,409	2,135	274	11.4	49,685	41,657	8,019	16·2	7,464	4,606	2,857	38·3
1902 - -	2,949	2,720	227	7.8	50,813	43,298	7,505	14·8	7,588	4,790	2,796	36·9
1903 - -	3,153	2,907	245	7.8	59,714	52,958	6,748	11·3	9,947	6,566	3,377	34·0
1904 - -	3,625	3,349	272	7.6	60,899	54,544	6,350	10·4	11,094	7,638	3,454	31·1
1905 - -	4,026	3,772	252	6.3	59,189	53,905	5,276	8·9	11,375	8,078	3,294	29·0

It appears to us that these results are on the whole very favourable to the police. The percentage of discharges has declined from year to year in all the three classes of cases, falling from 11·4 per cent. in 1901 to 6·3 in 1905 in cases of prostitution, and from 16·2 per cent. in 1901 to 8·9 in 1905 in cases of drunkenness and drunken and disorderly conduct, and from 38·3 per cent. in 1901 to 29 in 1905 in cases of disorderly conduct only; and this notwithstanding the increase, generally speaking, in the number of apprehensions in all three classes of cases. Of course, the fact that a prisoner is discharged does not necessarily reflect on the constable who made the arrest; the magistrate always gives the prisoner the benefit of any doubt, and the case may be dismissed because it is not proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the offence had been committed, or on account of extenuating circumstances, personal to the prisoner or otherwise, and the constable be in no way to blame. We think therefore that the above figures tend to confirm the view that the police act with efficiency and discretion in regard to prostitution and drunkenness or drunken and disorderly conduct. The figures with regard to simple disorderly conduct are less satisfactory, but we think that this is mainly due to the fact that in ordinary cases of this class it is the practice of the magistrate merely to bind over the prisoner to keep the peace, and, since 1893, persons so bound over appear in the official statistics as discharged; see Note to Return 7. Applying these figures, as we are now doing, as a test of the propriety of police action, we consider that cases of simple disorderly conduct in which prisoners have been bound over ought to be counted, for our present purpose, not as discharges but as convictions. In our opinion, therefore, these figures, though at first sight unfavourable to the police, do not give true data for forming a conclusion, and ought to be taken into consideration, if at all, only after making allowance for magisterial leniency and statistical method.

Appendix, p. xiii.

We have also worked out the percentage of discharges to arrests in regard to the total number of cases of all kinds summarily dealt with for each of the eight years 1887-1890 and 1903-1906, and the following Table shows the results. The figures are taken from the Report for 1906 of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

RETURN of the Total Number of Persons apprehended by Metropolitan Police, and of Persons summarily dealt with by Magistrates, and the Percentage of Persons discharged by Magistrates during each of the undermentioned years :—

Year.	Total number of Persons apprehended.	Summarily dealt with by the Magistrates.				Estimated Population.
		Total Number.	Convicted, Held to Bail, Committed to Industrial Schools, &c.	Discharged.	Percentage.
1887 - - -	66,115	62,608	43,409	19,199	30·7	5,476,447
1888 - - -	75,807	72,317	49,606	22,711	31·4	5,590,576
1889 - - -	78,795	75,486	53,281	22,205	29·4	5,707,061
1890 - - -	83,414	80,302	57,557	22,745	27·1	5,825,951
1903 - - -	124,554	120,470	98,583	21,887	18·2	6,880,696
1904 - - -	126,530	122,775	101,428	21,347	17·4	6,983,249
1905 - - -	127,317	123,430	103,362	20,068	16·3	7,086,638
1906 - - -	119,897	115,794	96,335	19,459	16·8	7,191,018

Here, as with the statistics, which we have considered relating only to the three classes of street offences, the striking feature, whether we compare year with year or the earlier series of years with the later, is the increase, generally speaking, in the number of apprehensions with a concomitant decline in the percentage of discharges. No doubt, the constant increase in the number of arrests may be partly accounted for by the creation of offences under new Acts of Parliament and the Bye-laws of County Councils and other Local Authorities within the Metropolitan Police

District (cp. ante, p. 32), but we think that the figures point unmistakeably to continuous improvement in the way in which the Force do their work, an improvement which is appreciable from year to year, and remarkable when we compare the two series of years. We observe that in 1906 there was a small rise in the percentage of discharges and a decided fall in the number of arrests.

We thought that it would be some test of the amount of discrimination shown by the police in making apprehensions if we could compare the percentages of discharges over a series of years in cases summarily dealt with and in the more serious cases where the prisoner was committed for trial, and the following Table shows the percentages in those two categories of cases for each of the years 1902-1906 :—

TABLE of Persons summarily dealt with by Magistrates and of Persons committed for trial and the Percentage of Persons discharged during each of the under-mentioned years.

SUMMARILY DEALT WITH BY THE MAGISTRATES.

Year.	Total Number.	Convicted, Held to Bail, Committed to Industrial Schools, etc.	Discharged.	Percentage.
1902	108,429	86,415	22,014	20·3
1903	120,470	98,583	21,887	18·2
1904	122,775	101,428	21,347	17·4
1905	123,430	103,362	20,068	16·3
1906	115,794	96,335	19,459	16·8

COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

Year.	Total Number.	Convicted.	Acquitted, Bills not found, etc.	Percentage.
1902	3,696	3,087	609	16·5
1903	4,006	3,322	684	17·1
1904	3,686	3,167	519	14·1
1905	3,807	3,176	631	16·6
1906	4,050	3,420	630	15·5

As might be expected, the percentage is lower as a rule in the cases of persons committed for trial, the percentage of discharges in summary trials varying from 3.8 per cent. more than that in trials after committal in 1902, when the difference was greatest, to 0·3 per cent. less in 1905, when the difference was least. It may, we think, be said that the above figures show at any rate that the police do not exercise the power of apprehension recklessly with regard to offences punishable summarily, and such difference as there is in the percentages of discharges in the two categories of trials is to some extent at least to be attributed to the fact that prisoners are only committed for trial by the magistrate after a primâ facie case has been established in proceedings before him.

COMPARISON BETWEEN METROPOLIS AND OTHER CITIES.

Appendix p. XIV.

4 We now turn to Return 21. This Return gives particulars with respect to charges (a) preferred by police, (b) preferred by private persons, refused at Police Stations within the Metropolitan Police District during the years 1904, 1905, and the six months ended 30th June, 1906. In the following Table we give a summary of the figures in this Return, so far as they relate to the three classes of offences with which we are concerned, and the percentage of discharges to arrests in each of the years 1904 and 1905.

TABLE showing the Percentage of Charges of Drunkenness (including Drunken and Disorderly Conduct), Disorderly Conduct, and Solicitation refused at Metropolitan Police Stations during the years 1904 and 1905.

Year.	Offence.	Apprehension.	Total Refused Charges.
			Number.	Percentage to Arrests.
1904	Drunkenness	60,899	131	0·21
	Disorderly Conduct	11,094	117	1·05
	Prostitution	3,625	7	0·19
1905	Drunkenness	59,189	131	0·22
	Disorderly Conduct	11,375	106	0·93
	Prostitution	4,026	13	0·32
	Number of Refused Charges for 6 months, ended 30th June, 1906.
	Drunkenness	–	61	–
	Disorderly Conduct	–	47	–
	Prostitution	–	1	–

Comparing with the above Table the Returns put in by Major G. G. Tarry, Chief Constable of Leeds, and Mr. Leonard Dunning, Head Constable of Liverpool, we find that in Leeds the figures are as follows :—

RETURNS submitted by Major G. G. TARRY, Chief Constable of Leeds, showing the Percentage of Charges of Drunkenness, &c., Refused in the City of Leeds during the Years 1904, 1905 and 1906.

CHARGES REFUSED.

The charges refused during the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 are as follows :—

	1904.	1905.	1906.
Drunkenness	19	17	12
Disorderly Conduct	–	1	–
Solicitation	–	1	–

ARRESTS.

The total number of arrests for these offences is as follows :—

	1904.	1905.	1906.
Drunkenness	2,204	2,181	1,764
Disorderly Conduct	18	18	19
Solicitation	247	186	38

PERCENTAGE OF CHARGES REFUSED.

The percentage of charges refused to the number of arrests is as follows :—

	1904.	1905.	1906.
Drunkenness	0·94	0·77	0·68
Disorderly Conduct	–	5·55	–
Solicitation	–	0·53	–

and in Liverpool the figures are as follows:—

RETURN submitted by Mr. LEONARD DUNNING, Head Constable of the City of Liverpool, showing the Percentage of Charges of Drunkenness, &c., Refused in the City of Liverpool during the Years 1905 and 1906.

REFUSED CHARGES.

Offence.	Arrests (including Refused Charges).	Total Refused Charges.		Number of Charges Refused on grounds that proceedings might be taken on Summons.
		Number.	Percentage to arrests.	Number.	Percentage to arrests.
		1905.
Drunkenness	7,566	56	0·74	13	0·17
Disorderly Conduct	3,643	154	4·23	118	4·24
Prostitution	1,880	6	0·32	—	—
		1906.
Drunkenness	7,946	73	0·92	15	0·19
Disorderly Conduct	3,388	167	4·93	145	4·28
Prostitution	1,576	7	0·44	1	—

The only noteworthy differences between the percentages for the Metropolis and those for the great cities of Liverpool and Leeds would appear to be in respect of arrests for disorderly conduct, as to which the percentage of refused charges in the year 1905 was 5·55 in Leeds and 4·23 in Liverpool, as compared with 0·93 in the Metropolis; and in the year 1906 while there were none in Leeds the percentage was 4·93 in Liverpool. Apart from these figures as to disorderly conduct, the percentage of refused charges in all three cases is extremely small, not exceeding (except in one instance where the percentage is 1·05) one per cent. A Return submitted by Captain J. W. Nott Bower, Commissioner of Police of the City of London, seems to show that charges are more freely refused by Officers in charge of Police Stations in the City of London. The conditions of the City and its population are so peculiar, so different from those of any other urban entity, that we hesitate to draw any general conclusion from the figures relating to the City of London alone, and we prefer to set out those figures without comment. They are as follows:—

PROPORTION OF IMPROPER ARRESTS TO TOTAL NUMBER.

§ 5. We desire to draw attention to Return 22. This Return shows the number of arrests by the Metropolitan Police Force in each of the years 1903, 1904, and 1905, and the number of cases in which proceedings were taken against members of the Force in respect of such arrests, or in which after inquiry of a disciplinary character they were found not to have been justified. Appendix, p. xviii.

Taking 1905, which presents no exceptional feature, and is the last year dealt with, we find that in 1905 the arrests numbered 127,317, the cases of proceedings against members of the Force were 4, and the cases in which arrests were found, as the result of disciplinary inquiries, not to have been justified were 24, that is to say ·023 per cent., or about 1 to every 5,000 arrests. We are struck both by the immense number of the arrests and the small number of cases in which the Commissioner found that the arrest was not justified. We think that it is clear that an improper arrest is a rare occurrence, and while recognising the gravity of even isolated cases of abuse by members of the police of the power of apprehension, are confirmed by this Return in the opinion that this power is honestly exercised by the Force as a whole and in the vast majority of cases, and that there is no cause for any public disquietude upon this head.

STATISTICS AS TO COMPLAINTS OF BRIBERY.

§ 6. It will be seen from Table II. that we have had before us some Returns giving particulars of complaints to the police authorities against members of the Force for demanding or accepting money or drink (1) from Bookmakers, (2) from Prostitutes or Brothel-keepers, (3) from Licensed Victuallers, and (4) from Restaurant-keepers during the ten years ended 30th June, 1906. Appendix, p. xi.

We are informed on behalf of the Commissioner of Police that these matters would ordinarily be regarded as of a most confidential nature, and we agree that it would be detrimental to the interests of the administration of the Force generally, and therefore contrary to the public interest, that this confidential information should be published. We think, however, that it is our duty to make some observations on these Returns, and we propose to give a summary of the more important figures.

(1) With regard to the relations of the Force with Bookmakers, the complaints received from private persons numbered 548, but of these complaints 340 were against the police generally, and only 208 were complaints against particular constables. Inquiry was made by the Commissioner of Police in most of these 548 cases to ascertain if there was any truth in the complaint, but he found that there was no truth in the great majority of cases. In some 20 cases, however, he held that there was some foundation for the allegation made, and the constables implicated were punished with more or less severity according to the gravity of the offence disclosed. In addition to the complaints aforesaid, 12 complaints were preferred by Superior Officers against members of the Force, and they were all held to be proved. We may refer in this connection to Return 26, showing the amount of fines imposed upon Bookmakers for betting in streets within the Metropolitan Police District during each of the 10 years ended 31st December, 1905, and the total for the 10 years. This total amounts to £127,276, which gives an average of £12,727 per annum, and the fines for 1905 alone were £29,715. It is evident from the figures in this Return that for several years prior to the Street Betting Act, 1906, the business of street bookmaking continued to be extensively carried on notwithstanding the frequent arrests of offenders and the heavy cost of the fines imposed upon them by the magistrates upon conviction. It has, of course, been alleged that there was a regular system of bribery of members of the Force by street Bookmakers, and that it was by collusion with the police that they were able to defy the law. We reserve for the third part of our Report our comment on the allegations which have been made to this effect.

Appendix, p. xix.

(2) With regard to the relations of the Force with Prostitutes and Brothel-keepers, the complaints received from private persons numbered 92, but of these complaints 46 were against the police generally, and 46 were complaints against particular constables. As a result of the steps taken to test the truth of the complaints so made, the allegations were mostly found by the Commissioner of Police to be untrue. In the two or three cases where the complaint was proved, the offence complained of was severely dealt with. In addition there were 13 complaints preferred by Superior Officers, including one of consorting with Prostitutes when off duty, and 12 of relations with Brothel-keepers, and all except 1 of the 13 were held to be proved.

(3) With regard to the relations of the Force with Licensed Victuallers, this is really beyond the limits of our Inquiry. The complaints received from private persons numbered 215, and 154 were against the police generally as against 61 complaints against particular constables. In 17 cases the complaint was substantiated, and the officers were punished. In addition there were 19 complaints by Superior Officers, all of which were proved to be true.

(4) With regard to Restaurant-keepers, there were only 4 complaints by private persons, and 5 complaints by Superior Officers.

The foregoing complaints may also be classified according as they are (1) Authenticated, (2) Anonymous, or (3) Pseudonymous, and it is to be observed that the authenticated complaints are comparatively few, and complaints are for the most part anonymous.

In every other public department it is, we believe, the practice to ignore anonymous communications, but it would appear that complaints as to these matters, whether authenticated or anonymous or pseudonymous, are taken note of and inquired into by the Police Authorities, and where offences are brought home the constables implicated are, generally speaking, suitably punished. The Commissioner of Police, of course, has the services of the Criminal Investigation Department at his disposal, and is therefore in a better position than any other authority for dealing with such complaints.

PART III.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS.

General Observations.

§ 1. Having now reported upon the duties of the Police in dealing with street offences, and set forth the general and statistical evidence which we have been able to obtain upon the matters referred to us, and bearing in mind the results of our investigation of the complaints dealt with in our Reports on Particular Cases submitted herewith, we proceed to state our general conclusions, and to make certain recommendations.

We have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the Metropolitan Police Force, as a whole, discharge their duties in connection with the three classes of offences mentioned in our Terms of Reference with honesty, discretion and efficiency.

The fact that upon the materials before us we must also find that occasionally constables have been guilty of misconduct of various kinds, and of various degrees of seriousness, is one that every person conversant with the difficulty of governing men, and who has had experience of life, would naturally expect. No reasonable man would, in approaching the question of the efficiency of so large a body as the Metropolitan Police, expect that every one of them should on all occasions act with sufficient intelligence and be invariably courteous and good tempered in the discharge of very difficult duties. No one would expect that blunders should never occur, nor that instances of intentional wrongful action should never happen. In fact, it is not reasonably possible, however able and vigilant superior officers may be, to guarantee the absolute efficiency of every member of a body of 17,000 men; and the utmost that can be hoped for is that the instances of individual misconduct should be so few as not to afford any reasonable ground for a lessening of the general confidence of the community in the integrity and efficiency of the Force as a whole.

We have mentioned above the total number of communications received by us containing charges of all kinds against the Police. Having regard to the large population of the Metropolitan Police District (which was in 1901, 6,678,808, and is now well over seven millions), and to the statistics as to the total number of arrests effected each year by members of the Police Force (which has not fallen below 119,000 during any one of the last four years), we think that number is so small as to prove that there exists no cause for believing that there is any habitual tendency to make wrongful or improper apprehensions. As any person who conceived that he had any cause of complaint against the Police in regard to arrest for street offences had a reasonable opportunity of coming before us, we regard the figures as indicating that there can be no widespread dissatisfaction with the conduct of the Police in connection with the matters referred to us. See above,

The statistical evidence which we have obtained seems to us to afford satisfactory proof that instances of positive misconduct on the part of Police Constables are, when one considers the immense number of cases with which they have to deal, so comparatively rare as to give no cause for disquietude.

In considering the figures, one must bear in mind that, large as is the number of cases in which persons are arrested and brought to the police-station, the total of such cases represents only a proportion of those in which the Police intervene for the purpose of maintaining peace and order. Probably in the majority of cases in which a constable, in the exercise of his duty to prevent the commission of offences, warns a person by telling him to move on or by the use of other words of caution, the necessity for further Police action is done away with, and the prudent and well-timed activity of the constable thus prevents the commission of an actual offence.

An arrest once effected, it becomes the duty of the constable to take his prisoner to the police-station, and there, as we have seen, he is at once face to face with a superior officer whose duty it is to refuse or to accept the charge.

The figures we have given above show that in the vast majority of the cases in which a constable prefers a charge it is taken and not refused. It is, however, a mistake to suppose that the refusal of the charge by the Inspector shows, as a matter of course, that the constable is to blame. Constables have generally to exercise the power of arrest for street offences with great promptitude, and it sometimes happens that, when the prisoner is charged at the station, an explanation of the circumstances that led to the constable's interference, which does not involve any misconduct on his part, is disclosed. This often occurs in cases of arrest for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, where the prisoner's appearance and behaviour in the street have been such as might lead an honest observer to come to the conclusion that the cause of his unusual conduct was excessive indulgence in intoxicating liquor, though it becomes plain at the station that he is sober. In all such cases, though the charge is refused, and the refusal is entered in the Refused Charge Book, no real blame can be properly attached to the constable. In considering, therefore, the question whether the percentage of refused charges is so high as to show that the number of arrests improperly made is unduly large, proper allowance must be made for cases in which, though the Inspector does not think it prudent to detain the prisoner, and to bring him before a Magistrate, there has been no breach of duty whatever on the part of the Constable.

So, again, in considering the ratio of the number of cases in which the prisoner is discharged to the number of cases in which prisoners are convicted for these street offences before the Magistrate, similar allowances must be made. All the Magistrates examined before us without exception told us that the mere fact that they discharge a prisoner does not necessarily involve any misconduct on the part of the arresting constable.

The statistics which we have given above, comprising the total number of cases in which prisoners were charged before Magistrates with offences coming within our Terms of Reference, show that the percentages of cases in which the prisoner was discharged were in 1905 (the year before the appointment of this Commission) in cases of arrest for prostitution 6·3, for drunkenness and disorderly conduct 8·9, and disorder simply 29·0. The percentage in cases of prostitution and drunkenness strike us as remarkably low. The higher percentage in cases of disorderly conduct is explained very largely by the fact that in a large proportion of these cases the Magistrate binds over the prisoner and inflicts no fine, or in his discretion simply dismisses the prisoner with an admonition to be of good behaviour in future; and, as we have said above, prisoners so dealt with are in the Official Returns treated as discharged. It should be noticed, too, that in these returns prisoners discharged under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, are similarly treated. It must not be inferred from the figures that there was misconduct in all or in any large number of the cases in which the prisoner was discharged; and without inquiring into the circumstances of each particular case, it would not be safe to conclude that the discharge by the Magistrate implied that the original arrest was unlawful, or, even if the arrest was not technically justifiable, that there was any breach of duty on the part of the constable concerned.

The principal reasons which make it necessary to inquire into the facts of each discharge of a prisoner before using the figures as a basis of generalisation as to the conduct of the Force as a whole are these:—

(1) In dealing with these street offences, the jurisdiction of the Magistrates is one of an eminently discretionary kind. A Judge sitting at the Central Criminal Court trying a prisoner who has been arraigned and pleaded Not Guilty to a charge on an indictment is, if some evidence is given on the part of the Crown that the prisoner has committed a crime for which he is put upon his trial, bound to leave the case to the jury, and to enter their verdict when given upon the Record. In the Metropolitan Police Courts the Magistrate is judge of law and of fact, and, even, if he considers that the offence is proved, he has power under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, Section 16, to discharge the prisoner without punishment; and, even if he thinks that there is some evidence that one of the statutory offences is proved, he may still come to the conclusion, in his discretion, that the evidence does not amount to complete proof of the common statutory offence, and accordingly may dismiss the prisoner with a caution, or bind him over under the powers given to him by his commission as a Justice of the Peace. Whether he discharges the prisoner under Section 16, or simply in the exercise of his discretion, his taking that course is not inconsistent with the arresting constable having exercised a sound discretion in making the arrest, and having given perfectly truthful evidence in Court.

(2) The statutory offences in respect of which a summary power of arrest is given to the Metropolitan Police are intentionally defined in such wide terms that their application to particular cases may involve questions of difficulty upon which difference of opinion may legitimately arise. The words "Drunk," "Disorderly," "Riotous and Indecent Behaviour," "To the Annoyance of the Inhabitants or Passengers," "Threatening, abusive or insulting words," or "Behaviour whereby a breach of the Peace may be occasioned," and so forth, are all of them expressions of such generality that it is difficult to fix the precise logical or grammatical extension of the terms employed, and which may require, in any case, definition. It follows from that that an intelligent constable may honestly believe that the specific acts which he observes, or the words which he hears constitute an offence, while a Magistrate may be of a contrary opinion.

(3) The issue before the Magistrate is whether the prisoner is Guilty or Not Guilty of the offence with which he is charged, and in determining that question, the Magistrate is bound to act in accordance with the principle that the prosecutor is bound to prove the case against the accused beyond all reasonable doubt. The question whether the constable who arrested the prisoner was guilty of misconduct in apprehending him must not be confounded with the issue before the Court.

Furthermore the constable who prosecutes in the Police Court the person whom he has arrested does so subject to the criticism of his Sub-Divisional Inspector or other superior officer who attends the Police Court in accordance with the Regulations to see that the Police do their duty in regard to prosecutions, and also to that of the presiding Magistrate. If the former has reason to believe that the constable has arbitrarily or wrongly exercised his power of arrest, or been guilty of any breach of the Regulations in regard to his treatment of the prisoner, or if he exaggerates the case against the prisoner in order to secure a conviction, it is his duty to report as to the constable's conduct. So, also if the Magistrate in dismissing a case does so on grounds involving the finding that there has been any arbitrary or indiscreet conduct on the part of the constable, or that he has spoken falsely, he usually, in briefly stating his reasons for dismissing the charge, adverts to the conduct of the Police, and it is then the duty of the Inspector at the Police Court to communicate his remarks, in accordance with the Regulations, to the Police authorities.

When these considerations are borne in mind it becomes clear that it is not safe to assume, simply from the fact that the Magistrate discharges a case, that there has been any kind of improper conduct on the part of the arresting constable.

Looking at the statistics which show the percentage of cases in which charges of street offences are dismissed by the Metropolitan Police Magistrates, in the light of these reflections, and of the experience which we have gained by investigating the complaints upon which we report, we are of opinion that they afford no ground whatever for inferring that wrongful arrests are frequent.

When such arrests occur, we believe that they generally do so owing simply to indiscretion or to loss of temper following on mistaken interference by the constable in the intended performance of his duty.

It appears to us that the cases of Mrs. Braham, Baker and Mullins may be taken as typical instances of the way in which constables are led to make improper arrests.

In Mrs. Braham's case, the original intervention of the constable was due to a mistake as to the character of the lady, and the mistake once made led to an unjustifiable arrest because the constable did not see a way of extricating himself from the difficulty in which he found himself placed when the lady became excited and threatened to report him.

In Baker's case the offence, if offence it was, which the constable observed was of so trivial a character under all the circumstances as to make his interference injudicious, and when Baker refused to give his name and address except at the Police Station, and insisted on going to the station, the constable committed the error of arresting him on a charge of being drunk and disorderly.

In the case of Mullins, the complainant annoyed the constable by making an offensive remark under a mistake as to the identity of the constable whom he believed to be a friend, and this led to a loss of temper on the part of the constable which was aggravated when Mullins, instead of remaining quietly at home, sallied forth once again in order to get his number.

In not one of these cases did the constable deliberately plan the arrest of the person concerned, and in all three cases there was conduct on the part of the latter which afforded some pretext for the initial blunder or misconduct of the constable.

We believe that probably, in nearly all the cases in which the magistrate dismisses a case, and in which an accusation of wrongful arrest is brought against the constable, if the matter were investigated, circumstances analogous to those disclosed in these three cases would be found to exist, and that the instances in which a constable arrests a person with malice prepense would be so rare and exceptional as not to afford any ground at all for a generalisation adverse to the integrity of the Metropolitan Police.

It may be added, too, that it is not easy to see why there should be any disposition on the part of an ordinary constable to effect an unnecessary arrest. Every arrest involves some amount of personal risk, and the chance, except in simple cases, where there can be no doubt that an offence has been committed, of the propriety of the arrest becoming a matter of controversy, and, therefore, possibly of censure.

Suggestions were made to us that constables were unduly zealous in making arrests and preferring charges, because, by so doing, they attract the attention of their superior officers, and increase their chance of promotion in the Service.

Upon this point, Sir Edward Henry's remarks seem to us deserving of great attention. He said :—

Q. 56. "I have often seen it stated that a Constable's activity in prosecuting cases affects his promotion. This is quite incorrect. A Constable's activity or otherwise with regard to arresting or prosecuting persons is not taken into account at all in considering the question of promotion. Our rule is that no promotion is given except as the result of an examination held at New Scotland Yard, written and oral, by an Examining Board, consisting of a Chief Constable and four superintendents, supplemented by an examination independently held by the Civil Service Commissioners. During the time that I have been Commissioner I know of only two instances in which promotion was given without such examination, and in one of these the candidate passed in his professional examination but failed before the Civil Service Commission. The number of promotions each year, I may add, would aggregate about 400. So that during the time that I have been Commissioner there have probably been about 1,400 promotions made, and I can only call to memory two
Q. 57. cases in which the examination test was foregone. . . . Every Constable with five years or more blameless service to his credit (formerly it was a little higher, but we have recently promoted men of shorter service) is eligible for promotion and can apply to be promoted to compete at these examinations. I may mention here incidentally that in order to satisfy myself that that Constable possessed the necessary education the Superintendent causes a preliminary examination to be held in the division, and if a man who was anxious to get promotion failed at that preliminary examination he would be told it would be no use his appearing at New Scotland Yard until he had improved his education. I may add that there is no special record kept of the cases in which Constables are concerned. If I wanted to know what work in connection with cases an individual member of the Force had done, I should have to call for a very lengthy and tedious search to be made amongst the registers in order to arrive at the information. Our rule is well known to all the men engaged in the Police Force, and no inducement of any sort or kind is held out to them to be unduly active in relation to arrests or prosecutions of individuals. On the contrary, it is well recognised that the bringing of charges involves much inconvenience to the officers concerned at the time and subsequently, and frequently entails loss of rest. For instance, if a man arrests a person while he is on night duty he goes off that night duty a little before six in the morning, and he has to be at the Police Court at ten o'clock, so he practically loses his rest."

There is, of course, no reason to doubt the accuracy of that statement, and we need only add that we can find nothing in the evidence before us, or in the behaviour of the constables in the cases into which we have inquired, to indicate that there is any over-zeal on their part in making arrests due to the belief that the number of arrests which they might effect would commend them to their superior officers.

We have had no complaints at all from any quarter that constables, either from timidity or laziness or indisposition to take upon themselves the burden of prosecution, neglect their duties, and abstain from effecting arrests, where it may be necessary to do so in the interests of public order.

We think, we may safely say, that, upon the whole, the Metropolitan Police steer with remarkable skill for the middle line between fussy and over-zealous intervention, on the one hand, and timid or negligent inactivity, on the other.

Checks upon Police Action.

§ 2. This is, perhaps, the best place in which to make some observations which have forced themselves upon us in the course of our Inquiry, as to the checks upon misconduct by Police Constables.

Underlying a good many of the suggestions that have been made to us, and of the comments which from time to time appear in the public Press, there appears to be the notion that it is quite an easy matter for a constable to misbehave in any way whenever he pleases. It is, of course, true that an innocent person may be suddenly arrested by a constable in a London street without any provocation and without any adequate justification, and that when taken to the police-station he may find himself in a singularly helpless position. An arrest may be effected there without anyone taking any particular notice of it, and the prisoner would, in the case supposed, probably be quite unable to get the evidence of any witnesses who had seen the arrest or anything that took place before it, to disprove whatever charge the constable might make against him. His position before the Magistrate may, assuming that the arresting constable is dishonest and untruthful, be one of extreme difficulty; and it is possible that even the most careful Magistrate might, if the constable gave his evidence very plausibly, decide against the prisoner. Such a miscarriage of justice due to abuse of authority cannot be absolutely insured against under any system of procedure.

According to our system of summary jurisdiction in the Metropolis, the burden of guarding against the contingency of wrongful arrest is mainly thrown upon the Magistrate, and it is left to his care, experience and skill to judge whether in such a case as the one supposed the constable is to be trusted. It would be absurd to suppose, having regard to the thousands of these petty cases that are dealt with every year in the Metropolitan Police Courts, that occasionally a wrong decision may not be arrived at by a Magistrate, but, if indeed prisoners were often wrongly convicted in these Courts, we may be sure that, when their proceedings are followed by a vigilant Press, and when no class of the community can be described as unduly subservient to or timorous of authority, appeals to the Home Office would multiply indefinitely, and public discontent would make itself felt through countless channels. In fact, as we have mentioned above, though in the year 1906, for instance, the total number of cases in which the defendant was charged with offences punishable summarily amounted to the large aggregate of 115,794, yet in only thirty-four cases was an appeal made to the Home Office by way of complaint against the action of Magistrates, and in only ten of these did the person convicted complain that the decision was wrong. It seems to us, therefore, proved conclusively that wrongful arrests are seldom made.

Whilst we are of opinion that wrongful arrests are rare we think the utmost care should be taken by the police authorities to prevent their occurrence.

So far, however, as the Police are concerned, the checks on misbehaviour by an individual Constable are greater than those who entertain the popular notion to which we have referred imagine. They may be thus briefly stated :—

(1) Every constable has the greatest inducement to adhere strictly to his duty, and to commend himself by civility towards his superior officers, and his comrades, as well as to the members of the general public. He belongs to a Force in which from the comparatively humble rank of an ordinary constable he has the fullest opportunity of rising to almost the highest grade in the Service to which he belongs. Unless there are radical defects in his character, or unless he is unintelligent, the temptations to deviate from the path of duty are very weak as compared with the advantages to be obtained by resisting them and scrupulously obeying the Regulations laid down for his guidance.

(2) Though a constable, for the most part, has to discharge his duty on his own initiative on his beat or his patrol, he is constantly under the watchful surveillance of his Sergeant and the Inspector on duty. The rules of the Service are such that he can never know when or where he may meet a superior officer, and he also knows that should any complaints have been made against him for misconduct of any kind he may be under the observation of plain clothes officers.

(3) He is also aware that any person can easily identify him by his number and the initial of his Division, and that, without a word being said to him, any observer can go to the Police Station and make complaint against him, which is certain to be taken note of, and as to which inquiry will be made.

(4) In case he makes an arrest, he is bound to take his prisoner at once to the nearest Police Station, and there charge him before an Inspector or Station Sergeant, whose duty it is to hear his statement and exercise his discretion as to whether he will accept or refuse the charge, and, in case he takes the latter course, to enter his reasons for so doing in the Refused Charge Book.

Finally, there is the check, already mentioned, imposed by his having to appear in public to prosecute his charge before a Magistrate and in the presence of an Inspector. In this connection we may refer to the Regulation which provides that the Inspector present at a Police Court is to report any misconduct on the part of the Police or any remarks by the Magistrate affecting them. As we construe this rule if a magistrate dismisses a case the Inspector ought, if the circumstances disclosed in Court afford some ground for thinking the arrest was improper, to report the matter. But we understand that in practice no report is made by him unless the Magistrate makes some comment on the conduct of the police concerned. We think that the Inspector, whether the Magistrate in dismissing a charge makes any comment or not on the action of the police, should himself report such a case if there is any ground for thinking that the arrest was one that ought not to have been made.

Q. 10687.

Method of Effecting Arrests and Treatment of Prisoners.

§ 3. The Regulations as to the method of effecting arrests and as to the treatment of prisoners appear to us to be clear and satisfactory.

We have no reason for thinking that the Police effect apprehensions with unnecessary violence, or that, when they have taken their prisoners into custody, they exert greater pressure upon the arms than prudence requires, or twist or move the arms of prisoners so as to cause needless pain. Though some of the Magistrates told us that prisoners do make complaints as to ill-treatment, not one of them referred us to instances in which they believed such complaints to have been well founded. In none of the cases mentioned by Mr. Cluer, and not fully enquired into by us, was any allegation made that there had been anything improper about the way in which the arrest was made, or about the subsequent treatment of the prisoner.

In the cases of special complaints which we have heard, accusations of undue violence either in arresting or in conveying the prisoner to the station were made in four cases, viz., those of Mullins, Andrews, Riley, and Altfuldisch.

In the case of Mullins, where, in our view, the constable had completely lost his temper, we found that the charge was well founded.

Q. 10757. Andrews definitely complained that on the way to the Station the constables twisted his arms up his back very much as high as they could get them, and caused him a great deal of pain. He, however, was undoubtedly a refractory and struggling prisoner, and a witness on whose word we can place no reliance whatsoever, and any pain that he suffered was due to the force properly used to bring him to the station.

Q. 28098. Riley did not allege that his arrest was effected violently, but his complaint was that P.C. Mizen knocked him down with a blow from his fist while they were taking him down Prusom Street, and that then he and P.C. Kemp dragged him along for about two hundred yards. However, we have decided that this accusation was untrue.

Altfuldisch did not suggest that any undue violence was used in arresting him, but he did complain that Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay took hold of his collar and pushed him along violently, and at one point pushed him down and shook him. That Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay did have to push Altfuldisch along, and had a great deal of trouble in getting him to the Station, is perfectly true, but any violence that was used by Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay was made necessary by the extraordinary conduct of Altfuldisch himself on the way to the station. Q. 4939. Q 4940.

Mrs. Braham's complaint was not of undue violence on the part of the constable, but of holding her in an indecent manner, and, as to that, we think she was quite mistaken.

Save, therefore, for the conduct of the constable who arrested Mullins, there is nothing in the cases which we enquired into to afford any ground for the generalisation made by Mr. Timewell, that the Police habitually twist the arms of drunken persons. If there were any substantial ground for thinking that the Police are unnecessarily cruel in exercising their powers, we feel persuaded that others would have come forward and drawn our attention to the fact.

A study of the evidence which we received in Harding's case as to what happened when P.C. Cann arrested Callaghan will show what difficulty there may arise in arresting and conveying to the station a violent and drunken prisoner, especially in and through crowded streets; and the case seems to afford a very good illustration of the way in which the Police discharge their duties under circumstances of extreme provocation without doing any harm at all to the person of the prisoner, for there is absolutely no suggestion that Callaghan when he arrived at the Police Station showed any sign of ill-usage.

At the same time we think it is quite possible that some constables may occasionally give unnecessary pain to prisoners. After all, the business of a constable is a rough one, and all cannot be expected at all times, and under all circumstances, to measure with nicety the amount of force which is necessary. In this connection the personal danger to which constables are exposed in arresting and taking prisoners, especially drunken prisoners, to the station ought not to be overlooked. How serious that danger is, a reference to the Return which we have printed above, and to Mr. Clinton Dent's evidence, will show. See above, pp. 60, 61.

Our conclusion is that the Metropolitan Police, as a rule, arrest and take their prisoners to the Police Station in accordance with the spirit and letter of their instructions, and that the instances in which unnecessary pain is inflicted are extremely rare.

Proceedings in the Charge Room.

§ 4. The Regulations as to the proceedings in the Charge Room, which we have set out in full above, appear to us to be satisfactory in substance, though their wording and their arrangement do not seem so clear as they might be, and compare unfavourably with the analogous Regulations made for the use of the Liverpool Constabulary. As we understand from Sir Edward Henry that the Regulations are undergoing revision we think it unnecessary to make any formal recommendation for their amendment. See p. 38.

We think there is no doubt that the proceedings in the Charge Room are conducted in general with strict propriety. We found that statement not only upon the result of the minute inquiries which we made in hearing the special complaints brought before us, and upon the evidence given by the learned magistrates upon the point, but also upon our examination of the Charge Sheet and Refused Charge Book at several police-stations, and actual observation of the manner in which officers in charge of stations take or refuse charges.

Some doubt has arisen as to the precise nature of the duties imposed upon a station officer before whom a charge is preferred. We have stated our view of his functions above, and it is unnecessary to repeat it here. See above, pp. 40–42.

In cases where the charge preferred by a constable is refused by the officer at the Station it is very properly provided in the Regulations that the reasons for the refusal of the charge are to be entered "as clearly and briefly as possible" in the Refused Charge Book. We regard the strict observance of this Regulation as of the utmost importance; and recommend that the statement of reasons should be sufficiently full to enable the Superintendent or other superior officer who examines the book to form a judgment as to whether an inquiry into the conduct of the constable who effected the arrest is desirable.

There is only one other important detail of the proceedings in the Charge Room which seems to require some comment, and that is the treatment of statements made by a prisoner in the Charge Room. The Regulations contain three provisions upon the matter.

By Regulation 198—

White Book, p. 252. "A statement made by a prisoner when charged at a station is to be accurately written down at the time by the officer on duty and reported to the magistrate who hears the case."

White Book, p. 252. By Regulation 203 it is provided that the statements of witnesses and any statements made by the person charged are to be patiently and attentively heard.

By Regulation 209 :—

White Book, p. 353 "The charge as entered upon the sheet is always to be read over to the prisoner, not with a view of extracting an answer, but to inform him of the nature of the offence with which he is charged, but any observation he makes is to be noted and attended to."

Regulation 198 is quite general in its terms, and appears to refer to all prisoners, whatever may be the nature of the offence with which they are charged, and to apply not only to statements made after a charge has been accepted and read over to the prisoner, but also to those made before the charge is accepted. The words in Regulation 198, "When charged at a station" are not, as it seems to us, to be construed as meaning when the charge is "read over to the prisoner" in compliance with Regulation 209. We are told, however, that in practice Regulation 198 is only followed where the prisoner is charged with an indictable offence, and that it is not the custom for the Inspector or other officer taking the charge in a case punishable summarily to take down the statements made by the prisoner in the dock; and, as we gather, it is not usual to take down the answer, if any, made by the prisoner when a charge of an offence punishable summarily is accepted and the charge sheet is read over to him.

Sir Edward Henry told us that though such an instruction is given (i.e., an instruction to take down anything the accused may say), in practice it is not advantageous to give effect to it, and questioned the necessity of a strict adherence to the Regulation in petty cases. He said :—

Q. 52519 "The best practice is for the officer in charge of the case to make a note in his pocket-book of any statement the accused person may make, because he is then in a position to prove that when he appears before the Magistrate at the Police Court. If you had to depend on the station officer it would mean that the station officer would have to go to the Police Court; and I might mention that 25 per cent. of our stations send their cases to two Police Courts; and so if a station officer were required to attend to prove the statements made by the accused he might be required to appear at two different Police Courts at the same time. In addition to that, he is a man who is on duty at night to six in the morning, and if he had to attend at the Police Court he would have no sleep, and therefore we should require extra station officers; we should have to double them."

There is, of course, nothing in the Regulations forbidding the Police Constable who prefers a charge to make a note in his book of anything said by the prisoner in the charge room, in order to refresh his memory upon the point when appearing at the Police Court to substantiate his charge. An entry in the notebook of the constable gives no added guarantee of his good faith, and supposing that the accuracy of the entry, if referred to in Court, is challenged by the prisoner, though the Magistrate may remand the case for the attendance of the Inspector, yet, unless the latter has taken down the statement at the time, having regard to the number of cases with which he has to deal, he may not remember it and even if he does his evidence will not have the same weight as if it were supported by reference to an entry made at the time in the course of his duty.

We can well understand the difficulty of carrying out the Regulation that a note is to be made of anything that is said by a prisoner in the charge room in cases in which the prisoner is charged with drunkenness, or with being drunk and disorderly, as in a very large percentage indeed of such cases the prisoner is either so much affected by drink or so excited that his statements are incoherent, or too rapid, or confused to be recorded with complete accuracy. But no such consideration applies to the case of a prisoner who is charged with an offence in which drunkenness is not an element (e.g., solicitation under the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 11.)

We see also that the obligation of taking down the prisoner's statement in the docks quite fully in the numerous cases of street offences would impose great additional labour upon the officer taking the charge, but any such additional labour could be met by increasing the staff where necessary.

We think that though probably in the immense majority of cases the statements of the prisoner, unless they amount to express or implied admission of guilt, are not likely to throw very much light on the question of the prisoner's guilt or innocence, they may become, notwithstanding the opinion of the Inspector or the Station Sergeant at the moment, of very great and even crucial importance. Take, for instance, the case of Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette, where the allegations made by them in the dock were certainly matters relevant to the case.

Sir Edward Henry suggested two difficulties in applying Regulation 198 to prisoners charged with the offences with which we are concerned :—(1) That there would be a great additional burden thrown on the officer taking the charge, and an unnecessary duplication of notes of the prisoners' statements by the arresting constable entering the statements in his note book, and the Inspector also taking down in writing what the prisoner says ; and (2) That it was impossible for an Inspector, unless the staff at the station was largely increased, to attend at the Police Court.

The second objection is sufficiently answered by the fact that compliance with Regulation 198 would not make the Inspector a necessary witness except in a very small percentage of cases. If the magistrate, after listening to the evidence of the Constable, and after the latter has, if necessary, read out the statements of the prisoner from his note book, is satisfied, there would be no necessity for the attendance of the Inspector ; but if, in the opinion of the Magistrate, there is any doubt as to what was really said by the prisoner in the charge room, and the Magistrate thinks that the matter is one which ought to affect his mind in arriving at his judgment, he can then do what he does now, namely, remand the case for the attendance of the Inspector, and then the Inspector would be able to refer him to what he himself took down at the time when the prisoner was in the charge room with much greater effect than at present.

With regard to the first difficulty suggested by Sir Edward Henry, we have only to say that however great the burden may be, and even if it should be, as we think, quite possible that additional station officers might be required by a rigid adherence to the rules, we think that the interests of justice are paramount to considerations of convenience and economy. So, while recognising the force of what Sir Edward Henry said, and the difficulty which may arise from the condition of the prisoner in cases in which drunkenness is an element in the offence with which the prisoner is charged, we think that statements made by prisoners charged with these offences should be treated as nearly as possible in the same way as those made where the offence is indictable.

Sir Edward Henry made the suggestion that duplication of documents might be avoided by the Inspector initialling the entry in the constable's note book. We think this by no means an unreasonable suggestion, provided that the entry in the constable's note book is read out in the prisoner's presence, and thereupon forthwith initialled by the Inspector also in his presence ; and we are inclined to think that in cases of drunkenness and disorderly conduct the Inspector might have the power, in his discretion, of taking that course instead of himself writing down the statements made by the prisoner.

With regard to solicitation cases, we think, however, that the existing Regulations ought to be scrupulously observed.

In making these observations we do not wish to be understood as suggesting that undue importance is to be attached to what prisoners may say in the charge-room. It is for the Magistrate to consider their relevancy and effect. What we are desirous of is that the magistrates shall be afforded evidence of what is said by the prisoner in the charge-room which is as complete and accurate as possible. We are not concerned with the question whether adherence to the Regulation in question would tell in favour of the person charging or the person charged, and are thinking only of the interests of justice.

In former days it is perfectly clear that, speaking broadly, all classes of the Community regarded conviction for these street offences as matters of little gravity.

The Magistrate himself looked upon his jurisdiction rather as that of a bonus pater familias administering the necessary discipline to those under his control with the object of keeping his household in a peaceable and decent state, and not as a judge trying, with pomp and circumstance, crime; and it must be remembered that in those days the Magistrate at the Police Office had under his control his own body of Police, and his jurisdiction in these classes of offence was looked upon as closely connected with his executive duty of keeping the peace in the Metropolis. At the present time a Magistrate in a Metropolitan Police Court is only in name a Police Magistrate; he has no special control over members of the Force, and no connection with it; he is the Judge of an independent Court of first instance, with a very varied and extensive jurisdiction over the more trivial criminal cases. The proceedings of the Court are conducted in public, and are widely reported in the newspapers, and a conviction for one of these street offences is published, whenever it is likely to interest other persons, quite as widely as if the cases were tried at the Central Criminal Court. Owing to the greater sensitiveness of public opinion, and the existence of an improved standard of morality, quite as much damage may be done to a man's character by a conviction in these Courts as by a judgment against him in a Court of higher jurisdiction. Under these circumstances, it seems necessary that the Police should proceed with the same care, and with the same rigid regard to the Regulations in these matters, as in regard to cases of indictable offences. It is very necessary, therefore, that, immense as is the number of these not in themselves very serious offences, the Police should deal with persons accused of them in no perfunctory manner, but with the same care as if they were dealing with serious criminal matters.

There are three subsidiary matters connected with the proceedings in the charge room to which we think it worth while to call attention.

The first is the practice which seemingly prevails at every station of ordering, and, if necessary compelling, a prisoner to sit down on the bench which is provided at the police-station during the time that he is waiting to be placed in the dock and charged.

There does not appear to be any specific rule upon the point, and we are at a loss to understand why the arresting constable should insist upon his prisoner sitting down. Though, at first sight, the matter seems to be entirely trivial, yet there are indications in the evidence which has been given before us that prisoners resent and misunderstand the use of force to make them sit down. Unless there are some over-ruling considerations, of which we are not informed, we think it would be advisable that the prisoner should be simply asked to sit down, but that, if he declines, he should not be compelled to do so.

The next point is the searching of prisoners arrested for these street offences.

The Regulations provide that any prisoner may be searched:—

White Book, p. 262. "If it be suspected that he has upon his person any deadly weapon or any article which has been stolen or unlawfully obtained."

and seems to contemplate that the search should only be made upon the hypothesis clearly laid down. The practice, however, seems to be to search prisoners in all or in nearly all cases. We do not see why a practice of this kind should be followed where the only charge against the prisoner is that he has committed a street offence. Prisoners arrested for such offences naturally resent treatment which seems only proper where the charge is one of a grave crime against the person or against property. Both Dr. Gerothwohl and M. Lavalette were searched, and both gentlemen naturally felt that it was an added indignity, and it seems difficult to see why it should have taken place. We can hardly think that it was really necessary in that case to submit them to the process of search; yet, in fact, it was done, with the result simply that both these gentlemen referred to it with indignation, and as an added illustration of the brutality of the Police without any advantage being obtained.

Q. 13796. Maurer complained that Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay searched his pockets and behaved to him like a dog, and that papers, letters, postcards, and a couple of cigars were taken from him and thrown into the fire, and that his knife and pencil case, and things like that, were likewise taken from him. Though we do not believe his account of the way in which the search was carried out, it is not denied that his knife and pencil case, for instance, were taken from him and afterwards handed back, yet we find that in the Charge-Sheet under the heading:—"Property found on person or elsewhere," the entry is "Nil." It appears to us that if the search of Maurer was made in pursuance of the Regulation, a description of the property found upon him ought to have been entered in the proper column. The Charge-Sheet and the Regulation must be read together, and where a search is made under it in strictness the deadly weapon or other property found upon the prisoner ought to be noted. Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay evidently was not quite easy in his mind as to the practice, because he told us that it was generally done simply for the protection of the prisoner, and his observation implied that it was not treated as a formal search within the meaning of the Regulation.

We see no reason for departing from the Regulation, and think that prisoners arrested for these street offences should only be searched in case the officer in charge of the station suspects on reasonable grounds that the prisoner has upon his person a deadly weapon or property stolen or unlawfully obtained.

Thirdly, having regard to the complaints of Andrews and Altfuldisch of ill-treatment at the station before they were placed in the dock to be charged, we desire to say that it is inexpedient to order that a noisy and unruly prisoner, waiting to be charged, should be taken on to landings or into places outside the main station building; and we recommend that, when it becomes necessary to remove a prisoner temporarily from the charge room, he should be taken to some convenient room and kept there in custody, not only of the constables who have brought him in, but of at least one other constable not concerned in the arrest.

§ 5. Suggestions were made to us that the improper or indiscreet exercise of the powers entrusted to individual Police Constables in respect of these street offences may, unless adequately checked, lead to the infliction of injury to the reputation of an innocent person even if he is acquitted by the magistrate before whom he may be brought. It was suggested that a Constable, under some mistake, may arrest a man engaged in some occupation in which personal character is of extraordinary importance, that, without any fault of his own, he may be placed upon his trial, and that the very fact of being so placed upon his trial upon an accusation of having been drunk and disorderly, though the charge may be dismissed, may cause permanent damage to his reputation and hinder him in his career. It was also suggested that this evil might in many cases be prevented if an Inspector, when a prisoner is charged before him at the police-station, had vested in him a discretion, if he should think it advisable, to make further inquiries before accepting the charge instead of being obliged to take it at once with the necessary consequence of the prisoner's having to appear in public before the magistrate the next day.

Such an object might no doubt be attained by giving the Inspector power to release the prisoner upon his entering into his own recognisances or giving satisfactory bail to appear not before the magistrate but before the Inspector at a future time when he would be in a better position to decide the question whether the charge was sufficiently well founded to justify the prisoner being placed upon his trial in public.

The same object might also be attained by altering the present system whereby the Police officer in charge of the station takes over the custody of the prisoner in case he accepts the charge and substituting for him a public official not, connected with the Police, whose function it should be to make a preliminary examination of the case and decide whether it is one in which the evidence is strong enough to justify the prisoner being placed upon his trial in public.

We invited the learned magistrates and other witnesses to express their opinion upon these questions, and all of them, with the exception of Mr. Plowden, are of opinion that no change in the present system is advisable. Their view may, we think, be expressed in the proposition that the best safeguard of the liberty and reputation of any person, whatever his avocation and whatever his degree in life, against the abuse of the right of arrest by a constable, or of false charges by him or anyone else, is afforded by the present law which compels accuser and accused to appear at the earliest possible moment before an independent Judge sitting in a Court, the proceedings of which take place in public.

Mr. Plowden, as we have pointed out above, recognised what he described as :—

Q. 44342. "the constant overhanging risk of unfounded charges which are not the less unfounded because they may be made in perfect good faith."

and he pointed out that to some people :—

"It is of little consequence whether they are brought into a Police Court or not, or what happens to them when they are there; but to others, and many others—persons of position and character—Police Court proceedings, even with an acquittal, cause annoyance and humiliation."

Mr. Plowden went on to make a suggestion that "where there is present to the mind of the Inspector taking the charge a reasonable doubt that the constable who has brought a man, say in a public position, into the station, is making a mistake, and the accused person is there with his card, and his name and address and his denial all before the Inspector" he should have "power to take that accused person's bail to appear not the next morning before the magistrate but, say, in a week's time" with a view to giving an opportunity for further inquiries into the matter, and if, upon such further inquiries being made, it should become apparent that there is no reasonable ground for pressing the charge, or for believing that the magistrate would convict, the charge might be refused, and the case never be brought before the magistrate in public.

Mr. Plowden also threw out the suggestion that, in case such a power as he recommended were not given to the Inspector, the same object might be attained by giving to the magistrate power to inquire into the charge in his private room if the Inspector felt doubtful about accepting the charge, and that the magistrate might direct him to refuse the charge, or that the charge be taken, and that the case should be tried in public in the ordinary course.

We have given both these suggestions our consideration. With regard to the second, we may say at once that we think it would be inexpedient to adopt it for the simple reason that it would be going back upon the principle acted upon since the passing of the Police Act, 1839, of effecting a complete severance between the executive functions of the Police and the judicial functions of the magistrate. It would, in effect, convert the magistrate into the adviser of the Police and make him responsible to some extent for the prosecution, or else it would commit him to a discharge of his judicial duties in private.

For these reasons we cannot recommend its adoption.

More may be urged, however, in favour of the first suggestion of Mr. Plowden. The requirement that every prisoner shall be brought at the earliest possible moment before a Magistrate is one of a very fundamental character in our English legal system, and is the basis upon which the freedom of the subject stands. It is a principle introduced for the benefit of the prisoner, and not in the interest of the prosecution, that is to say, of the Crown, and if in a particular case a prisoner likes to waive it because he thinks insistence upon its being carried out would involve greater damage to him than temporary detention, there seems to us to be no a priori objection to his having the right in cases where its possession and exercise involve no damage to the public interest.

Let us see how it would apply in a concrete case. Suppose a man is charged at Vine Street at midnight with being drunk and disorderly in one of the adjacent streets, under the present system if the Inspector at Vine Street accepts the charge the accused is bound to appear the next morning at Marlborough Street Police Court with only a very meagre opportunity of obtaining the legal assistance of a Solicitor, and practically none of retaining and instructing Counsel. It is true that no injustice is likely to be done, because the magistrate would, at his request, adjourn the case, and give the accused every opportunity of obtaining legal aid and collecting and summoning witnesses, and ultimately, unless the case were proved beyond all reasonable doubt, the prisoner would be acquitted, and he might leave the Court without a stain upon his character, to use an ordinary phrase. Still there remains the fact that he has been placed upon his trial, and that fact may be generally reported in the Press and, innocent though he was, great damage may be done to his reputation.

While admitting that it is quite possible that some injury and much annoyance may result to an innocent person through the blunder of a constable in such a case, we believe that cases in which any real or lasting damage to a man's reputation has been caused by Police Court proceedings which resulted in acquittal have only very occasionally occurred, and that they are not often likely to happen in the future. After full consideration, we cannot see our way to recommend any increase in the powers of the officer in charge of the Station in regard to taking or refusing a charge made by a constable, so long as the existing system of prosecution by individual constables or private persons is maintained.

If the evil to which we have referred should be deemed to be of such a magnitude, as to make a change advisable, we think that the change should be made in the direction suggested by Mr. Plowden of giving the Inspector power, on the application of a prisoner, to take bail for his appearance before the Magistrate, not on the same or on the following day, but after the lapse of a short interval during which further inquiries may be made before the charge is finally taken or refused.

Drunkenness in the Streets.

§ 6. We are of opinion that the statutory provisions in regard to cases where a prisoner is charged with drunkenness, or with being drunk with aggravating circumstances, are adequate and sufficiently clear.

In the great majority of cases, vague though the term "drunk" is, no difficulty whatever arises in regard to the application of the statute to the cases which come under the head of "drunkenness," or "drunken and disorderly conduct," and they, as a reference to the statistics given above will show, form the great bulk of the total number number of street offences with which the Police and the Magistrates have to deal. The cases in which the prisoner denies that he was drunk with any seriousness or insistence are, comparatively speaking, few and far between. In those cases the duty cast upon the Inspector in the charge room is undoubtedly one oftentimes of very great delicacy and difficulty. In some of them he has to decide the question whether a prisoner, who is in an excited and unusual condition, is drunk or simply ill. In other cases he has to consider whether, though the prisoner is undoubtedly to some extent under the influence of liquor, he is so drunk that it is fair to accept the charge. In the former class of cases the Regulations direct that the Divisional Surgeon is to be sent for immediately, even though the prisoner makes no complaint, and the Chief Commissioner especially "desires that a liberal interpretation may be placed on all orders and regulations with respect to the attendance of Divisional Surgeons in cases of illness, accident, injury or drunkenness." White Book, p. 99.

The symptons of drunkenness in many cases are, to anybody except a surgeon or medical man, very similar to those due to some kind of mental or physical illness. In such cases it is easy for a constable honestly to make a mistake. A further difficulty arises from the fact that, as experience shows, the shamming of illness by persons who are drunk is not an uncommon device.

The case of Mr. Davis mentioned by Mr. Cluer affords an illustration of the difficulties that may arise in this class of case, and of the differences of opinion which may arise as to the propriety of Police action in regard to them. There, a constable who observed Mr. Davis fall, went up to him, and came to the conclusion that he was drunk, and arrested him, and after being taken to the Station, where he was examined by a Divisional Surgeon, he was brought before Mr. Cluer, who told us that the constable then swore that Mr. Davis was drunk, that the Divisional Surgeon said he was drunk and smelt of drink, and that the Inspector swore he was drunk, while, on the other side, there were a bank manager and half a dozen of the prisoner's friends to speak to his sobriety, and his own doctor to prove that he had epilepsy, and the prisoner himself assured the Magistrate that he had drunk absolutely nothing for four days. It is clear that Mr. Cluer's recollection was somewhat at fault, because the Inspector did not give evidence in the case, though that fact is not very important for our purpose, since the Inspector had in fact come to the conclusion that he was drunk, or he would not have taken the charge. In Mr. Cluer's view the Police were in fault, and it certainly is a very odd case, but as the Divisional Surgeon, whom we believe to be an honest and competent medical practitioner, certified that the prisoner was drunk, the blame for the acceptance of the charge, if there be any blame, must, under the circumstances, fall upon his shoulders and not upon those of the Police. It was evidently a very difficult case, and it seems to us that the fact that this gentleman was subject to epileptic fits, or, at any rate, had had such fits before, did not necessarily conclude the matter, because it is quite possible that an epileptic subject may get drunk like anyone else, though, on the other hand, neither in his case nor in that of anyone else does the smell of the breath afford any satisfactory evidence of drunkenness. We are not of opinion that the Police were wrong, but we refer to the case as a good illustration of the difficulties with which both a constable in the street and an Inspector in the Charge Room are occasionally confronted. It is difficult to know what more can be done by the officer in the Charge Room in such cases than to call in a Divisional Surgeon, though even he, skilled though he be, may undoubtedly make a mistake.

Of course, except where the charge is that the prisoner is "drunk and incapable," there is always present in all cases of this class the difficulty created by the fact that there is and can be no absolute standard by which the degree of drunkenness required to satisfy the statute or, what comes to the same thing, the discretion of the Magistrate, can be measured.

In cases where the drunkenness of the prisoner is not quite obvious, and the prisoner denies drunkenness, and there is no suggestion or appearance of illness, the Regulations do not make it obligatory upon the officer taking the charge to send for a Divisional Surgeon. In practice, however, if the Station Officer understands from the prisoner that he seriously denies being drunk, the Divisional Surgeon is sent for, and unless objection be taken by the prisoner, he examines him, and having done that, makes an entry giving the result of the examination in a book kept for that purpose, while the Inspector makes an entry in the Occurrence Book of the fact of the doctor's examination of the prisoner, and a reference to the page of the Surgeon's book in which his entry is found. Until recently it appears to have been the practice for the Divisional Surgeon to make the entry in the Occurrence Book. A copy of the doctor's entry, usually called the doctor's certificate, is pinned to the Charge Sheet containing the entry relating to the particular case to which it applies, and therefore accompanies the Charge Sheet to the Police Court. The certificate is not per se admissible in evidence against the prisoner at the trial, and the Magistrate, of course, who has not got the Charge Sheet, but the Register compiled from it before him, does not use it against the prisoner, but if the fact that the Divisional Surgeon saw him comes out in the course of the hearing, and the prisoner raises no objection, he refers to it, and asks the prisoner if he would like the doctor to be called; if so, he is summoned, and, if necessary, the case is remanded for his attendance.

The fee of the doctor for his attendance at the Station is usually taken into account in fixing the fine in case there be a conviction, and the fee of the doctor for attending at the Court as a witness is taken into account as part of the costs of the case. It appears that the doctor's fees for attending at the Police Station are paid out of the Metropolitan Police Fund, though the fund is recouped out of the fine in case there is a conviction.

The practice appears to us to be regular and unobjectionable; and we think that the attendance of the Divisional Surgeon or other medical man at the Station ought to be encouraged as being highly desirable in the interests of justice.

We think it, however, absolutely necessary, in order to avoid any suspicion on the part of a prisoner, that the doctor is simply acting with a view to shielding the arresting constable against the consequences of an abuse, or a mistake in the exercise of his authority, that the examination should be conducted in every case without the slightest interference by the Inspector, and without the doctor being informed of any of the allegations made against the prisoner, or as to the circumstances of the arrest, or as to the conduct which induced the constable to intervene. It ought to be made plain, so far as possible, to the prisoner that he is being subjected to a purely impartial examination. Probably in a very large number of cases in which a prisoner denies with more or less insistence that he is drunk, a Divisional Surgeon has no doubt at all as to his condition; but it is in the cases in which, though the prisoner is angry and excited, there may be a doubt as to whether he is "drunk" in any fair sense of the term, that the expert opinion of a medical man may be of some value to the Inspector in coming to a conclusion whether he ought to be detained, and to the Magistrate in deciding whether he ought to be convicted.

We are not charged by the Terms of Reference with the duty of inquiring into the manner in which the Divisional Surgeons discharge the duties cast upon them in regard to cases of drunkenness, or drunkenness with aggravation, for they are not members of the Police Force, though their services are retained in accordance with the orders and regulations made by the Chief Commissioner.

It does not appear quite clear whether, according to the terms of their engagement, they are bound to attend to examine prisoners who deny being drunk, but who are obviously not ill, and have not sustained injury, and where their intervention and examination of the prisoner can only serve the purpose of helping the Inspector to decide whether he ought to detain the prisoner or of qualifying themselves to give expert evidence at the Police Court. In practice, however, they evidently regard it as their duty to attend at the Station when summoned.

Suggestions have reached us, and in more than one of the cases into which we have inquired were made, that Divisional Surgeons allow themselves to be unduly biassed in giving their opinion on the condition of a prisoner in favour of the Police. We believe these suggestions to be groundless in fact. At the same time we think that the form in which they make their entry as to the result of the examination is too often couched in such general or ambiguous terms as occasionally to afford plausible ground for the suggestion that they desire to support the Police view that the prisoner is drunk, or to word it in such a way as to render it least damaging to a constable in case a blunder has been made. It appears to us that this is really due to the difficulty of fixing a precise meaning to such terms and phrases as "Drunk," "Recovering from the effects of excessive drinking," "Fit to be detained," and so forth, and to the absence of any agreement or understanding among the Divisional Surgeons themselves as to the data upon which their opinion upon the question should be based, as to the tests which should be applied, and as to the point at which in the gradual process commencing with slight exhilaration and ending with insensibility a prisoner may properly be said to be drunk.

If a medical man is called in and asked to determine the question whether a particular man who is pointed out to him is or is not drunk, he is asked to solve a medical or scientific problem, and the first question that he ought to ask himself is, what are the data upon which he is to solve his problem? It appears to us that he ought to exclude from those data as irrelevant anything that he is told by the Inspector or the constable as to what the prisoner has been doing or saying before arriving at the Station. If he does not do so, and if he is going to take into his consideration all the circumstances of the case, he is really anticipating the work of the Magistrate. What he ought to do is to diagnose the condition of the prisoner, and take notice of all the symptoms or signs which knowledge and experience tell him to be relevant, whether they tell in favour of or against the theory that the prisoner is drunk. Even if he should go no further than to note down certain physical facts (e.g., dilation of the pupils of the eyes, difficulty of articulation, marked unsteadiness in gait, and the like), his evidence that such symptoms were observed is material to the Magistrate in the exercise of his judicial discretion. The writing down in a book by the doctor of his inferences in such general terms as "drunk" or "recovering from excessive drinking," not "drunk now," and the production of a copy of the entry, if it becomes admissible, affords little guidance to a Magistrate who has to decide the disputed issue; though it may well be useful and proper as a help to the Station Officer in the discharge of his duties.

We gather, indeed, from what the learned Magistrates told us that this is their view, and that in any case where there is substantial doubt they attach little value to the so-called certificate, but require the attendance of the Divisional Surgeon in order that they may ascertain the ground upon which he made his entry. If the Divisional Surgeon who had examined the prisoner at the Station attended as a matter of course at the trial, the precise form of his entry in the Medical Book or in the Occurrence Book would be of little importance save for the purpose of refreshing his memory in case he did not also make memoranda in his note-book; but the attendance of a professional gentleman involves expense which, though the fee is small, is heavy to most prisoners.

Impressed as we are with the advantage of having an examination of the prisoner at the Station in cases where the drunkenness is seriously denied, we think the advantage would be much increased if, instead of making simply a general entry in the book at the Station, the Divisional Surgeon entered concisely the symptoms which he observes about the prisoner's condition, adding to those particulars, if he chooses, the words "Drunk" or "Fit to be detained" or "Not drunk now, but recovering from the effects of excessive drinking," or other words accurately describing the condition of the prisoner at the time of examination. If these particulars were put in the entry or certificate, and the prisoner were allowed before leaving the Station or at the Police Court to look at it, he would have a better opportunity of deciding whether it was worth his while asking for the attendance of the Divisional Surgeon.

In many cases where drunkenness is disputed the prisoner asks that his own doctor, or, at any rate, some medical gentleman whose name and address he knows, should be sent for. In those cases the Regulations prescribe that every reasonable effort should be made to secure the attendance of the person whose name is given by the prisoner. As we know from what took place in the cases of Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette, and of Mr. Baker, the Regulations are carried out, and we have nothing before us to justify the suspicion which it appears prisoners sometimes entertain that the Police are very lukewarm in their efforts to get any doctor except the Divisional Surgeon. Any attempt to force upon a reluctant prisoner an examination by the Divisional Surgeon, whether indirectly by not making any real effort to secure the attendance of the medical gentleman the prisoner requires, or directly by getting the Divisional Surgeon into the Charge Room without the freely given consent of the accused, would be, in our judgment, conduct of a reprehensible character.

Here, we ought to point out, that a good deal turns upon the time at which the examination by the medical expert is made. In the interests of justice the examination should be made at the earliest possible moment after the arrival of the prisoner at the Station, because, as everyone knows, the effects of alcohol pass off with greater or less rapidity, and, accordingly, the longer the examination by a doctor is delayed, the less value can be attached to his evidence upon the point as to what the condition of the prisoner was when the arrest was effected.

It is also desirable that the medical examination should take place, if possible, very soon after the arrival of the prisoner at the Station, because in that case it can be done before the charge is taken or refused by the Station Officer.

We think that in cases where the prisoner denies drunkenness, and the Inspector is not absolutely certain as to the propriety of taking the charge, it is expedient that the examination should take place before the charge is taken and the prisoner is placed in the cell. In cases where the prisoner is willing to be examined by the Divisional Surgeon, we think the best course the Inspector could take would be to wait for his attendance and examination before accepting the charge.

In this connection we may refer to the 12th Recommendation of the Police and Public Vigilance Society laid before us on their behalf by Mr. Timewell, which is as follows :—

"It may well be worth considering whether it would not be in the interest of all parties concerned to have a number of medical men on the books at each Police Station who would be willing to visit accused persons at stated fees instead of limiting the work to the Divisional Police as at present."

It is not accurate to say that the work is limited to the Divisional Surgeons at the present time since the prisoner is allowed to have an examination by a doctor named by him if he will attend, and we do not quite understand what is meant by the phrase :— "On the books at each Police Station." We think that the suggestion is a good one, and that it would be advisable to have a notice put up in the Charge Room on which properly qualified medical practitioners resident within a short distance of the Station might be allowed to insert their names as signifying that they are willing to attend when summoned by prisoners in order to examine them as to their sobriety, and that if a prisoner asks for a doctor he should be told that he may be examined either by the Divisional Surgeon or by any one of the gentlemen whose names and addresses are given in the notice. We think that in the notice on which the medical practitioners inscribe their names, the fee for which they are willing to attend should be stated. We also think that if a prisoner should ask for the attendance of one of the medical practitioners named in the notice, and he attends, the prisoner should also submit to an examination by the Divisional Surgeon if the Officer in charge of the Station thinks fit to send for him.

In conclusion, as to this class of case, we think it desirable to point out that we are very greatly struck, as a result of our Inquiry, with the importance which prisoners attach to the charge of drunkenness. When the Metropolitan Police Force was first established the habit of intemperance prevailed among all classes of the community to a larger extent than at present, and drunkenness was treated much more leniently than it is at the present time. From the communications which we have received, and from what we observed in inquiring into the special complaints, it seems to us clear that persons arrested by the Police resent a charge of drunkenness very greatly as compared with a charge of disorderly conduct. It is the accusation that they were drunk that, in their opinion, seems to give real gravity to the charge. This is due partly to the improved tone of society as to intemperance, but chiefly to the fact that employers attach much more importance than formerly to their servants being sober persons. For instance, Mr. Baker, who is an ironmonger's assistant, did not appear to be aggrieved by being brought to the Station and given the opportunity of explaining his conduct as to the alleged breach of the County Council bye-law against indecency, but he was greatly upset when a charge of drunkenness was preferred, and we gathered that to be the case because it imperilled his position as assistant in a respectable shop.

This leads us to make the observation that a constable should be extremely careful, even if he thinks that a prisoner is somewhat under the influence of liquor, to consider whether the condition of the prisoner is such as to justify his making drunkenness an element in the charge. It is perfectly true that in the great majority of cases in which a constable observes a man behaving in a disorderly manner, whether by quarrelling and molesting passers-by or by using obscene language, or doing something of that kind, drink is the cause of the man's misconduct; but in many cases, even if a man has had a glass or two, the real and effective cause of his misbehaviour may be something in his disposition or something that has happened to provoke impropriety of conduct, and in those cases it seems expedient, if there is substantive evidence of disorderly conduct or of bad language, to charge him under Sub-sections 12 or 13 of the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, and not under Section 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872. Even if the appearance and speech of the offender give reasonable ground for thinking that he has taken more than is good for him, it is expedient that the constable should not take upon himself a greater burden of proof than is necessary. In Mrs. Braham's case, for instance, if the constable had, instead of jumping to the conclusion that she was drunk, contented himself when he got to the Station with a description of what had taken place, and had charged her with disorderly conduct, though, in that particular case, the Magistrate would probably have come to the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a conviction under Sub-section 13 referred to, yet the constable would only have been guilty of an error of judgment in taking her to the Station when he found that his original notion that she was a prostitute, and had been guilty of accosting, was unfounded; and his treatment of the case, though open to considerable censure, would have presented an entirely different aspect from that which it did in fact assume.

We could not help noticing how an experienced officer like Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay, in the case of Altfuldisch, avoided a similar blunder. There, a party of men had just come out into the street from a convivial entertainment, with the result that somehow or other a fracas took place in the street, and a considerable number of men became excited and disorderly. Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay charged the crowd, and properly arrested Altfuldisch, who was aiding and abetting in the disorder, and though, as he drily observed, he thought his prisoner "had had enough," and his conduct on the way to the Station might have led an inexperienced person to think he was really drunk, yet Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay contented himself with the true charge of disorderly conduct.

We do not intend by these observations to suggest that constables, where they are satisfied that a prisoner is drunk, should abstain from making the charge under the Licensing Act, 1872, Section 12, but we are only suggesting that they should not rashly assume that in every case where a man's conduct is unusual, unbecoming and disorderly, he is drunk.

Disorder in the Streets.

§ 7. The manner in which the Police deal with cases of disorder in the streets as distinct from cases where drunkenness forms an added element in the offence calls for very few comments.

As we have pointed out above, and as more than one of the learned Magistrates told us, the word "disorder" is not in itself a term descriptive of any crime or misdemeanour or statutory offence. For the purposes of our Inquiry we have taken it to cover: (1) Assault or attempt to assault, or disturbance of the peace, which, when committed within view of the constable, justifies intervention and the arrest of the offender at common law; and (2) Offences committed in the street, which have been created by statute, and for which a constable has the right of summary arrest, and which are tried summarily at a Police Court. Such are the offences punishable under the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 12 as to "Obscene language or literature," and Sub-section 13 as to "Threatening, abusive, insulting words or behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned;" and the offence of street betting created by Section 23 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867.

So far as we are able to form an opinion, we think that the Police habitually deal with these offences in a regular and entirely proper manner, and the statutory provisions appear to us, upon the whole, adequate for the maintenance of public order.

Sir Edward Henry did not complain that the existing law was not sufficient for keeping the peace in the Metropolis, but Major Tarry complained that in Leeds the powers possessed by the Police for dealing with instances of disorder are not satisfactory. He said:—

Q. 39146. "The only provision that we have in Leeds for dealing with disorderly conduct is a local Act which makes it an offence punishable by a fine of 40s. to be guilty in any street of any disorderly conduct. The expression is a wide one, and may cover anything from a turbulent schoolboy to something approaching a riot."

and he suggested that:—

Q. 39147. "Some classification might be adopted for the more serious forms of disorderly conduct and that more power of arrest be given to the Police in a case where an offender, after a second or third request, neglects or refuses to comply with the requirements of the constable to conduct himself properly and leave the vicinity. At present no such power exists, although if the offender is unknown, and refuses his name and address, he may be taken to the Police-Station. Cases occur, however, where offenders tender their name and address, and refuse to quit the spot."

and he particularly referred to a case arising out of a disturbance near the Tivoli Music Hall in Leeds.

The real point made by Major Tarry is not as to the terms of the local Act, which obviously are so broad as to give the widest possible discretion to a Magistrate before whom a person may be summoned for disorderly conduct, but that the Police have no power of summary arrest.

It would be presumptuous on our part to offer an opinion upon the expediency of amending the Act in question, but Major Tarry's reference to the broad terms of the local Act called our attention to the question whether there is any necessity to amend the Police Act, 1839, by giving the Police a power of arrest for disorderly conduct wider in its scope than that conferred by Sub-section 13 above referred to. We have considered the matter, and have come to the conclusion that it is not necessary to do so, and that the powers already possessed by the Police are adequate.

Solicitation in the Streets.

§ 8. Difficult as sometimes are the duties of the Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, their duties in regard to solicitation in the streets strike us as being still more difficult.

With regard to solicitation by men, Police intervention appears to take place or to be called for only rarely. In no communication to us has it been suggested that the Police abuse their authority under the Vagrancy Act, 1898, in regard to the disreputable class of men who solicit other men, or that they are reluctant to exercise their powers on fit occasions.

Communications have been made to us that many respectable women and girls are accosted in the streets by men either under the mistaken impression that they are prostitutes or with a view of making their acquaintance for improper purposes; and it is suggested that not only does the conduct of such persons insult and annoy those accosted, but that the unchecked action of these persons frequently leads inexperienced girls astray. It is not, however, suggested that the Police are to blame, but that, in the existing state of the law, they are practically powerless in the matter. We gather that this kind of misconduct on the part of men is more frequent, at any rate in its more open manifestation, in those parts of the Metropolis where prostitutes are to be found every afternoon and night walking the streets.

We received complaints on this head from tradesmen carrying on business in Regent Street, and elsewhere, in the West End, on the ground that this kind of solicitation affected them in their business, and we took the evidence of one gentleman, Mr. C. J. Vollhardt, upon this point. He told us that he was the Secretary of Messrs. Swan & Edgar, Limited, who carry on a large business in Piccadilly and Regent Street. He said, after complaining of the number of prostitutes using Regent Street and Piccadilly :—

"Another, and apparently increasing evil, calling for Police intervention is the molestation by well-dressed men of ladies walking in the West End shopping district, and particularly whilst looking in shop windows. We feel most strongly on this subject, as we have had numerous complaints from customers, friends, and relatives, some of whom have been absolutely terrified by the persistence of these blackguards. These complaints we have at various times reported to the Police authorities, only to be answered with an expression of regret: 'Yes, we know all about it, but are quite powerless unless a charge is made at the Police Station by persons molested'—an ordeal which not one lady in ten thousand would face. There are several of these pests well known as regular loiterers round our windows, whom we, as well as our outside employés, have seen raise their hats to ladies in the endeavour to attract their attention, or deliberately push against ladies walking along or looking in the shop windows, and then, by pretending apologies, try to entrap unsuspecting ones into conversation. We could point out one or more such gentry almost any fine afternoon, and most certainly think the Police should have discretionary powers to warn them or to move them on, as well as to act against offenders on a simple complaint made on the spot, or on witnessing an act of annoyance, making the offence a Police charge. 'Prevention is better than cure,' and we are firmly of opinion that even only a word of caution here and there from the Police would be a sure means of mitigating a serious scandal and nuisance known to exist everywhere in the West End where lady shoppers are to be found." Q. 45882.

Mr. Vollhardt added that he had himself verbally complained to the Police upon the subject, but without any effect, because he was given to understand that the Police had no power, and that he had been told by Inspector Drew, formerly Inspector at Vine Street, that the great difficulty was the possibility of making a mistake. We think it very likely that Mr. Vollhardt to some extent misunderstood what he was told by Inspector Drew, though, in calling attention to the difficulties of any action on the part of a constable in these cases, Inspector Drew was only mentioning a fact which must be patent to everyone acquainted with the law, and with the difficulty of applying it in this class of case. Q. 45887, &c. Q. 45898.

Closely connected with this topic is Mr. Coote's contention that in regard to sexual vice the existing law is unequal. "Practically," he said, "there is no law against a man soliciting, but a woman must not solicit." That does not appear to us to be an accurate statement of the law. Solicitation, per se, is not an offence either on the part of a man or on the part of a woman. But it must not be taken as certain that the Vagrancy Act, 1898, Section 1, Sub-section 1 (b) does not apply to the case of men persisting in soliciting or importuning women for immoral purposes. It is true that the clause referred to was, as Mr. Coote says, put in to lay hold of a certain kind of blackguard who is unmentionable in decent society. But an Act of Parliament has to be construed by the Court according to the meaning of the words, and not according to the intention of the framers of the Act. And, though the primary object of the legislation as conceived by those responsible for the measure was to put down immoral solicitation for unnatural practices, it must by no means be assumed, even if it were relevant, that all those who supported it intended to limit its application in the manner suggested. We do not, however, think it expedient to express our opinion upon the true construction of this enactment. Q. 6962. See above, p. 33.

Furthermore, we entertain no doubt whatever that a magistrate has precisely the same power to bind over men frequenting the streets who molest and annoy women by their words, their gestures, or other discourteous or insulting behaviour, as he has to bind over a woman guilty of similar misbehaviour.

We have called attention to the general power given to Justices of the Peace by virtue of their Commission under the Act, 34 Edward III., on the complaint of a person of good credit, to take of persons of whom complaint is made "sufficient surety and mainprize of their good behaviour towards the King and his people"; and, as pointed out by Mr. Curtis Bennett, if a woman summons a man who has insulted her by improper proposals, there can be no doubt that the magistrate would have power to bind over the defendant to keep the peace, and be of good behaviour. Here we may point out that it is stated in a work of great authority that among the classes of persons who may be dealt with by Justices under their Commission are "common whore-mongers and common whores." Of course the difficulty found in practice is that respectable women, however much they may resent the conduct of a man, will not take proceedings, probably because they feel that more harm will be done to their Q. 45371. Dalton's Justice of the Peace, c. 124, p. 411.

reputation by having to attend in Court, and being talked about in connection with any affair of the kind, than by suffering the indignity to which they have been exposed in silence. Experience shows that, in regard to ordinary cases of solicitation by prostitutes, no man ever comes forward to help the Police except in those cases where the accosting has only been a trap with a view to robbery, and has led to his being assaulted. That being so, one will understand the reluctance of women of good character, however much annoyed they may be, to take proceedings on their own account.

It may be said that the mere obligation to be bound over or to find sureties to keep the peace is not a sufficient punishment for the misbehaviour that we are discussing, but, having regard to the position in life of a great many of the persons referred to by Mr. Vollhardt, it can hardly be doubted that the publicity attending Police Court proceedings, and the decision of the Magistrate that they should be bound over, would be felt to be a punishment to be avoided.

Several of the learned Magistrates pointed out to us, also, that Sub-section 13 of the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, is so wide in its terms as to cover all the more pronounced and offensive methods of molesting respectable women. If a man so far forgets himself as to stop a woman whom he does not know, and unequivocally treats her as a prostitute, his words and behaviour, however courteous in form, are "insulting words or behaviour" within the meaning of the sub-section, and, if so, he is using words and behaviour "whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned," and we think that in such a case there is no reason why a constable should not intervene and arrest the offender. And, in saying that, we are fortified by the authority of the chief Magistrate, Sir Albert de Rutzen, whose great experience entitles his words to the greatest weight. We think it well to call attention to an answer which he gave us dealing with cases of accosting of women by men. Sir Albert de Rutzen was asked :—

Q. 44210. "One or two cases have been mentioned in the correspondence which I have had as Commissioner, and in substance the case put is this : A man goes up to a well-dressed lady walking along, say, Piccadilly, and says : 'Good evening, my dear,' or 'Good afternoon,' or very likely he politely raises his hat, and says : 'Will you come and have some tea with me ?' or something of that sort. Is that an offence at all on the part of the man speaking ?"

Sir Albert de Rutzen answered :—

"That would depend entirely upon the particular circumstances of the case. What might be to a certain extent excusable if it were twelve o'clock at night, might be perfectly inexcusable if it were twelve o'clock in the day time, and what might be excusable in Regent Street at twelve o'clock in the morning, might be most unreasonable if it were in Grosvenor Square at twelve o'clock in the day. It must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case, I think. It would not have been an assault, but it might very well be sufficient evidence of insulting behaviour, and if a woman came to me and asked me for a summons under such circumstances, I should not hesitate to grant it to her."

In our view, therefore, though of course the law might be amended to make the matter more clear, there is really, when the matter is analysed, no inequality created by the law itself. It is not the fault of the legislature or the fault of the Police that unchastity on the part of a woman, as compared with unchastity by a man, is looked on with much more gravity in the former than in the latter case. It is, we believe, true, as Mr. Coote suggests, that the censure of society in general is passed more severely upon women than upon men for breaches of the moral law, but we doubt whether that is true in regard to breaches of the criminal law of the country, and it must be pointed out that, for such inequality as exists in the infliction of social punishment, common experience warrants us in saying that women are severer judges than men of their own sex, and it may be that there is some good excuse for this inequality to be found in the fundamental facts of human nature.

We therefore are of opinion that the law is more powerful in regard to these cases than seems to be imagined and that it cannot fairly be described as unequal, though we recognise its application calls for great caution.

Solicitation by Women.

§ 9. With regard to the treatment of cases of solicitation by women, we have come to the conclusion that the Police exercise their powers with adequate zeal and activity, and at the same time with a remarkably high degree of intelligence, caution, and gentleness

The existing powers of dealing with this class of case are given by the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and by the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-sections 11 and 13. We have set out the statutory provisions above. See above, pp. 32-33.

The evidence of the learned Magistrates shows that there is a substantial agreement between them as to the construction of the statutory provisions, and as to the amount of evidence of each material allegation which goes to form the offence which they require in the exercise of their magisterial discretion; and, as far as we have been able to ascertain, the views of the learned Magistrates are well known and understood by the Police. It has, however, been stated to us that in some Courts it is usual to proceed under one Act and in others under the other Act, for the reason that some Magistrates construe more strictly the limitations contained in the different provisions.

In cases where the charge is preferred under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, or under Sub-section 11 of the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, which are the provisions intended more directly to deal with solicitation by women for prostitution, it is necessary to prove that the woman arrested is a "common prostitute or night walker."

Under the Vagrancy Act the prosecution must give some evidence:—(1) That the prisoner is a "common prostitute"; (2) That she was, when arrested, "wandering in the public streets or public highways or in any place of public resort"; and (3) "Behaving in a riotous or indecent manner."

Under the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 11, the prosecution must give some evidence:—(1) That the prisoner is a "common prostitute or night walker"; (2) That she was, at the time of arrest, "loitering in a thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation"; and (3) That she was acting "to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers."

The necessity of proving that the prisoner belongs to a definite class—"common prostitute or night walker"—imposes upon a constable the proof of a fact as to which it may be very difficult to obtain evidence in a large and populous city. In provincial towns even of considerable size it is possible for the Police to make themselves acquainted with the avocation and character of most of the persons living in the disreputable parts of the town, and who frequently come under Police observation for various reasons. That is impossible in London. Women who habitually resort to the central portions of the Metropolis, especially those which have been described as the "areas of vice," may live far away in the suburbs or in respectable streets in another Division, where they never come in contact with the Police. It is, therefore, not to be expected that independent testimony as to the way in which the prisoner is earning her living, or what her circumstances are, can be obtained. In practice, the only evidence which the constable can obtain is that founded on his own observation or on that of other constables in the same Division of the habitual behaviour of the prisoner. He has, therefore, to rely upon asking the Magistrate to hold that the prisoner is a "common prostitute" as an inference from her having been for a longer or shorter period of time before the day on which she was actually arrested in the habit of walking about the streets and accosting men in such a manner as to lead an ordinary observer to think that she must be a prostitute, coupled with proof that she has been cautioned in accordance with the regulations where the charge is made under the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, Sub-section 11.

The White Book contains an instruction to the Police that before a woman is arrested under Sub-section 11, just mentioned, she "should be cautioned by the Police on duty and told to move on and conduct herself properly," and "should she refuse and persist in misconducting herself she should be taken into custody and charged with such offence as she may be guilty of." That appears to us to be a very proper direction. The person warned may explain the conduct which has led the constable to think it necessary to give her the caution, and have the opportunity of denying that she is a person of the class supposed; and if indeed the constable is mistaken, and the conduct of the woman, though equivocal and compromising, has been simply due to innocent impropriety, she has only in future to abstain from repeating such conduct to avert any further unpleasant consequences. If, however, whatever she may say, she does either the same night or on a subsequent night accost men, she can hardly complain that she is set down as a "common prostitute." White Book, p. 339.

It was stated to us by Sir Edward Henry that the obligation laid upon a constable by this Regulation gives "practical immunity to large numbers of women who are habitual frequenters of the place for the purpose of prostitution, because if warned they Q 65.

take care to remove themselves from the observation of the particular constable who warned them, and take care not to solicit again whilst in his sight or under his observation." It appears to be assumed in the Force that the caution must be given on the same day as the arrest, and the result of this is that a woman carries on her avocation in a street until cautioned, and then moves to the beat of another constable, when she is again free to act until once more cautioned. This procedure materially interferes with the success of Police action, and we think that it should be made clear to the Police charged with arresting prostitutes that if they can prove that a woman has been cautioned within a reasonable period anterior to the arrest they are entitled to arrest her under the Regulations.

The White Book only imposes the obligation to caution in cases in which the charge to be preferred is that under the Police Act, 1839. We assume in cases which come within the terms of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, the caution is not insisted upon. Though at first sight it is not easy to see why any distinction should be drawn between the proceedings under these two Acts, we think that the distinction made is sound, because, when the whole scope of the legislation is considered, it appears that the Vagrancy Act is really intended to apply not to the kind of solicitation cases that occurs in Piccadilly but rather to a class of prostitutes who are found wandering about the streets practically destitute, and who are beggars or habitual criminals, though quite ready to prostitute themselves if opportunity occurs.

Cases of solicitation by prostitutes are also dealt with under Sub-section 13 of the Police Act, 1839, Section 54, when the conduct of the woman is such as to amount to "insulting behaviour" or her language to "insulting words whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." Where the charge is preferred under that sub-section, it is not necessary to give evidence showing the prisoner to be a prostitute, and conviction on a charge preferred under that section does not involve the finding by the Magistrate that the prisoner belongs to that class. So, also, where the accosting is accompanied by the use of indecent or obscene language, there is no reason why she should not be arrested under Sub-section 12 of the same section, if there is evidence to show annoyance on the part of the person accosted or other passer-by. At Marlborough Street the Magistrates have lately given a very broad interpretation to the words of Sub-section 13, and it has become the practice, in cases where a Police constable is not in a position to prove that a woman whom he observes to be soliciting, after having been cautioned, is a prostitute, to arrest her, and prefer a charge of disorderly conduct, if a person accosted by her, in view of the constable, has shown, by gesture or words, that he was, to some extent, annoyed or embarrassed, even though he does not complain to the Police.

All the Magistrates who gave evidence before us were agreed that many cases of solicitation could be dealt with under Sub-section 13, above-mentioned, without unduly stretching its terms beyond the limits of their usual grammatical denotation; but there appeared in their evidence some slight difference of opinion as to the propriety of convicting under that sub-section where the only evidence against the prisoner is that she has solicited a man in the usual way without any indecency or any greater violence than by putting her hand upon his arm, or where he simply, by gesture or words more or less impatient, rejects her advances. Mr. Fenwick told us that he had never used the section even when he sat at Marlborough Street, but he told us at the same time that he was not confident that the sub-section might not be held to apply even to such cases. He said:—

Q. 45983. "When I was at Marlborough Street, where this class of offence is more common than at any other Court that I know of, one had to consider it from time to time, and cope with it, and I had to consider amongst other things, whether one could call in aid that Sub-section 13. Personally, I did not use it, but I am not prepared to say that it cannot be used. I am not prepared to say that conduct such as we have been considering would not amount to conduct which would be calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, especially when you remember that case of Bonnor v. Lushington which was decided. One sometimes wondered whether they would hold that to be riotous and indecent behaviour when a woman was catching hold of a man's arm. But the Court of Queen's Bench said yes. The Magistrate found it and the Quarter Sessions did not find it. It is a question of fact, and I should not like to say you would not take that view of Sub-section 13, but I have not used it myself."

The circumstances under which the practice of bringing these charges, which are really charges of solicitation, under Sub-section 13, arose were explained to us by Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay. He told us:—

Q. 1912. In Camera (Mrs. X.'s Case). "We had a great amount of difficulty in dealing with complaints. I think a little over two years ago there were a number of complaints, coming from gentlemen going home from their clubs in the evening, about women soliciting them in the street, and the question was brought before the Police by myself, and they told me that they did not know these women to be prostitutes; they had seen them walking about there, but they did not know them to be prostitutes. They could not prove they were such, and the magistrates refused to convict them unless they did so. Then they fell back on the present section . . . with the knowledge and sanction of the Magistrate. I pointed that out to the Magistrate's Clerk at the time, and he thought it would be a very good thing to rid the streets of these people. There are a great number of women, I know, who are not prostitutes, and I have gone up myself in plain clothes, because I knew it was dangerous to charge them with being common prostitutes. We have found this Act to be of great service, and I am glad to say a number of women—in fact, I believe more than three-quarters of them—we do not see now; they have left the streets; they saw the folly of it. I heard a question asked of Inspector Remfry about the seriousness of the charge. I would not look at a charge under Sub-section 13 with the same seriousness that I would look at a charge under Section 3 of the Vagrancy Act. I think it is more flagrant than under the Police Act, and the penalty is much more severe. With regard to a number of these cases of insulting behaviour, the magistrate discharges them under Section 16 of the Act of 1879; that is, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, and I am glad to say it has been very useful in that way, because these women have gone back to their employment, or have left off coming to the streets. A great number of them have been in employment. . . . I know a great number of them. I think it would not be fair, and I think it would be entirely wrong of us to charge them with being common prostitutes. We have the evil of solicitation in the streets, which is undoubtedly an annoyance, to get over. Gentlemen ask us to keep order in the streets, and we try our best at times; but sometimes we have a difficulty in doing it which private persons do not realise."

Q. 1914. In Camera (Mrs. X.'s Case).

The evidence of this experienced officer and other information we have received convinces us that this practice has evidently had a very beneficial effect, while at the same time the course taken is obviously of advantage to the accused, because she escapes the terrible disgrace of being publicly declared to be a common prostitute.

In view of the improved condition of the streets within the area of the C Division, in regard to which the practice prevails, we do not desire to say anything (even if we have the right to do so) which might be deemed to imply that we hold the action of the Magistrates at Marlborough Street to be in any way improper. It is sufficient to say that the law entrusts them with a very wide discretion, and that all the evidence before us tends to show that they exercise their discretionary powers with remarkable accuracy and prudence, and with entirely beneficial results, without undue harshness towards the unfortunate women with whom they have to deal.

What we have to say as to the Police action in regard to solicitation cases may be thus shortly stated. All the evidence given before us tends to show that the Police exercise their powers in dealing with solicitation cases in thorough good faith, with very marked intelligence, and with almost unerring accuracy. Aware of the serious consequences to an honest and chaste woman which may be caused by the mere fact of being put upon her trial for a disgraceful offence they only arrest a woman after cautious observation with a view to ascertaining with as much certainty as possible her true character, and where her conduct is such as to be an offence against public decency.

The testimony of the Magistrates and of those ladies and gentlemen whose philanthropic missionary enterprise brings them into contact with the prostitutes of the streets entirely supports this view, and tends to prove that constables do not enforce the law against solicitation with any undue severity.

The Chief Commissioner, too, is satisfied that, notwithstanding the fact that the state of the law throws upon constables an unusually difficult task in dealing with this class of case, misconduct as to this department of their work is so extremely rare as to be practically non-existent.

In cases where he has found it necessary, on disciplinary grounds, to inquire into complaints against constables for arresting women for solicitation, the result, as we gather, invariably shows that the constable was right in his judgment as to the character of the woman arrested.

We have, as appears in our Special Reports, fully investigated three cases in which allegations were made that the Police were mistaken as to the character of the woman arrested.

The case of Eva D'Angely turned out to be one of the most ordinary type. She was undoubtedly a foreign prostitute living under the protection of a souteneur whom she falsely described in the Police Court as her husband.

As to the character of Miss A. and Miss B., whose arrest formed the main part of the complaint made against the Police by Mr. Y., we have no doubt that they are both women of the town.

As to Mrs. X., though we do not feel justified in finding that she was a common prostitute loitering about the streets for the purpose of prostituting herself for reward, and though it may possibly be that she did so from love of excitement without any intention of prostituting herself, yet she on a series of occasions behaved in and near Oxford Street in such a manner as to justify the inference that she was an ordinary prostitute, and behaved in such a manner as to offend against public decency and order.

We think it not unlikely that if we had minutely inquired into every one of the cases in which during recent years charges of solicitation have been preferred against women by the Police, and which have been discharged by the Magistrates, it would be found that the constables had not acted without reasonable ground, notwithstanding the fact that the Magistrate did not think it safe to convict. We think it right to point out that we have given to any woman, who thinks she has been aggrieved by the action of the Police during the last four years, an opportunity of complaining and of being heard. In fact, though we have received some general complaints against the Police on this head, only Mrs. X. and Mr. Y., on behalf of Miss A. and Miss B., requested to be heard.

The case of Mrs. Braham was not, strictly speaking, an instance of the misuse of the power to arrest for solicitation, for though the constable made a mistake as to the lady's character, and intended to caution her, he discovered his blunder in time, and, in order to extricate himself, wrongly arrested the lady on a charge of being drunk and disorderly.

As a result of our Inquiry we have no hesitation in saying that the Police are not intentionally guilty of any abuse of authority in dealing with this class of case, and that, as a rule, they discharge their duty with remarkable care and intelligence, and, without being over-zealous, exercise a proper and reasonable activity in cautioning, and, if necessary, in arresting women who infest the streets.

We have been unable to discover anything that tends to show that the Police are unduly tolerant or negligent in the discharge of their duty as to this class of case. It has been proved before us that during the last few years the action of the Police, especially in the C Division, has led to a great improvement of the streets, notably Regent Street and Piccadilly, in which a large number of prostitutes formerly openly carried on their business, and which at certain hours became so crowded with undesirable persons of both sexes as to make the use of the streets irksome to respectable persons. Not only the evidence but our personal experience and observation warrant the finding that these streets are now generally so quiet, and so comparatively free from this inconvenience, that women and girls, to whatever class they may belong, may pass through them even late at night without the risk of compromising their reputation or of being exposed to insult. That this improvement has been very largely due to Police action in regard to these street offences is no doubt the case, but other causes have probably contributed to it. We have been told that during the last few years a very considerable number of disorderly houses (over three hundred) have been closed in consequence of legal proceedings in the area of the C Division alone. We are not sure that this fact has contributed to the improvement to which we have referred, and it may be that there is no necessary connection between it and the diminution of the number of prostitutes frequenting the streets of the West End, but it certainly tends to disprove the allegation sometimes made, that the closing of brothels increases street prostitution.

We have referred to the difficulties in which constables are sometimes placed by the scope and language of the statutory provisions affecting solicitation in the streets, and we feel bound to ask ourselves whether under all the circumstances there is any necessity for an amendment of the law in this respect. We have had evidence as to the law in other towns, particularly in Leeds, Liverpool, and Glasgow.
Q. 39862. The words of the Act regulating this subject in Glasgow are as follows:—"Every prostitute or street walker who on or near any street loiters about or importunes
Q. 39159. passengers for the purpose of prostitution shall be liable to a penalty." In Leeds up to the year 1905 the law was almost identical with that in Glasgow, but in that year the Corporation of Leeds presented to Parliament a Consolidation Bill in which inter alia the old law with regard to solicitation was proposed to
Q. 39199 be continued. This Clause passed the Police and Sanitary Committee of the House of Commons and also the House, but the Committee of the House of Lords substituted for this the words generally applied to other English towns, namely, those of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, section 28, which makes obstruction or annoyance of residents or passengers in the street an element in the offence. It follows from what we have said that the existing statutes and the system of Police administration, on the whole, is working well in the Metropolis, where the Magistrates place a broad interpretation, rightly as we think, on the relevant statutes, and constables are therefore free to act whenever they are satisfied as to the character of a woman whom they observe accosting night after night over a considerable period.

So far as we can see, the main difficulty in enforcing the law is caused by the over-sensitiveness and impatience of the public whenever there seems ground, however slight, for alleging that there has been a mistake in arresting a woman on a charge of solicitation. The proceedings in the Metropolitan Police Courts are widely reported in the newspapers, and if a Magistrate refuses to convict in one of these solicitation cases, a wave of indignation at times passes through the community, and not only the particular constable who effected the arrest but the Police, as a whole, find themselves suddenly the object of public censure in the Press, in Society, and even in Parliament. Persons ordinarily reasonable seem to jump to the conclusion that the Magistrate's action necessarily means that the arresting constable was guilty of heinous misconduct, that his witnesses are perjured accomplices, and that the prisoner is the innocent victim of Police persecution. Such displays of emotion are curious in the case of so law-abiding and law-respecting a community as ours, seeing that similar feelings of indignation are rarely aroused in cases where men are acquitted of crimes of the greatest gravity. Everyone must recognise that it is a very terrible misfortune for an honest woman or girl to be publicly tried on a charge involving an imputation of peculiarly disgraceful unchastity, and must be filled with the utmost sympathy for the distress of mind caused to the accused, her relatives and friends, by so untoward a circumstance. Many thousands of women and girls have to make their way through our streets in the pursuit of perfectly lawful occupations at late hours of the night. When one reflects that a constable may wrongly arrest any one of them, and that she may, therefore, be subject to undeserved misfortune, with consequences to her character which the dismissal of the charge by the Magistrate cannot wholly avert, we can understand the thrill partly of alarm and partly of pity in regard to this kind of case which passes through the minds of respectable people of all classes and which results in the clamour against the Police. On these occasions the volume of complaint is swelled by the voices also of those who, in their heart of hearts, object to any interference with their pursuit of pleasure. People whose opinions widely differ on problems connected with sexual relations and habits of life find a common platform from which to attack the Police. Whatever may be the causes of, or the excuses for, these gusts of popular emotion, there can be no doubt that they have in the past tended, and still tend, to some extent to impair the activity of constables in this class of case. We were incidentally informed by Miss Colson that a constable had told her one night that he would leave the work more to her, as he did not like the risk of losing his post, because he had a wife and five children dependent upon him. It was a natural observation, and from our standpoint the fact that so many constables should have the courage, notwithstanding the possibility of heavy censure if they should make a mistake, to discharge their peculiarly disagreeable duty in regard to this class of offence is one for which the Force deserves commendation. Q 40527.

We have made these observations because they have considerable bearing on the question whether the law should be amended so as to increase the powers given to constables for putting down solicitation in the streets. If, notwithstanding the limitations now imposed by the present statutory provisions upon the Police, cases occur which give rise to attacks on the Police which must tend to discourage them in the performance of their duties, it would appear to be inexpedient to increase their powers in dealing with the evil of street prostitution. In our opinion, this consideration should be borne in mind in considering any proposed amendment of the law upon the subject.

Suggested Amendments of the Law as to Solicitation.

§ 10. Comments upon the existing law, and suggestions for the purpose of its improvement, were made to us by Mr. Coote as embodying the view of societies which are composed of men and women whose zeal for public morality and whose position and experience entitle their views to most respectful consideration. In criticising these suggestions we must point out that we should be going beyond the scope of the matter upon which we have to report, and in respect of which we are empowered to make recommendations, if we attempted to deal with the broad social problems connected with the existence of female prostitution on a considerable if not large scale in London. The solution of those problems depends, in the long run, on the settlement of still wider questions connected with the relations of the sexes, as to which public opinion is much divided, and is in a state of flux. We are faced, however much people may desire to ignore it, with the fact that a numerous class of women, who earn the whole or a part of their means of subsistence by prostitution, exists in the Metropolis, as in other great cities. It is difficult, probably almost impossible, to obtain, even approximately, accurate statistics as to the number or as to the earnings of these women. Only a proportion (how large or how small a proportion we cannot say) of these persons systematically frequent the streets for the purpose of carrying on their business. It is only as to the manner in which it is expedient that the Police should deal with solicitation by this class of women who habitually use the streets that we think we ought to speak, though, in confining our observations to that topic, we must not be taken as assuming that it is only by Police action that the Government can do something to diminish or remove the evil caused by the existence of such a class in the community.

Basing his suggestion upon the general views which he had laid before us, Mr. Coote put forward some practical proposals, not only on his own behalf, but on behalf of the National Vigilance Association and the London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality, in the following terms :—

Q. 6952. "I may say we have had a number of meetings, and the names of those who have taken part in the discussion with regard to this question I am submitting, would be a guarantee to you gentlemen that although it would not appear to be a solution, and may have some peculiar elements about it in the opinion of the public, yet considering all the difficulties of this question, this is the combined wisdom of a number of experts on this very question. We suggest that a verbal or printed warning should be given to both men and women, who, in the opinion of the constables or constable on duty, frequent a public thoroughfare for immoral purposes. After a second warning they should be liable to arrest, on the evidence of two policemen, for frequenting the place for the purpose of soliciting to prostitution. We further suggest that in the cases of minors charged with the above offence, an effort should be made to place them under proper and legal guardianship, rather than to send them to prison, or to inflict upon them a fine. We offer these suggestions as a method which, in our opinion, would effectually deal with this difficult problem, and at the same time safeguard the rights of the public, and to make it well-nigh impossible for official mistakes to be made in connection with solicitation in the streets for immoral purposes. We further think that as a warning and preventive power to men, especially young men, it would be all-powerful in preventing the daily and nightly visits to the public rendezvous of vice, which are disastrous alike to the individual, the home, and the nation."

As we understand the proposal, a constable ought to be vested with power: (1) To give to any person who, in his opinion, is frequenting a street for immoral purposes, a verbal or printed warning; (2) to give a second warning to the same person; (3) if, after such second warning, the person frequents the place for such immoral purposes, the person so neglecting the warning shall be guilty of an offence punishable summarily, and liable to arrest and conviction on the evidence of two policemen; and (4) if the persons so warned are minors, the magistrate should have power to place them under proper and legal guardianship instead of punishing them by fine or imprisonment.

With regard to the last of these proposals, we may say that we should regard it as a quite reasonable provision consequential on the adoption of the others, but we believe that the powers given to the Courts by the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, are sufficient to attain the object aimed at.

If we are right in assuming that it is meant that "frequenting a public street for immoral purposes" is not, of itself, to be a criminal offence, then it seems to us that the proposal is that a constable should be empowered to warn people against what is morally reprehensible conduct. In effect, constables would be required to discharge duties analogous to those which are, or ought to be, performed by parents, by ministers of religion, by teachers, missionaries, or rescue workers. We think that to throw upon the Metropolitan Police any such work would be to place upon them a burden which, in practice, they could not perform, and would be extending the range of Police action far beyond that within which it must be confined if they are to perform their ordinary duties with efficiency; and that any attempt to invest them with official authority to warn people against vice and immorality would lead to such irritation against them as to make the proper discharge of their duties, already difficult enough, almost impossible.

If the task of improving public morality and raising the general tone of Society comes within the sphere of State action in a community like ours it should, in our opinion, be entrusted to special officers appointed for the purpose, and not allotted to public servants who, however fit for the duty of preventing the commission of ordinary crime, of aiding in bringing offenders to justice, and of maintaining public order, are not specially fitted for the more delicate task of restraining or reproving erring, vicious or dissolute persons.

Shortly put, Mr. Coote's proposals amount to the creation of a new offence which may be described as "frequenting a street for the purpose of soliciting to prostitution after two prescribed warnings against doing so have been given to the defendant by a constable." We think that the words are too vague to be fitly introduced into criminal legislation. Unless we are willing to run the risk of allowing Magistrates and Judges to make any conduct of which they disapprove the object of punishment, and thus subject our freedom of action to the practically uncontrolled discretion of Courts of Justice, it is necessary that the acts and forbearances, or the series of acts and forbearances, which are to be treated as constituting a criminal offence, should be clearly defined. To tell a constable that, after a second warning, he is to arrest a man or a woman, simply because he or she has been guilty of frequenting a public thoroughfare for immoral purposes, is to give him an order so vague as either to place the liberty of others in his discretion or else to embarrass him so much that he will never feel it right to act on the order at all. Mr. Coote did not contend that the existing law as to solicitation by women is not strong enough, and his proposals seem to be really directed to punishing solicitation by a man not only of chaste women and girls but of common prostitutes. In considering them it ought not to be forgotten that the great difference between habitual solicitation by a common prostitute and occasional solicitation by a man is that the former is carrying on an immoral business in a way offensive to the sense of public decency and so as to become a nuisance to respectable persons using the streets.

We do not think it likely that legislation making solicitation by a man addressed to a woman who does not resent it, or, at any rate, shows no resentment or annoyance, would be acceptable, even if it passed through Parliament, to the community at large, and that any attempt to put down unchastity by legislation enlarging the sphere of Police action would be an utter failure in the present state of public opinion.

We cannot see our way to recommending these proposals made by Mr. Coote, not only for the general reasons indicated by the observations we have just made, but because of the formidable addition which they would make, if adopted, to the work of the Police, who are already sufficiently oppressed by the multifarious duties which they have to carry out on beat and on patrol.

Mr. Coote himself, as might be expected from his great experience, showed in his evidence that he quite foresaw the practical difficulties, because, when examined by Mr. Dickinson, he admitted that the proposals were complicated, and that in view of the complaints that might be made the propriety of the police constable's action in giving the warning in a particular case might have to become the subject of private inquiry before the Chief Commissioner. His exact words were :—

"Supposing a young man who is innocent is given this warning by the Police, there is no publicity. The warning would state where it emanated from. He and his friends would go privately and have the whole matter investigated. It would obviate anything like a public mistake on the part of the Police. Supposing a respectable woman was given a printed warning, her friends and she immediately—not in a Police Court, where everything is public, but in a private room before, say, the Chief Commissioner—could go and deal with it, and it would be investigated at once, and no harm is done practically. That is what we think, and, as I say, it would rid the place of the young men who would be in fear of getting this bit of paper." Q. 698

We cannot agree with Mr. Coote in thinking that no harm would be done practically because of the privacy of the admittedly necessary investigation. Even if it were possible (and we are certain it would not be so) for the Chief Commissioner to deal with the complaints which would be the inevitable result of any considerable activity on the part of constables in giving these warnings, we are convinced that such private inquiries as are contemplated would create such friction and such suspicion as would soon make the whole proceeding a kind of public scandal.

We have only to add that, so far as the condition of the streets is concerned, Mr. Coote's own testimony hardly supports the view that these proposals as a means for clearing the streets of undesirable persons are necessary or that in fact any drastic alteration of the law is required. Mr. Coote's words as to the condition of the streets are so emphatic as to deserve reproduction. He told us :—

Q. 6958 "I have known London for the last forty years, and my memory goes back to quite forty-seven years. I knew the Haymarket and Piccadilly very well forty-seven years ago, and I say that London to-day, compared with what it was forty years ago, is an open-air cathedral. Then it was vicious in every particular. To-day the change is marvellous in the people, both in the crime and in the habits of the people. Everything has gone for the better. That is my conviction as a citizen of London, and I am proud of London."

Upon the whole, we do not think it necessary to recommend any alteration in the statutory provisions relating to cases of solicitation.

Indecency in the Streets.

§ 11. The Chief Commissioner called our attention to a matter closely connected with solicitation cases, namely, the inadequate provisions for dealing with cases of sexual intercourse in streets and public places.

Q. 67. Such offences come under the terms of the London County Council bye-law to which we have referred above, but constables have no power of arrest for breach of such a bye-law, and can only demand the names and addresses of offenders and proceed by summons. In fact, however, where the indecency is of so gross a kind as the actually having connection in a street, or attempting to do so, constables apprehend offenders on a charge of having committed a common law misdemeanour ; but the usual practice of the Magistrates is not to commit for trial in such cases but to deal with them under the County Council bye-law. The practice appears to us to be entirely expedient as the law now stands, but to arrest for an indictable misdemeanour and then to proceed for an offence under a County Council bye-law is a somewhat illogical method of procedure.

Q. 67. The Chief Commissioner pointed out to us that over one thousand cases of gross indecency were successfully prosecuted in 1905, but added that the procedure for dealing with the common law offence is cumbersome, and that it would be expedient, in his opinion, to make the having, or attempting to have, sexual intercourse in the streets a statutory offence in respect of which a Constable should have the power of summary arrest.

We are not prepared to recommend that a power of arrest should be given for all offences coming within the terms of such a vague provision as the County Council bye-law, but we think that the Police Act, 1839, might be amended by the addition of a new statutory provision making sexual intercourse, or attempt to have sexual intercourse, in the streets, within the view of a constable, an offence in regard to which the constable shall have power of arrest.

Alleged Bribery of the Police by Prostitutes.

§ 12. Communications were made to us suggesting that constables, and especially constables of the C Division, have been in the habit of receiving bribes from prostitutes with a view to being permitted to pursue their avocation without interference.

We consider such a charge as one of a very serious kind, because the existence of any such practice on a large, or even on a considerable scale, would not only involve neglect of duty on the part of constables who were party to it, but because it would indicate such laxity and corruption of character on the part of the recipients as must impair public confidence in their general efficiency. We should have deemed it our duty, as being a matter indirectly connected with the manner in which the Police deal with solicitation cases, to ourselves have inquired into any complaint which might definitely have been made even by prostitutes, if any person making specific allegations had approached us with precise charges against individual officers or constables. In fact, no person to whose word it was possible to attach any credence has taken that course. We at one time thought it might be possible, with the aid of some of the ladies engaged in rescue work, to bring before us some of those who, by their instrumentality, have abandoned life on the streets, and perhaps some who were still pursuing their avocation, but we gather that these ladies found the difficulty of inducing the attendance of such persons insurmountable, and we felt that the exercise of our compulsory powers would lead to no satisfactory result. Under these circumstances, we have to rely for our conclusion as to the extent, if any, to which there is truth in this suggestion upon the general evidence and upon inferences founded upon the knowledge and experience we have gained as to the conduct and character of members of the Force during this Inquiry.

We ought to point out that except as to a charge that there is a widespread or systematic practice of bribery tantamount to a general levying of blackmail on these unfortunate women by the Police in any Division or part of the Metropolis the question whether any constables should so far forget themselves as to receive gifts from prostitutes is only part of a much larger question, namely, the receipt of gratuities from members of the public by police officers and constables.

The Regulations as to gratuities are strict and precise. The receipt of gratuities by the Police is not forbidden by the Regulations except in certain specified cases; but it is expressly laid down that no gratuity is to be retained by any police constable without the express permission of the Commissioner. It is matter of common knowledge that constables do, when they render special services to persons, often receive gratuities, but it is the duty of the constable to report the matter and take it subject to the decision of the Commissioner as to its being retained or returned to the person giving it. We think these Regulations ought to be strictly observed. The general knowledge of their existence and practical application would go far to discredit with the public allegations with reference to the taking of money by the Police which, although having very little foundation, tend to lower the reputation of the Force in public opinion.

See White Book Gratuities, pp. 29 to 31.

We have no reason to think that these Regulations are habitually disobeyed by constables. We refer to this practice of giving gratuities in order that the distinction between what may be called "tipping" and the kind of bribery suggested may be clearly noticed. The matter is not without relevancy to the present topic, because, in some of the communications received by us, the suggestion of bribery simply amounts to the tipping of constables by women, who may or may not be prostitutes, when leaving restaurants or places of amusement, in recognition of small services, such as obtaining a cab. Such a practice, if it exists, has obviously nothing to do with the alleged bribery by prostitutes in the streets of constables on a beat with a view to securing immunity from arrest. Sir Edward Henry in reference to this topic said :—

"I have often since I have been Commissioner received letters, sometimes anonymous and sometimes authentic, alleging that bookmakers gave money to the Police, but I have not received a single letter, and no complaint, oral or written, has been made to me during the three and a half years I have been Commissioner, charging the Police with levying blackmail from women of the unfortunate class. From what I know of the tone of the men themselves, I am satisfied that if any individual man were to take money from these women it would certainly come to the knowledge of his comrades, and I am also satisfied that his comrades would look upon him as an unmitigated blackguard, and that he could not remain in the Force for long. I do not, of course, say that individual instances of taking money may not occur, but the whole Force know that any proved misconduct of this sort would be dealt with with severity. I think, too, that the system which I have endeavoured to explain to the Commission makes it quite impossible that there should be any systematised form of blackmailing like this, because the variation in the beats is so great, and in a street like Regent Street, where, I suppose, on either side you have parts of ten beats, it would not be of the slightest use a woman bribing the first constable she came to, because she would only go a few yards before she came to another beat; I suppose on both sides of Regent Street there are probably twenty beats; and then, besides that, there is continual patrolling by the Police. Therefore it seems to me that anything like a system of blackmailing these women is more or less impracticable, and certainly it could not exist for many days without becoming known to the authorities."

We have carefully considered and tested this statement of the Chief Commissioner, as well as the Police Returns, and the effect of the general evidence upon this point. We were greatly struck by the testimony of Mr. Coote, which dealt, in the main, with foreign women who in considerable numbers have during recent years infested the streets of the West End, because circumstances came to our notice which made it probable that, if attempts to corrupt the Constables on any large scale had been made, it is these women who would have been most likely to make the effort. Many of these foreign women are not, like most English prostitutes, mere unfortunate units on the streets, but they have been brought over by other persons as part of a more or less organised business of supplying the Metropolis with prostitutes, and making money through their instrumentality; but what Mr. Coote told us, as the result of his conversations with foreign women of this class, is strongly in favour of the Police.

We have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for believing that there has existed, or that there at present exists, any widespread and systematic bribery of the Police by prostitutes in any part of London, and though we cannot believe that isolated instances of constables having received money gifts from women have never occurred, we believe that they have been and are very infrequent.

The main grounds upon which we have formed this opinion are :—

(1) The character of the officers and constables of the Force. Whatever the defects of the ordinary constable may be, and even if it be admitted that, like a good many other persons in public employment of a similar grade, he is ready to accept a gratuity, we do not think he is the kind of man who would try to make money out of the unfortunate women who resort to the streets as a means of livelihood, or care to form a kind of alliance with those of the more successful among them which the receipts of sums of money from them would involve. Anything like frequent acceptance of a bribe must, under the conditions of service, become known to his brother-constables, and though he might, through a mistaken feeling of comradeship, not report the misconduct to a Sergeant or Inspector, the public opinion of the Force would make itself felt, and sooner or later the irregular practice would become known to the authorities. From what we have seen of members of the Force we are ready to believe the Chief Commissioner when he says that :—

"The general tone of the men is such that his comrades would look upon a man guilty of this mean and disreputable misconduct as an unmitigated blackguard."

The general evidence of the ladies and gentlemen engaged in the good work of reform of which we have heard, bringing to our notice, as it does, so many acts of kindness towards prostitutes, especially those who have only just commenced walking the streets, confirms the view which we have just expressed.

(2) We think that the earnings of those individuals of the prostitute class who find it necessary to resort to the streets in order to find customers are so scanty as to make it impossible for anything like bribery of the constables to be carried on on a scale which would affect their conduct or be an inducement to them to deviate from the path of duty. We are convinced that the majority of these women are very poor indeed, and Mr. Coote, speaking with ample experience, said :—

Q. 6975. "From a public point of view I am glad to believe, on the evidence, that prostitution does not pay from an English point of view, that is, after they descend from the theatres and the music halls into the streets. From eighteen to twenty-four, yes; but then they leave the different music halls, and they are out of the proprietorship, and on their own account, and it does not pay. That is my conviction from what I have seen, and I am glad to know that honest industry pays better than most of the forms of vice so far as the English girls are concerned. Some it may pay, but only for a time."

(3) The conditions under which a constable performs his duty on beat or on patrol make it practically useless for a woman to attempt to bribe with a view to secure immunity from arrest. Of course, if a woman who has been cautioned, and whom a constable is about to arrest for a subsequent accosting, were to slip 5s. into his hand to induce him to let her go, that act, if the constable were ready to misconduct himself, might be successful and the affair might terminate by his saying with affected sternness, "Move on; go about your business," or something of that kind on that particular occasion. But even then there would be great risk of the transaction being observed. In the populous and crowded parts of the town which these women frequent, the beats are small and the number of constables on patrol so considerable that it would be useless for a woman to procure freedom from arrest by small bribes to this or that complaisant constable. If she should succeed in obtaining immunity from one constable, it would profit her but little, because, before she had gone a few yards further on in the street, she might meet another constable whom she had never seen before; and again, it must be borne in mind that a constable is only allowed to be on one beat for a short time.

(4) The improvement in the streets, as to which we have had ample testimony, and the number of convictions of prostitutes for solicitation during recent years, both negative the suggestion of extensive bribery.

(5) Discipline is, as we have ascertained, extremely strict upon this point, and the arrangements made in Regent Street and Piccadilly, and in the other principal streets which are crowded at night, are such that a constable could not for any lengthened period be guilty of receiving bribes from women without almost certain detection by an Inspector or a Sergeant, and he knows that in addition to his uniformed superiors there may be plain clothes men keeping observation in the street, and he has ever present to his mind the knowledge that discovery would mean instant dismissal from the Force and the ruin of his career.

For all these reasons we feel reasonably sure that, whatever may have been the case for short periods in years gone by, there is no ground for believing that the practice of accepting money from prostitutes prevails to any appreciable extent.

Alleged Bribery of the Police by Bookmakers.

§ 13. In some of the communications made to us it was alleged that street bookmakers have been in the habit of bribing members of the Force in order to escape interference with the carrying on of their business, and it was even suggested, as was done by Platt into whose complaint we inquired exhaustively, that the practice was general and widespread. Sir Edward Henry, too, told us frankly that he had had many "allegations of the Police being corrupted at times by bookmakers," and he had had to deal with those cases when they arose. He drew a distinction between cases of bribery by prostitutes and of bribery by bookmakers, and evidently considered the prevalence of the latter as more likely than that of the former. We agree with him on the point. We are satisfied that instances in which constables have yielded to the temptation of taking money from prostitutes are much more rare than those in which they have been guilty of receiving money from betting men. We have stated above the result of our inspection of the Returns of Complaints on this head against the Police made to the Chief Commissioner during the ten years ending December 31st, 1906. From them it appears that the total number of cases in which it was proved that members of the Force were guilty of receiving money or being in improper relations with bookmakers was thirty-two out of a total of 560 in which complaint had been made. In fairness to the Police reference ought also to be made to the Return printed in the Appendix to this Report giving the statistics as to the number of prosecutions for street bookmaking and as to the fines imposed during the ten years ending December 31st, 1905. This Return shows that during those years there was a continuous increase of Police activity which seems to be inconsistent with any extensive or effectual corruption of the men engaged in the work of putting down street betting; though, in considering the bearing of these figures on the question, allowance must be made for the increase in the number of men carrying on the business and in the extent of their operations. We regard the statistics as tending also to show that this kind of bribery has not become an organised system. On the other hand, though Platt failed to substantiate his charges against the members of the Force accused by him, it is clear as appears from our Report on the case that in their secret dealings the bookmakers who were examined before us acted as though the bribery of Policemen was a common and quite credible thing.

Q. 85.

See p. 100.

Appendix, p. xix.

We have considered the matter in all its bearings and have come to the conclusion that there is no reason for believing that bribery of the Police by bookmakers has been carried on according to any organised system; but the Force as a whole cannot be absolved altogether from the charge of receiving money from bookmakers. The Police authorities, we believe, made every reasonable effort to suppress the evil of street betting so far as possible under the legislation existing before the passing of the Act of 1906, and we do not think their failure to suppress it more effectually was caused by the fact that improper relations had been established between bookmakers and any considerable proportion of those constables who have been specially engaged in keeping observation upon them with a view to their detection and punishment. Still, we think upon the materials before us that the practice of receiving gratuities from bookmakers has to a certain extent—the exact extent it is impossible to determine—prevailed in the Force. It is the general opinion that the stringent provisions of the new Act have made it impossible for bookmakers in the future to carry on their business profitably in public places ; and, if so, one great temptation to misconduct to which constables have been exposed will henceforth cease to exist. We regard the taking of money from this class of person as a serious offence in a constable, and there should be no relaxation of vigilance on the part of the officers of the Force, and any offence of the kind, if proved, should, we think, be punished with severity.

Sobriety of the Police.

§ 14. We should not have considered it necessary to make any comments at all in regard to the general sobriety of the Police, as to which we felt no doubt, but for the fact that Mr. Timewell, the Secretary of the Police and Public Vigilance Society, to our surprise, in the course of his general evidence, which we understood was to be directed to the manner in which the Police deal with street offences coming within our Terms of Reference, thought fit to make a sweeping charge of insobriety and of habitual secret drinking contrary to the Regulations against the Police as a whole.

Though we are not, by a strict construction of the Terms of Reference, charged with an inquiry into the question whether the Police misconduct themselves by intemperate indulgence in intoxicating liquor, we did not feel that we could absolutely reject evidence which was apparently intended to show that constables are in the habit of drinking so much as to be incapable of attending to their duties properly, and therefore efficiently dealing with street offences ; and for the same reason we have hesitated to expunge Mr. Timewell's extraordinary allegations from the notes of evidence.

If Mr. Timewell had simply come before us as an individual, we should have let the matter rest, but being Secretary of the Society which we have mentioned he could not be regarded as speaking simply in his personal capacity. The Police and Public Vigilance Society, though its members are few in number, has for some years been actively engaged in a campaign against the Metropolitan Police, and its efforts have been assisted by the widespread publicity given by the Press to the cases in which it has, rightly or wrongly, alleged that Police action has been mistaken or wrong. We are certain that it is in the interests of the Metropolitan Police, and therefore of the whole of the law-abiding part of the community, that the charges made by such a society or by any other of the critics of the Police, should be made in the most open manner, and their truth or falsehood judged by the opinion of competent and responsible persons.

Impressed by these considerations, we think it worth while to reproduce Mr. Timewell's charges on this head and to pass our judgment upon them.

Mr. Timewell said :—

Q. 52661 "I think the most serious matter that we ought to consider is the persistent drinking on the sly of Policemen. I think that is the most serious matter we have to contend with. They have regular places of call at all hours of the day and at all hours of the night, where they drink on the sly—at public houses, at general shops, at receiving offices, and at all sorts of places—and I think it is quite a common thing for Policemen between the hours of ten and twelve at night to get six or eight or even nine drinks before Q. 52562. midnight . . . while they are on duty. My contention is that 50 per cent. of the night duty men are more or less under the influence of drink, and they are quite incapable of doing their duty ; they are quarrelsome, and they interfere with people unnecessarily, and, as I say, when once they get a charge, they go through with it somehow. I can assure you that what I am speaking of now I know as a fact, for I have seen it, and I have, I think, on more than one occasion, had to complain to the Police Commissioner with regard to secret drinking. The most recent complaint I sent in he acted upon, and the men were punished."

Having regard to the fact that in no one of the numerous cases into which we have minutely enquired, except that of Dubery, a new recruit, who had grossly misbehaved himself within a few weeks of his joining the Force, and who would have been dismissed if he had not resigned, no witness directly or indirectly asserted that any one of the Police concerned in those cases had been in the slightest degree under the influence of drink, and to the fact that ample opportunity had been afforded for the giving of evidence complaining that drunkenness was common amongst Policemen while on duty, or that breaches of the Regulations as to drinking while on duty were common, we heard these statements from Mr. Timewell with great surprise and brought them to the notice of Sir Edward Henry at our next sitting, when he said :—

Q. 52759 "I believe there is no foundation whatever for it" (Mr. Timewell's accusation). "I go about myself, I see the men on their beats, and I have never come across a man who has been under the influence of drink. Of course, occasionally it is found by the officers that a man has had drink. Then he is brought up before us and very severely dealt with, but it is comparatively exceptional, or quite exceptional."

We thereupon felt it right at once to say that . . - "We were very surprised to hear Mr. Timewell make a sweeping charge against the Police that 50 per cent. of the constables were under the influence of drink while on night duty, and that that was the cause of the mistake that so often occurred. We think it right to say, as this is the last day on which evidence will be taken—we have been taking evidence now for a considerable time—that nothing has more struck us in the course of our proceedings than the testimony afforded to the sobriety of the Police by the fact that, except in one among the many cases we have investigated, no complainant has even suggested that any constable concerned was 'under the influence of drink.' In that one case, a young constable who had only been in the Force a very short time had undoubtedly misbehaved himself and had been immediately dismissed. . . . In view of the gravity of the statement made by Mr. Timewell, and the publicity given to it in the Press, we think it right in the public interest at once to make this statement." Q. 52761.

We desire to repeat that statement here, and to state as a result of our Inquiry that the Chief Commissioner may be congratulated upon the general sobriety of the very large Force of which he is the head, and upon the fact that the cases in which any officer or constable is found drunk or sensibly under the influence of liquor while on duty are so extremely rare.

The Regulations as to drinking and drunkenness, and as to the scale of punishment for the same form a body of Rules of a strict and far-reaching character, and it is difficult to see in what practical respect they could be made stronger without making total abstinence both off and on duty a condition of employment or continuance in employment as a constable. Considering that the number of men to which the Regulations apply is over 17,000, and the general habits of the community, the number of cases in which breaches of the Regulations applicable to drinking and drunkenness strike us, so far as we have been able to ascertain them, and certainly during the last few years, as having been remarkably small. We have had occasion, in considering our Report on the special complaints made to us, to look at the defaulters sheets of all or nearly all the constables immediately concerned in the affairs in consequence of which our inquiries had to be made, and we find that breaches of these particular Regulations are quite exceptional. See White Book, pp. 34–38.

We are glad to observe that these startling allegations were advanced by Mr. Timewell on his own responsibility and not as part of the recommendations which he was authorised by the Police and Public Vigilance Society to bring before the Commission.

The Prosecution of Charges in the Police Court.

§ 15. As we have pointed out above it is the duty of a constable who has exercised his power of summary apprehension and taken his prisoner to a Police Station and there preferred a charge which is accepted to prosecute in the Police Court. It is also the duty of a constable in case he has observed the commission of an offence for which he has been unable to effect an arrest, even if he has the legal power of arrest, to lay an information before the Magistrate with a view to the issuing of a summons if the Magistrate thinks fit to take that course when the name and address of the offender can be obtained. It is equally his duty in cases where he has observed the commission of an offence for which he has not the legal right to arrest the offender to lay such an information if he can obtain the name and address of the person offending. In either case he himself is the person who from a legal standpoint takes steps to set the criminal law in motion. In prosecuting he is doing so on behalf of and in the name of the King, and subject to any action taken by the Attorney-General he is allowed to do so by the Constitution.

In England and Wales there is no Public Prosecutor save so far as the Director of Public Prosecutions may be regarded as discharging the functions of such an officer. There is no officer in the Metropolis whose rights and duties correspond to those of the Procurator Fiscal in the City of Glasgow. It follows that upon the constable's arrest of a person for one of these street offences the burden of getting together the witnesses in support of his charge, of procuring their attendance at the Court, and of conducting the case in the Police Court, is thrown upon him. In practice, under the Regulations, he is assisted in the discharge of his duty by his superior officers, and he can always ask for guidance from them, and may, where it is deemed necessary by them in their discretion, obtain legal assistance. In the immense majority of the cases of this class which arise in London the constable himself attends, and the case is dealt with by the magistrates without either the prosecuting constable or the prisoner being represented by Counsel or Solicitor.

The Regulations which we have set out above give excellent practical instruction to the Police as to the manner in which they are to discharge their duties as prosecutor, and to give evidence, and we see no reason for suggesting their amendment in any particular.

The most important Regulation in the interests of the community is that which enjoins a constable :—

White Book, p. 13.

"To speak the truth at all times and under all circumstances, and when called upon to give evidence to state all he knows respecting the case, without fear or reservation, and without any desire to influence the result, either for or against a prisoner."

We believe that in general this Regulation is complied with by members of the Force in dealing with the classes of offence with which we are concerned, both in preferring the charge in the Charge Room and in the subsequent hearing at the Police Court.

The general evidence which was given before us by Sir Forrest Fulton, Sir Ralph Littler, and the Magistrates appears to us to be eminently favourable to the Police in this regard. The action of the Magistrates in their own Courts shows as conclusively as is possible the general trustworthiness of Police evidence.

We have, as appears from our special Reports, had the responsibility cast upon us in a considerable number of cases of considering whether Police witnesses on the one hand or witnesses not connected with the Force on the other have been speaking the truth before us. If our special Reports are looked at it will be seen that we have come to the conclusion that the officers and constables whom we have examined have generally given us truthful and accurate evidence. In the cases in which we have come to a conclusion adverse to the Police it follows from the opinions that we have expressed that we disbelieve the evidence of one or more of the constables called on the Police side, and in some cases we consider that perjury was committed. It will, however, be found that in those cases the perjury has been consequential upon other conduct. In not one of the cases is the perjury itself the primary offence, and in not one of those cases is there anything to show that the constable, acting from malicious motives determined from the commencement of his intervention to commit perjury, and where he has done so it has been to shield himself from wrongful conduct which he has already committed. That consideration, while it aggravates the misconduct of the particular constable in a particular matter, seems to afford little warrant for the supposition that constables are more prone than other men to speak falsely in general.

After listening for many days to the witnesses in the cases of special complaint, the impression left upon our minds is a very definite one to the effect that on the whole the Police are quite as trustworthy witnesses as those of any other class.

It is the duty of the constable concerned in a charge to bring forward the necessary witnesses. We have no reason to think that this Regulation is not in general complied with. In the cases which we have investigated we have, however, noticed that in nearly all of them the evidence against the prisoner at the Police Court was that of the Police. We were struck by the fact that in none of these cases had there been any attempt on the part of the constable or constables concerned to obtain the names and addresses of bystanders. We recognise that in many, perhaps most, cases it would be difficult if not practically impossible for a constable effecting an arrest to take steps at once to secure the attendance as witnesses of onlookers. But, in cases where the circumstances are such as to bring several constables on the scene, we do not understand why one of the constables should not make it his business to get the names of quiet and seemingly respectable persons who have had the opportunity of observing what has taken place. In Harding's case, for instance, we should have thought some of the persons residing in Sclater Street might have seen the assault on P.C. Cann, and could have been subpœnaed if it were found that they could give relevant evidence. We feel that there are difficulties in placing upon constables the duty of generally taking the course suggested, but we think that whenever it is reasonably possible the Police evidence should be supplemented by that of persons not belonging to or connected with the Force.

Suggestions were made to us in the course of our Inquiry that the Police are sometimes placed at a disadvantage by the fact that the conduct of cases under the existing law and practice must be entrusted to the constable who preferred the charge, and that no one on the side of the Crown is entitled to take any public part in the proceedings with a view to guiding or helping him, and that he alone, either as the constable who set the law in motion by arresting the alleged offender, or by laying an information against him where the case comes before the Court on summons, has the right to address the Court or to cross-examine the accused if he gives evidence, or his witnesses, if any, should be called for the defence. Our attention was also attracted to this matter by a remark made in the report from Sir Edward Henry to the Secretary of State in regard to the complaint of Dr. Gerothwohl, in which he pointed out that if the Police had had legal assistance and had cross-examined the defendant a different complexion might have been put upon the matter.

In the view of the learned Magistrates who expressed an opinion upon this point, the existing practice does not sensibly operate to the detriment of the prosecution. They feel it part of their own duty to find out the actual facts of the case and to ask such questions as they deem necessary of the defendant in case he elects to give evidence, and of his witnesses. Whenever an application is made on reasonable grounds they remand a case so that the prosecuting constable has the opportunity of getting further evidence and of consulting, it may be, his superior officers.

We believe that in the great majority of cases of street offence with which the Magistrates have to deal their view is entirely well founded, but we think that in many cases where the facts leading up to the arrest or to the summoning of the defendant are in dispute the Magistrate himself can have no adequate materials for effective cross-examination, and even if he had those materials he would hardly be in a position to use them without conveying a very false impression to the public. The truth is that Police Magistrates in London and Justices in the country in dealing with trivial offences have been in the habit, where there is any serious conflict of evidence, of freely giving the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. There has been a general disposition to look upon the magisterial power as quasi paternal. The complaints made to us, and what we read from day to day in newspapers, show that a very considerable change has come over public opinion in regard to the gravity of these street offences and the consequent proceedings in Police Courts. We believe the change is due : (1) To the greater sensitiveness of the community as to conviction on charges of drunkenness and of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, which is itself due to an improvement in the moral tone of all classes; (2) to the increased publicity given to Police Court proceedings in the Press; and (3) very largely to the legislative changes made in regard to the London Police Courts and Petty Sessional Courts throughout the country.

When the Metropolitan Police Force was first established the jurisdiction of the Magistrate at what was then called the " Police Office " was closely connected with his authority as controller of a body of constables. As the result of the Police Act, 1829, the Police Act, 1839, and the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, a Police Magistrate has ceased to have any special control over or connection with the Police.

As Mr. Curtis Bennett said, the Metropolitan Police Courts have now become Courts of first instance for the trial of criminal offences and certain other cases in which jurisdiction is given by Statute just as the County Courts are Courts of First Instance in civil matters. He suggested to us that it would be expedient by a change in the designation of these Courts to emphasise the new character and importance which they have assumed. We should be going beyond the kind of recommendation which we think we have a right to make under our Commission if we were to make a formal recommendation upon the subject, but we feel that it would not be presumptuous on our part to say that our opinion is that it would tend to increase public confidence if it were made clear to everybody by the very name of the Court that all persons who were being tried by a London Magistrate were being tried by a Judge absolutely independent of and free from Police control. Q. 45390.

The disadvantage in which the Police are placed in the Police Courts by the existing practice under which a prosecuting constable has in general himself to conduct his case without the active help of a superior officer or legal aid is felt not only in the Metropolis, but in other cities. Major Tarry, Chief Constable of Leeds, informed us that he had found the existing rules added to his difficulties. He explained Q. 39342.

that he had attempted, to some extent, to get over those difficulties by ordering that, whenever possible, a superior officer should lay an Information, and, as informant, secure a right of audience and the conduct of the case at Petty Sessions, but that that course of action did not lessen the difficulties that arise in cases where a constable has summarily arrested a prisoner. He therefore suggested that in those cases the superior officer of Police in attendance at the Court should be allowed a locus standi, but pointed out that in order to carry the suggestion into effect legislation would be required.

We have seen that by the Regulations in the Metropolis, an Inspector is always in attendance at the Police Court for the purpose of superintending and watching the constables who have to attend as prosecutors or witnesses. We have considered the question whether it would be expedient to give to these Inspectors the right of addressing the Court, examining the witnesses for the prosecution, and cross-examining those for the defence, but have come to the conclusion that very little, if anything, would be gained by such an innovation in the practice of the Court. An Inspector is at the present time in a position to give advice to, and to help the prosecuting constable in the management of his case, and we do not believe that any substantial advantage would be obtained by throwing upon him the duties of an advocate. So long as there is no office of Public Prosecutor for the Metropolis, we can only recommend that legal assistance should be freely given upon the application of a prosecuting constable whenever the case is out of the ordinary course, and the accused seriously defends himself against the charge.

White Book, p. 277.

The present Regulation is, that: "Should circumstances transpire during the hearing of a case, which render it desirable that the Police should be legally represented, application is to be made for an adjournment for a sufficient period to enable the case to be laid before the Commissioner." As we gather, the Magistrates, as a rule, accede to an application for an adjournment when requested. It is not expressly stated who is to determine the circumstances which render it desirable that an application for an adjournment should be made, but we understand that, in practice, the Inspector who watches the case takes upon himself the duty, if the prosecuting constable does not act upon his own initiative, of asking, when he thinks fit, for an adjournment for the purpose of making a request to the Commissioner. This procedure strikes us as somewhat too cumbrous, and we think that it would be expedient, in order to avoid delay and adding to the work of the Chief Commissioner, to allow a Superintendent to give the desired permission to the prosecuting constable to obtain legal aid.

See p. 90.

We have referred above to the fact that there is in London no officer corresponding to the Procurator-Fiscal in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and though we should be travelling beyond the scope of the recommendations which we are empowered to make if we were to suggest proposals necessarily involving a fundamental change in the general system of criminal procedure in England and Wales, it seems necessary, as being closely connected with the duties of the Police in prosecuting at a Police Court, to call attention to the fact that the position of a constable as private prosecutor is one of a somewhat difficult and anomalous character.

The Lord-Advocate was good enough to give us a lucid and interesting statement as to the way in which criminal prosecutions are conducted in Scotland. There, he told us, the system of private prosecution is substantially unknown.

Q. 51971.

"The general rule of the Scotch jurisprudence is that when an offence is committed it is committed against society, and society protects itself through the public officers," whom he mentioned,

"and in this way a system of public prosecution universally prevails."

At the head of the system is the Lord-Advocate, and under him there act the Solicitor-General for Scotland as his Advocate-Depute, and a certain number of salaried gentlemen who also act as Advocates-Depute. In each county there is a Procurator Fiscal, who is also the Lord-Advocate's Depute. He further explained the development of municipal government in Scotland by virtue of various Statutes, and he particularly referred us to the Statutes relating to Edinburgh and Glasgow under which Procurators Fiscal are established in those cities with duties as his Depute corresponding to those discharged by the Procurators Fiscal in the counties. The effect is that the Procurator Fiscal in Edinburgh and in Glasgow is, as the Depute of the Lord-Advocate, and, therefore, as a subordinate Officer of the Crown, the prosecutor in every criminal case, whether it is one of the graver kinds of crime or one analogous to the street offences with which we are concerned. It is, therefore, " process " issued by or on behalf of the Procurator Fiscal that gives jurisdiction to the Police Courts in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Mr. Stevenson, the Chief Constable of Glasgow, gave us information as to the way in which this system actually works there. It is, of course, obvious that in a great city like Glasgow, which has nine Police Courts, it would be impossible for the Procurator Fiscal to himself attend to every one of the numerous cases of offences summarily triable which have to be dealt with. The Procurator Fiscal is appointed by the Corporation, and is in no sense a Police official. He is not under the control of the Chief Constable, and he has absolute power of taking up or rejecting any case. Each of the Superintendents of Police, and each of the Lieutenants of Police, is also appointed by the Corporation as an Assistant Procurator Fiscal. The Superintendent acts as Assistant Procurator Fiscal in his own Division, and the Lieutenant acts as Assistant Procurator Fiscal in charge of the Police Station or Office where charges are taken by virtue of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, Section 100, which enacts that:—

" The officer on duty (the Lieutenant) may deal with every person brought to the Police Office in custody of a constable as follows: If he has been in custody charged with having committed penal offence within the city, he shall cause him to be detained until he can be brought before the Magistrate; if he has been taken into custody either in pursuance of or without a warrant, in consequence of being accused or suspected of having committed any Police offence, or in consequence of his having failed to attend before the Magistrate when duly cited in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, the officer on duty shall inquire into the circumstances, and may either cause him to be detained until he can be brought before the Magistrate, or may accept bail or security that he shall appear before the Magistrate at some time or place to be then appointed, and at all times and places to which the case may be adjourned by the Magistrate, and liberate him; or if the officer on duty thinks that the charge is unfounded or is not supported by sufficiently strong evidence to justify his being detained in custody, he may liberate him." Q. 39838.

The effect is that the Lieutenant at the Police Station in Glasgow may, when a prisoner is brought in and charged with a Police offence, inquire into the case, and either cause him to be detained or take bail for him and liberate him, or, if he does not think the case is sufficiently strong, he may liberate him.

Though the proceedings present a remarkably close resemblance to the proceedings in a Police Station in the Metropolis before the officer in charge, there is this material difference, that in Glasgow the Lieutenant is acting in a double capacity, as an officer of Police and as the Deputy of the Procurator Fiscal. For acts done in the former capacity he is responsible to the Chief Constable, and for acts done in the latter capacity he is responsible to the Procurator Fiscal; and it is upon " process " issued by him in his latter capacity that the jurisdiction of the Police Court is founded.

Putting aside technicalities, the effect of the Scottish system, as compared with the London system, is: (1) That if complaint is made by a person alleging that he has been wrongfully arrested, he may complain to the Chief Constable in respect of the wrongful arrest by a constable, or of any ill-treatment by him, or he may complain to the Procurator Fiscal in regard to any error of judgment or misconduct on the part of the Lieutenant who takes the charge and thereupon prosecutes; and (2) The Procurator Fiscal, and not the arresting constable, is responsible for the conduct of the case in the Police Court.

It is very likely that in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred it does not matter to the person arrested for one of these street offences whether he is dealt with under the Scottish system or under the London system. The person arrested probably does not know, when the officer in charge of the Station in Glasgow is considering the charge preferred by the constable who has arrested him, whether he is addressing an officer of the Police or a Deputy of the Procurator Fiscal; but in the hundredth case it may conceivably make a good deal of difference. According to our system, from the moment a man is arrested down to the time that he is brought before a Magistrate, he is in the hands of the Police. According to the Scottish system, the Deputy of a public officer, who has no connection with the Police, deals with the case as soon as the prisoner is brought to the Police Station. There is, therefore, an earlier check upon the action of the Police.

We think it right to call attention to the system prevailing in Scotland in order that the authorities may consider whether it would be expedient, in view of the difficulties under which the Metropolitan Police labour, to create in the Metropolis an officer with rights and duties corresponding to those of the Procurator Fiscal. So many considerations of expense, and so many changes in Police administration and Police Court arrangements might be required in order to effect such an alteration, as to which we are not fully informed, that, even if we felt empowered to make a recommendation on the point, we should hesitate to do so without more prolonged inquiry.

Complaints to the Home Office and the Chief Commissioner.

§ 16. An important subject, to which our attention has been drawn by the evidence in some of the cases investigated, is the course pursued by the Police authorities when complaint is made of misbehaviour by a particular constable, by or on behalf of persons aggrieved thereby. Such complaints are made, in the first instance, either to the Secretary of State for Home Affairs or to the Chief Commissioner.

See p. 78. The complaints to the Secretary of State relating to the conduct of the Police as to the street offences with which we are concerned appear to have been very few in number during recent years, as appears from Mr. Troup's statement set out above.

The complaints received by the Home Office resolve themselves into cases of complaint:—(1) by persons who have been tried in the Police Courts; and (2) by persons who allege some misconduct or neglect of duty on the part of the Police in general, or by some specified members of the Force.

As to the first class of cases where the complaint is made by a person who alleges that he has been wrongly convicted by a Magistrate, it assumes the form of an appeal for the exercise of the Prerogative of Mercy, but the consideration of the exercise of that prerogative, in many instances, involves inquiry into the conduct of constables who arrested, or gave evidence against, the accused persons. As to the manner in which the Secretary of State has been in the habit of dealing with that class of cases it would not be proper for us to make any comment.

The practice pursued by the Home Office in regard to all cases has been where misconduct by the Police is alleged or suspected, and the matter is one of sufficient seriousness to justify it, to send on the papers to the Chief Commissioner for inquiry and report by him, and it is, of course, for the Secretary of State to determine whether the inquiry made by the Commissioner, who forwards his report to the Home Office, is or is not satisfactory.

It is difficult to see, having regard to the organisation of the Home Department, and to the fact that the Secretary of State has no power to take evidence on oath, or to appoint any person or persons to do so, what other step he could usually take than to forward the papers connected with the complaint to the Chief Commissioner who is responsible to him for the control and discipline of the Metropolitan Police Force, in order that he may inquire into the matter in the same manner as that in which he inquires into breaches of discipline, and so forth, alleged to have been committed by the officers and men under him. When a complaint is referred by the Home Office to him, the practice of the Chief Commissioner is to take the same steps as if the complaint had been made direct to him.

Complaints as to misconduct by members of the Force made directly to the Chief Commissioner may proceed either: (1) from superior officers or constables who are members of it; or (2) from private persons.

With regard to the first class, i.e., those arising within the Force, the regulation, as pointed out above, directs that they should be dealt with in the same way as complaints by private persons so far as the regulations are applicable thereto; and we desire to make no comment upon the methods adopted with regard to them, since discipline seems well maintained in the Force and the Regulations work satisfactorily.

The complaints from members of the public made direct to the Chief Commissioner are of varied kind. Many of them appear to be complaints made by persons who have observed what they deem to be improper conduct on the part of the Police in a particular neighbourhood, or of some named member of the Force on a particular occasion; others relate to some neglect in patrolling the street or place in which the complainant resides; and as to the substance of these complaints some refer to mere breaches of discipline, lack of courtesy, bad language, rough conduct, and the like, while others deal with more serious breaches of duty. The practice of the Chief Commissioner, and those who assist him at the Central Office as to acknowledging and receiving such complaints, appears to us to be, as a rule, satisfactory. But suggestions have been made to us that complaints by persons aggrieved, or thinking themselves aggrieved, by the action of members of the Force, are not inquired into so effectively as the public may reasonably expect.

The question of how such complaints ought to be dealt with is, in our opinion, one of great importance, because the maintenance of good relations between the Police and the rest of the community largely depends upon the existence among law-abiding persons of the confident belief that any grievances which they may have in connection with the behaviour and exercise of authority by members of the Police Force will be respectfully received, promptly and effectively inquired into, and, so far as possible, remedied.

We note with interest that very soon after the establishment of the Police Force in 1829 attention was drawn to the necessity of dealing promptly and effectually with complaints made by members of the public before the Select Committee of 1834, when the then Commissioners, Colonel Rowan and Mr. Mayne, were being examined. They stated the practice of their office as follows :—

"A letter is sent off, generally immediately, to say that the complaint will be inquired into; probably the same moment the complaint is made; the constant practice is to have that letter prepared immediately, and given into the hand of the person who makes the complaint to the Commissioners, stating 'that the complaint will be inquired into immediately,' in order that they should feel a satisfaction that the thing should be done, without waiting for the result which sometimes cannot be got at for several days, as the inquiry may occupy a good deal of time. After the complaint has been inquired into the result, in some shape or other, is always made known to the person who has made the complaint. . . . They are almost immediately heard; generally the arrangement is such that the parties coming in to complain are heard almost immediately; I should say, immediately. We always give precedence to them before the other business with our own people; and generally such an hour has been appointed that we see them the moment they come; they name the hour themselves, and as soon as they come we see them. It frequently happens that parties have refused to lay complaints before the Magistrates against the Police, and have preferred coming before the Commissioners; but I should wish to say it is our opinion, after the experience we have had, that it would be preferable to send complaints much more frequently to the Magistrates than to us; we conceive it to be less immediately our duty, and I think it would be more satisfactory to the public to have the cases heard before the Magistrates, who decide in public, and who would not be supposed to have any leaning in favour of the Police; at the same time, I really believe that we have decided more strictly against the Police than a Magistrate would have done, in some, at least, of the cases."

That evidence was given, and that method of dealing with complaints was the practice at a time when the establishment was very small as compared with the present numbers, and it would probably be quite impossible for the Chief Commissioner at the present time to give a personal interview at once to every complainant; but there seems no reason why someone—an Assistant-Commissioner or other member of the Central Staff—should not be appointed for the purpose of giving, whenever asked for, an immediate personal interview to anyone who wishes to make a representation against any member of the Force.

Major Tarry, the Chief Constable of Leeds, told us that it was his custom to deal with complaints personally, so far as possible, and that he found that his so doing had happy results in keeping up a pleasant relation between the Constabulary and the inhabitants of the city, and gave him the opportunity of giving explanations which satisfied the persons aggrieved and removed all feelings of soreness or discontent, whether due to some Police blunder or to over-sensitiveness on the part of persons complaining.

The methods applicable to a provincial city are not, of course, necessarily applicable to London, and no one acquainted with the work which has to be performed by the Chief Commissioner could expect him personally to attend to every complaint, but we feel sure that it would be a great advantage to all concerned if it were generally known in the Metropolis that anyone who wishes to complain about the Police may go to Scotland Yard with the assurance that he will be patiently listened to by a responsible and competent officer as a matter of right. In making that observation we must not be taken as expressing the opinion that complaints have not been recently, or are not now, courteously dealt with.

The Chief Commissioner receives communications not only from private persons, but also occasionally directly from the Magistrates, though, as a rule, any criticisms on the conduct of Police officers or constables concerned in a case which the Magistrate may have made, are conveyed to the Chief Commissioner by a report from the Inspector in attendance at the Court, whose duty it is to call attention to any misconduct on the part of a constable which he observes or any remarks made by the Magistrate.

White Book, p. 302. General Instructions, s. 16.

The testimony of the Magistrates was, except as to Mr. Cluer's evidence, unanimously to the effect that any representations made by them to the Chief Commissioner were treated in a courteous manner in New Scotland Yard, and that their relations with the Chief Commissioner were of the best character.

Q. 45040. Mr. Cluer, however, committed himself to the general statement that the relations between Magistrates and the Chief Commissioner were deplorable, and he gave two instances in justification of his statement. He also alleged that in cases of misconduct brought to his notice, the punishment inflicted by the Chief Commissioner was often inadequate.

Q. 45034. One of the two instances in which Mr. Cluer said he considered the Magistrate had reason to be dissatisfied with the reception of his communication by the Chief Commissioner occurred so far back as 1890, and referred to a case as to which the late Mr. Corser had written to the then Commissioner.

As this matter arose before Mr. Cluer was on the Bench, and many years before Sir Edward Henry became Chief Commissioner, we think it unnecessary to make any observations upon it.

The correspondence as to the other case took place in 1903, and arose in connection with a charge of assault which had been preferred by a constable against one Ahern and two others, in dismissing which Mr. Cluer stated that he disbelieved the evidence of the prosecutor and another constable altogether.

We should have preferred to pass over the matter in silence, but, having regard to the importance which Mr. Cluer appeared to attach to the matter, and that Sir Edward Henry, not without reason, considered the Magistrate's observations as a personal reflection, we feel bound to refer to it.

Q. 45036. Mr. Cluer, after referring to the earlier instance in 1890, and reading a letter to the late Mr. Corser from Assistant-Commissioner Bruce, in which the latter observed: "With all due deference he cannot recognise any right in a Magistrate to ask him to discuss the nature and extent of the proceedings which in connection with a request for inquiry have been taken," said:—

Q. 45040. "On the other hand, I myself have made a mistake. I remember one mistake in which I wrongly dismissed a charge of assault by the Police against a man, and, on the application of the man, I granted him a summons against the constable. I then had, to make it as fair as possible, to ask a colleague from another Court if he would mind taking the case so that the man might not be prejudiced, as I had already formed my opinion, but only as to a detail, I admit, on the evidence. My colleague took the case, and entirely acquitted the constable. Mr. Mead was good enough to try the case for me. Upon hearing that I wrote to the Commissioner myself, and said I hoped nothing would happen to this constable.
Q. 45041. He had already been transferred to another Division. I expressed my regret for my blunder in that matter. All I got was a printed communication saying: 'The Commissioner directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter.' That is the relation between Magistrates and the Commissioner, and it is a very deplorable one. It is a great pity that if we have cases, as I do, of Police who go wrong the Commissioner does not attend to them otherwise than by sending the men over to other Divisions. . . . I have had a number of cases in which I ought to have complained, but I gave it up. I do not go on writing letters to an official who merely takes no notice of them."

It seems only fair to Sir Edward Henry to state the personal explanation which he gave in answer to Mr. Cluer's remarks:—

Q. 52067. "I regret to have to make an explanation which may appear personal in character. Mr. Cluer, the learned Magistrate, has made statements which the Commission will no doubt expect me to meet. He has said that the relations between the Commissioner and the Magistrates are deplorable, and he has referred to individual cases brought before him, in which he alleges the Police were guilty of misconduct. With reference to the relations between the Commissioner and Magistrates, I am authorised to say that he is speaking on his own behalf exclusively, and that this is not the opinion of the other Magistrates, who consider the existing relations to be excellent. Apparently, he bases his opinion on certain incidents. The first was an incident which happened before I was Commissioner, or before my predecessor, even, had been appointed Commissioner, it happened seventeen years ago, five years before Mr. Cluer himself had been appointed magistrate. I presume the Commission will not desire me to discuss the facts minutely. I have looked at the papers and find that, in a case in which two persons were charged with pushing coping stones off a pillar in 1890, on the remand the evidence of the two constables, who were their accusers, was traversed by the statements of two other constables to the effect that it was not the defendants who had pushed the coping stones off, but the constables themselves, though they had not seen the act. The Magistrate, Mr. Haden Corser, discharged the defendants, and came very reasonably to the conclusion that two of the constables must have given false testimony, and he referred the matter to the Commissioner. The Commissioner apparently found it impossible to decide which pair of constables had been lying, and so he scattered the whole four, transferring them from where they were to other Divisions, so that there might be no opportunity of their acting either in collusion with each other or in hostility to each other. Mr. Haden Corser, hearing of this, wrote to the Commissioner, and pointed out that if a transfer was a punishment, it was rather hard that the innocent pair of constables should have been punished and he wanted an explanation of this. This explanation the Commissioner was not prepared to give, and so the matter ended, and as Mr. Haden Corser, unfortunately, is dead, and the Commissioner concerned is not present to speak for himself, it can be carried no further. The other incident is one which concerns myself. In a case heard by Mr. Cluer, on July 6th, 1903, in which Ahern and two others were defendants, Police Constables Robinson and Fern gave evidence in support of a charge of assault. Mr. Cluer heard the case, discharged the defendants, and commented on the testimony of these two constables, stating that he disbelieved their evidence altogether. Though inquiry showed that the constables had acted properly in the case, it became necessary to remove them from the Division, as it was felt that they would be completely useless for the performance of their duty there, owing to the opinion publicly expressed by the Magistrate. In consequence of his remarks, the defendant Ahern took out a summons for assault against Constable Robinson, being supported, I understand, in this by Mr. Timewell, who provided him with a solicitor and counsel. The case brought by Ahern against Police Constable Robinson was heard, at Mr. Cluer's request, by Mr. Mead, another Magistrate. Mr. Mead came to the conclusion that the accounts given by the complainant and his witnesses were so contradictory that no credence whatever could be attached to their statements, and he dismissed the summons. Mr. Cluer having read Mr. Mead's notes then wrote to me as Commissioner, saying that he hoped that nothing would happen to Constable Robinson, and he expressed his regret for his mistake in that matter. I may say I was not in this country when the letter was received, and in my absence Mr. Cluer received a formal acknowledgment, thanking him for having written. Mr. Cluer's comment upon it was as follows: 'This is the relation between Magistrates and the Commissioner, and it is a very deplorable one. It is a great pity that when we have cases, as I do, of Police who go wrong, the Commissioner does not attend to them otherwise than by sending the men to other Divisions.' I regret that Mr. Cluer did not receive a fuller reply, but had I received the letter in person, the acknowledgment I should have sent Mr. Cluer would probably not have seemed acceptable to him, because it appeared to me that in the matter of these two Constables, Mr. Cluer's action was wholly inadequate. In open Court he had imputed to them misconduct of the gravest character. When he discovered his mistake he was, in my opinion, bound to make the most complete reparation in his power. In consequence of his remarks they had their homes broken up, and were transferred under a cloud to other Divisions. The public might very well believe of them that they had given false testimony. It was a grievous slur upon their character, which could have been removed by Mr. Cluer if he had followed the course which was obviously indicated of expressing in open Court his regret that owing to a misapprehension of the facts, he had unwittingly done these two men a wrong, and unreservedly withdrawing his condemnation of them."

Upon the constables' action in this case of Ahern and others, seeing that Mr. Cluer admits he made a mistake, it is not necessary for us to express any opinion. As to the controversy which has arisen we have, on the one hand, only to observe that we do not see what Mr. Cluer could have been expected to do more than what he in fact did when he became satisfied that his remarks as to the evidence of the constables were unfounded, except, perhaps, to make a statement in open Court withdrawing the reflections which he had made on them. On the other hand, we think that the fact that owing to the absence of Sir Edward Henry, Mr. Cluer only received a mere acknowledgment of his letter affords no justification whatever for his general statement before us that the Chief Commissioner treats the communications of Magistrates improperly, or that their relations with him can be truly described as "deplorable." Q. 45040.

We have only to add as to this incident, that we cannot agree with Mr. Cluer's view that a Magistrate has any special right to complain of or to suggest the amount or character of the punishment which the Chief Commissioner may inflict in cases of misconduct brought to his notice by a Magistrate. That is a matter which is entirely within the discretion of the Chief Commissioner, and he is responsible to the Secretary of State for the manner in which he discharges his duty.

We regret that the relations between the Chief Commissioner and Mr. Cluer should be strained, and we trust that, after the very courteous and temperate explanation given by the former as to the brevity of the letter of which the latter complained, and of his general attitude towards Magisterial criticisms on the Police all misunderstanding between them will be removed.

While, however, we are satisfied that there is no reasonable ground for finding fault with the manner in which complaints against the Police, whether made by private persons or by Magistrates, are received and acknowledged at the Central Office, we do not think that the existing method of inquiry into complaints made against the Police by private persons is satisfactory.

The method at present pursued is to call for written reports from the officers or constables whose conduct is complained of, or who have been concerned in the affair out of which the complaint arises, and then, if deemed necessary by the Chief Commissioner, the holding of an inquiry by an Assistant-Commissioner or Superintendent of the Division, to which the constables concerned are attached, at which witnesses are examined orally, and the proceedings conducted in accordance with Regulations 56 to 60 which we have set out verbatim above. See p. 52. White Book p. 33. Q.Q. 4727 and 4735.

An instance illustrating this method of inquiry was afforded by that held before Chief Inspector Taylor as Acting Superintendent at the Brixton Police Station in consequence of the complaint made by Mr. Braham. That inquiry appears to us to have been conducted in accordance with the Regulations, and, assuming that the Regulations are satisfactory, no adverse criticism can be made upon the proceedings before Chief Inspector Taylor. Mr. Braham, in fact, made no complaint as to what took place there, though he expressed himself before us as dissatisfied with the terms of the letter of apology which he received from the Chief Commissioner after a decision had been arrived at upon the matter.

When such an inquiry as to the alleged misconduct of a constable takes place before a Superintendent, he has a discretion as to whether he should at once put the accused constable on the Defaulter's Sheet, and then report his opinion on the case to the Central Office, or abstain from putting the constable on the Defaulter's Sheet, and simply report the result of the inquiry to the Chief Commissioner in order that the matter may be dealt with by him. If the former course is taken, the result is that the constable is treated as an accused person, and suspended from duty at once. In either case, the final decision as to whether the constable is or is not guilty is left to the Chief Commissioner, as is also the character and amount of punishment inflicted in case the decision is adverse to the accused Constable.

The whole procedure, as laid down in the Regulations, and as disclosed in the proceedings in, for instance, the Braham case just referred to, appears to us to be unduly cumbrous and inelastic. There are probably sound reasons for the existence of this somewhat complicated machinery in regard to mere breaches of discipline by members of the Force, or in regard to disputes arising within the Service. As a method of deciding issues between private persons and members of the Force where there is conflict of evidence it strikes us as being unsatisfactory.

Consider, for instance, how the system worked when it was put in operation in regard to the complaint of Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette. There, indeed, the complaint was made to the Home Office, and the Chief Commissioner in calling for reports and instituting an inquiry by Assistant-Commissioner Wodehouse to some extent pursued the course which he would have taken if the complaint had been made direct to him, but he made no communication to the complainants and the Regulations as to complaints by private persons set out above were not complied with. The Secretary of State, however, did what the Chief Commissioner could not well do, viz., asked for information from the Magistrate, and, in deciding how to deal with the matter, had ultimately before him the statements of the two complainants, communications from Mr. Denman, who tried the case, and the report from the Chief Commissioner. We are not suggesting that the Chief Commissioner need, under the circumstances of that case, have done more than he did, since the complaint had not been made direct to him, and the Secretary of State was satisfied with his Report of the 24th April, 1906.

The treatment of Gamble's case, in which a firm of solicitors wrote making a definite charge against a constable, is of a different kind, because there the issue of criminal process was threatened; and the Home Office has laid down a general rule: "That when a complaint is made against a constable which amounts to a criminal charge, and when there is conflicting evidence on the subject, the Commissioner ought not to decide the matter, but it ought to be brought before a Magistrate, who can take evidence on oath;" and it was pointed out to us by Mr. Troup that in a case where that rule had been departed from (the case of Miss Cass in 1887) difficulties arose in consequence of taking an exceptional course. We think, therefore, that no obligation was placed on the Chief Commissioner to inquire into the charge against P.C. Ashford with a view to deciding whether he was guilty or not guilty, though we regret that the Inspector's suggestion for further investigation was not acted upon in the interests of the Force.

Q. 48180.

With regard to the practice of calling for written reports by constables, our inquiries into individual complaints have led us to the conclusion that the present system is open to considerable criticism. These reports are written and signed by the constables concerned and countersigned by a superior officer and then forwarded to New Scotland Yard. It is admitted that the preparation of these reports by constables possessing no high degree of education is not an easy task, and we have reason to think that these documents are often prepared by constables in consultation with other members of the Police who may be implicated in the case, and they are therefore not the independent and original productions that they are intended by the Regulations to be. We think this system should be abandoned in cases where a report is called for in consequence of the complaint of a private person, and that in lieu thereof there should be an Inquiry in the manner we are about to suggest.

In cases where the misconduct complained of amounts to misbehaviour for which there is no remedy at law, the only course that the aggrieved person can take is to appeal to the Home Office or to the Chief Commissioner, and in such a case we think it is plain that he ought to have the right to obtain full investigation of his complaint. We do not think that the mere fact that the complainant may take legal proceedings if he chooses should be a bar to his complaint being fully inquired into and its truth decided by a Police Inquiry. The remedy by civil action against one in the position of an ordinary constable is not effective, and the application for a summons in a Police Court entails expense, trouble, and delay from which people naturally shrink. It seems to us, seeing that the Police are invested with large powers which may cause great injury to private persons unless exercised properly and in good faith, that anyone who thinks himself aggrieved by an abuse of those powers ought to have the right without embarking on litigation in the Courts to have such alleged misuse of power fully inquired into by the Chief Commissioner or a competent officer acting on his behalf. If during the course of an Inquiry it appears that the alleged misconduct amounts to a criminal charge, and the evidence is conflicting, we think the Inquiry should be suspended and the facts reported to the Chief Commissioner, who should place them before the Director of Public Prosecutions. If no action is taken thereon by the Director of Public Prosecutions the Inquiry should be subsequently continued and completed.

With regard to the method of Police Inquiry into complaints by private persons we think :—

(1) That it should not be conducted by the Superintendent or other superior officer of the Division to which the accused member of the Force belongs or whose duties lie in the area in which the conduct complained of took place, but by an officer acting directly under the Chief Commissioner.

(2) The complainant should be invited to attend at New Scotland Yard or a convenient Police Station and to bring with him any witnesses, and the accused member of the Force should also be ordered to attend with his witnesses.

(3) The proceedings at the Inquiry should be conducted in accordance with the Regulations 56 to 60 with the alteration that the complainant and the accused respectively should have the right to cross-examine witnesses directly and not simply to put questions through the officer conducting the Inquiry.

(4) The officer conducting the Inquiry should make a Report on the case to the Chief Commissioner giving his decision on the complaint together with the evidence.

We recommend that an officer duly qualified by a knowledge of the law and experience in legal proceedings, acting under the direct superintendence of the Chief Commissioner, should be appointed for the purpose of dealing with complaints against the Police by private persons and conducting Inquiries into them in the way just suggested.

We have not attempted to do more than give the outline of a scheme for such Inquiries. We would only say generally that in our view the object to be aimed in the arrangements made should be to satisfy complainants and the general public that complaints are fully and fairly investigated.

We do not forget that the criminal classes have an interest in discrediting the Police and that to raise the cry of Police tyranny and oppression is an easy way of turning the tables, and while we think that alleged misuse of their powers should be fully inquired into, and, if proved, adequately punished, we recognise on the other hand it should be the effort of the authorities and of the community, whose servants they are, to protect the Police as much as possible in the execution of their onerous duties, which are such as to make them obnoxious to all kinds of false charges by the evilly disposed, and which continually bring them into danger from false witnesses.

The Suggestions of the Police and Public Vigilance Society.

§ 17. We have incidentally dealt with such of the twelve suggestions made to us on behalf of the Police and Public Vigilance Society as come within the category of recommendations which we feel ourselves entitled to consider under our Terms of Reference.

Q. 52656. As to the suggestion "That the Metropolitan Police Force should be placed under the control of the direct representatives of the electors in the Metropolis who would be more amenable to the wishes of the people than the Home Secretary," and consequential suggestions, we do not feel ourselves entitled to express any opinion at all, as their consideration involves matters of public policy in reference to which we took no evidence, and as to which we have no special information.

As to the suggestion for raising the age at which candidates should be admitted into the Force, and as to the diminution in the total number of the Force, for similar reasons we think we ought to abstain from making any recommendation.

The other suggestions appear to be matters for the consideration of Magistrates, rather than for ourselves or for the Chief Commissioner.

Concluding Remarks.

§ 18. In conclusion, we desire to add that:—

(1) We think the discipline of the Force is well maintained.

(2) The general arrangements for the maintenance of order and for the prevention of offences in the streets, and for the apprehension and punishment of offenders are excellent, and are carried out almost invariably in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

(3) The Metropolitan Police Force is entitled to the confidence of all classes of the community.

We desire to add an expression of our high appreciation of the ability, tact and vigilance of the present Chief Commissioner, to whom our thanks are due for attending before us whenever we have requested him to do so, always giving us the fullest information in his power, and permitting us access to all the documents in his office which could help us in our inquiry.

All which we humbly submit to Your Majesty's gracious consideration.

II.—REPORTS ON PARTICULAR CASES.

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

We here include our Reports upon the complaints made against particular Officers or Constables investigated by the Commission, which we may, for the sake of brevity, call special complaints. We have thought it better to report separately on each such complaint (treating a complaint made jointly as being one complaint).

In our Report on each complaint we have, as far as was reasonably possible, incorporated all the relevant documents and given a summary of the evidence at such length as seems necessary to make our observations and judgments intelligible.

In inquiring into each complaint, and arriving at our conclusions, we need hardly say that we have done it without any prepossession in favour of or against the members of the Force concerned. We have approached each complaint independently, and with such detachment of mind as might be expected if the cases had come before us as Judges in a Court of Law, though we have power neither to give redress to the complainant nor inflict punishment on the Constable whose conduct is impugned.

We have not, however, having regard to the character of our Inquiry, and the practice of Royal Commissions, deemed it proper to consider ourselves bound by the strict rules of evidence. At the same time, we have excluded so far as possible in the evidence, and entirely in coming to our conclusion, all topics of mere prejudice or matters too remote to be really useful in arriving at the truth about the issue.

The total number of special complaints into which we have inquired, and upon which we report, is nineteen. They all appear to us to be typical, and a study of the evidence in each complaint affords an illustration of the various kinds of difficulty that arise in the exercise of Police powers, of the problems which a Constable has continually to solve, and of the issues which the Magistrates have to try.

In all the cases, with two or three exceptions, there is some conflict of evidence, and in most the conflict is glaring.

The special complaints may be thus classified by reference to the character of the offences with which the complainant was charged, or which afforded, rightly or wrongly, a pretext for Police interference :—

(1) Cases of Drunkenness.

The complaint of :—

(1) Dr. Maurice Alfred Gerothwohl and Henri Lavalette.
(2) James Baker.
(3) George Mullins.
(4) James Riley.

(2) Disorder.

The complaint of :—

(1) Edward Wells.
(2) Ferdinand Altfuldisch.
(3) William Maurer.
(4) George Wilson.
(5) William Henry Andrews.
(6) Arthur Harding (alias Tresadern).
(7) Edward Emms and John Norrey.
(8) James Clinch.
(9) Alfred Francis Platt.
(10) A. Dubery.

(3) Solicitation.

The case of :—

(1) Madame Eva D'Angely.

The complaint of :—

(2) Mrs. X. (in Camera).
(3) Mr. Y. (in Camera).
(4) Mrs. Braham.
(5) George Gamble.

Note.—Lest the gentlemen who appeared before us should think that we treat them with discourtesy by referring to them by their surnames alone, we desire to explain that we have done so for the sake of brevity, except in the case of persons whose usual style affords an indication of their professional character.

The letters "P. C." before a witness's name means Police Constable.

I.

GEROTHWOHL AND LAVALETTE'S CASE.

The Secretary of State brought to our notice a complaint which had been made to him by Mr. Maurice A. Gerothwohl, D.Litt., a Fellow and Member of the Council of the Royal Society of Literature, Honours Lecturer at Trinity College, Dublin, etc., against two constables in the C Division, and against an inspector who had been in charge of the police station at Vine Street, W., on April 8th, 1906.

Dr. Gerothwohl's complaint was made in a letter dated April 12th, 1906, to the Secretary of State, which was in the following terms :—

"To the Right Honourable the Home Secretary .

SIR,—

I beg respectfully to submit that an inquiry be instituted into the conduct of the police at Vine Street Station in connection with the charge of 'drunkenness and disorder' brought by them against myself and a friend, Mr. Henri Lavalette, on Saturday night (April 7th), a charge dismissed by Mr. Denman at Marlborough Street Police Court on Wednesday, April 11th. My main reasons for demanding such an inquiry are the following :—

(I.) By virtue of the magistrate's acceptance of the defendants' story, which suggested that they (the defendants) had been arrested at the station door when on their way to tender their cards as witnesses on behalf of a third person, at that time unknown to them, I contend that Police-Constables 43 C.R. and 6 C.R., who, on Monday, 9th, at the aforesaid police-court, swore specifically, and with abundance of detail, to arresting us (the defendants) in Piccadilly, cannot escape the two-fold charge of perjury and conspiracy, and, having previously been dismissed the Police Force as a public danger, should be prosecuted on public as well as private grounds.

(II.) The evidence given by the defendants, and accepted by the magistrate, reveals brutal methods of treatment and procedure by the constables, indicating a grave state of affairs at the Vine Street Station, and denoting culpable negligence, not to say encouragement on the part of the Inspector.

Confident that you cannot fail to appreciate my reasons for suggesting that an inquiry be held, I shall be interested to learn whether it would facilitate the task of the Home Office in this connection if the matter be made the subject of queries in Parliament by Members on both sides of the House, or if the Home Office authorities would prefer to take immediate and independent action, in which case my friend, Mr. Henri Lavalette, and myself would be glad of an interview at the Home Office.

Meanwhile, and thanking you in anticipation for your careful consideration of this matter,

I beg to remain, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sd.) MAURICE A. GEROTHWOHL, D.Litt.

(Fellow and Member of Council of the Royal Society of Literature, Honours Lecturer at Trinity College, Dublin, etc.)

P. S.—I append extracts from the 'Daily Chronicle,' 'Daily Telegraph,' and a leader from to-day's 'Daily News.'"

Further correspondence took place between Dr. Gerothwohl and the Secretary of State, which it is unnecessary to set out here, but which will be found printed in the Appendix to the Evidence.

After the appointment of the Commission, Dr. Gerothwohl communicated with the Secretary of the Commission, and he was informed on our behalf that we would inquire into his complaint. In due course he and Mr. Lavalette (the person referred to in the letter of April 12, 1906), sent in statements containing the evidence which they proposed to give before us and upon which they based their charges of misconduct against the police.

Notice was given by us to the solicitor acting for the Metropolitan Police of our intention to investigate the case.

We heard the evidence of Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette, and of the witnesses they called, as well as that of the witnesses called by Counsel for the police, and also that of Mr. Timmings, whom we summoned of our own motion, on July 23rd, 25th, and the 30th, 1906, and Sir Edward Henry was further examined on certain points connected with the matter on the 16th October.

Material Facts as to Which There is no Dispute.

The material circumstances connected with this complaint as to which there is no dispute are as follows :—

At 12.15 a.m. on Sunday the 8th April, 1906, Maurice A. Gerothwohl, 8, Alma Terrace, W., Professor, British Subject, Henri Lavalette, 8, Alma Terrace, W., Journalist, Belgian Subject, and Charles Timmings, 6, Baker Street, Fulham, Groom, were charged at Vine Street Police Station with the offence of being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly, in the Parish of St. James'. They were so charged by P.C. Isaacson, 43 CR. The charge was taken by Inspector Berry, who was in charge of the police station on the evening of the 7th and up to 2 a.m. on the 8th. The three prisoners were detained and taken to the cells. Gerothwohl and Lavalette were released on bail at 2.40 a.m. and 2.35 a.m. respectively, and Timmings was released on bail at 12.10 p.m. on the 8th April.

On the 9th April the case was called on at Marlborough Street Police Court before Mr. Denman, and all three defendants appeared. Gerothwohl and Lavalette were represented by Counsel, but Timmings appeared in person. After hearing the evidence of the prosecutor, P.C. Isaacson, 43 CR, and of P.C. Wallington, 6 CR, the Magistrate remanded the case to the 11th April. On that day the parties appeared as before, and the Magistrate heard the evidence of Inspector Berry, P.C. Divers and Dr. Alexander Mitchell for the prosecution. Gerothwohl and Lavalette were called and gave evidence on their own behalf. Timmings, although he did not expressly plead guilty, on being asked what he had to say, made no answer, and he was not called as a witness on behalf of Gerothwohl and Lavalette. Mr. Sherrington also gave evidence for the defence.

Mr. Denman then stopped the case and dismissed the charge against Gerothwohl and Lavalette, but found Timmings guilty, and fined him 10s.

The following is a copy of the Charge Sheet :—

The Accounts of Gerothwohl and Lavalette.

The accounts given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette of the events which led to their being charged at Vine Street, and upon which the principal charges of misconduct are based, are substantially identical, and the complaint of Gerothwohl and that of Lavalette may be treated as practically one. They were assisted in the proceedings before us by a solicitor, but they preferred to conduct their own case, if we may be permitted to apply a technical phrase to the hearing of the complaint by us. Gerothwohl took the leading part and Lavalette acquiesced in his doing so.

Stripped of non-essential details the story told by these gentlemen of their experience on the evening of Saturday, the 7th, and in the early morning of Sunday, the 8th April, may be thus summarised:—Having dined together at the Monico Restaurant they afterwards proceeded to Soho, where on a Saturday night there takes place the Soho Market, which Gerothwohl described to Lavalette as "a most interesting cosmopolitan sight"; they went to observe the Market; and afterwards they listened for nearly three-quarters of an hour to the preaching of a temperance missioner, and then they proceeded towards Piccadilly. At about 10.45 in Regent Street they met Sherrington, who may be described as a friend of Lavalette's; Gerothwohl had met him once before, though Sherrington did not remember the fact. They went with Sherrington to the Trocadero Restaurant, where each of the three had a whisky. Sherrington left them at 11.30 p.m. They then walked "down Coventry Street to Leicester Square and about"; then they "went down Lower Regent Street, keeping in the middle of the road as the pavement was very rowdy." Gerothwohl noticed that "there were a great many people coming out of the theatres, who also were walking down in the same way to have a look at the sight of the students, who were rather rowdy, as is usual on that night." We give the account of what follows in Dr. Gerothwohl's own words, as in our opinion a good deal turns on some of the details of the story, and the precise conduct of the actors in the affair. "On coming back towards Piccadilly we came back on the pavement, and then proceeded down Piccadilly in order to take our bus home. That was about midnight. Just shortly before reaching St. James's Church, although people were very rowdy behind, there was no crowding just around us. There was a crowding a good many yards ahead, some young men in a ring, and between that crowd and ourselves there was a youth walking very quietly by the side of the kerb. At that moment a police constable, whom we found afterwards was 43 CR, pushed past us this way—(describing)—and pushed the young man forward, and then shoved him this way—(describing)—and the youth fell against a hansom cab which was standing there. Then he pulled him up and took him in charge and crossed the road with him. I then said to Mr. Lavalette: "This is really too bad, let us go and give our cards to the inspector." I said that, or its equivalent, to him in French. We together crossed the road a good way behind them, and we noticed at the corner of Swallow Street and Piccadilly another constable, who was coming from the Sackville Street direction, take hold of young Timmings on the other side. There was Police Constable No. 43 C, there was Timmings, and there was the other constable, and they all went up Swallow Street. We followed, gradually gaining on them, and towards the middle of Swallow Street we were nearly abreast, when Mr. Lavalette stooped forward to look at No. 43, who was on the extreme left, to take his number. We then turned the corner of Swallow Street and Vine Street, and just as we were turning I glanced like that—(describing)—and I saw a unit in blue—of course it was a policeman in his blue uniform. I did not stop to look at him, but I saw there was a policeman standing there. Then we proceeded behind them very closely towards Vine Street Police Station. Just before we reached the station I noticed there were two policemen standing on each side of the entrance. There was No. 43, there was Timmings, and the police constable, who turned out to be No. 427 C, well in front, we following. Just as I put my foot on the first or second step I was seized behind, shoved forward up the steps, and on the staircase Police Constable 43 let go of Timmings, turned round, and facing me this way he seized me, twisted me round, and flung me on to another constable. That constable flung me back. I was again seized by No. 43, and twisted into the dock. As I was twisted into the dock I saw Mr. Lavalette following, spinning round from one policeman to another. It reminded me rather of a game of skittles with human pins, in which, I am afraid the ball suffered more than the nine pins. Timmings was already in the dock when I came. I immediately protested."

Lavalette's account is substantially to the same effect.

The Police Account.

The account of the arrests given by the police constables, which differs in every material respect from that of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, shortly put is as follows: P.C. Isaacson, 43 CR, and P.C. Wallington, 6 CR, were on patrol duty at midnight on the evening of April 7th from the Circus to Air Street on the south side of Piccadilly. They heard a great noise in Piccadilly and saw a crowd proceeding down Piccadilly westward, and P.C. Isaacson with P.C. Wallington went into that street and found a great number of people and a number of persons arm in arm leading the crowd. He spoke to them and cautioned them to conduct themselves in a gentlemanly manner. They took no notice of him, but passed on. He got in front of them again at St. James's Church and spoke to them again. P.C. Wallington was still with him. At the church he noticed Gerothwohl, Lavalette, Timmings and two others arm in arm; there were certainly five people arm in arm, and they were compelling people going east to get off the pavement. He said to Timmings "Why don't you be quiet and behave yourself." He took no notice, and P.C. Isaacson then arrested him and he handed him to P.C. Divers, who came up at that moment, telling that constable to take the prisoner to Vine Street. Divers started with Timmings. Isaacson then immediately arrested Lavalette, and at the same time P.C. Wallington arrested Gerothwohl. This was on the pavement on the south side of the street about a yard from where Timmings was arrested. P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington with their respective prisoners were delayed a little by traffic, but crossed the road after a slight pause and walked into Swallow Street. When P.C. Isaacson with Lavalette arrived in that street, which is quite short, he saw P.C. Divers just turning into Vine Street. P.C. Isaacson with Lavalette, followed by P.C. Wallington with Gerothwohl, proceeded to Vine Street Station without incident, and they placed their prisoners in the dock. Their prisoners went quietly. P.C. Isaacson charged Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings jointly with being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly, and the charge was taken in that form.

Specification of the Charges made Against the Police.

Such are in their main features the two accounts given before us of the series of events which led up to Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings being charged at Vine Street. The main charge against the constables by Gerothwohl and Lavalette is in regard to their alleged assault and false imprisonment under the circumstances described above, but it will be observed from Gerothwohl's letter to the Secretary of State that he makes further charges not necessarily involved in or consequent upon the original arrest. Gerothwohl's complaint is not only against P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington and P.C. Wellbelove, who, if his account be true, were actually concerned in setting upon and arresting him and Lavalette at the entrance to Vine Street, but also against P.C. Divers and Inspector Berry. Gerothwohl complains that what took place at Vine Street revealed "brutal methods of treatment and procedure denoting culpable negligence, not to say encouragement on the part of the inspector, namely, Inspector Berry."

It seems necessary for our purpose that we should endeavour to specify, more particularly than is done in Gerothwohl's letters, the acts of misconduct charged against each of the police officers concerned in this affair. When the whole of the evidence of Gerothwohl and Lavalette is considered and analysed, the charges which they make against the police may be divided into acts of misconduct committed before the prisoners were in the charge room and acts committed after they arrived there.

(1) The acts of misconduct alleged to have been committed before the prisoners were in the charge room are :—

(a) P.C. Isaacson so violently assaulted Timmings while he was walking quietly in Piccadilly that he fell against the wheel of a cab, and then arrested him without adequate cause.

(b) P.C. Wallington and P.C. Isaacson, aided by P.C. Wellbelove and other constables whose names are unknown, arrested Gerothwohl and Lavalette near or on the steps at the entrance to Vine Street Station without justification and with great violence.

(2) The acts of misconduct alleged to have been committed after Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings were placed in the dock are :—

(a) P.C. Isaacson falsely charged Gerothwohl and Lavalette with being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly, and falsely stated that they were arrested in Piccadilly.

(b) That Inspector Berry was reckless and negligent in that (1) he did not maintain order in the charge room, (2) that he concluded that Gerothwohl and Lavalette where drunk, whereas in fact they were quite sober ; (3) that he omitted to send for the Divisional Surgeon, although he knew or might have known if he had attended to what the prisoners were saying with reasonable care that they denied the charge ; (4) that he omitted to attach the importance reasonably due to the allegations made by Gerothwohl and Lavalette that they had been arrested while coming to the station on Timmings' behalf ; and (5) that he aided and abetted the constables then in the charge room in disorderly behaviour.

(c) That P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, P.C. Divers and other constables unidentified behaved in a noisy and disorderly way in the charge room, and in particular that P.C. Isaacson seized a stick which Gerothwohl held in his hand and broke it across his knee.

(d) That P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington committed wilful and corrupt perjury on the hearing of the charge at the Police Court.

General Observations.

We have summarised above in their main features the two accounts given before us of the series of events which led up to Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings, being charged at Vine Street.

Now the first reflection that occurs to us is that the two stories differ so widely that both cannot be wholly or substantially true. They are not simply discrepant, but as to all important points contradictory and cannot be reconciled. Both stories, are, however, coherent and possible. Either may be true, but we cannot accept one as true without rejecting in all important respects the other. It is, however, important for us all along to bear in mind that both accounts may be false in material particulars.

Great, however, as is the diversity of these accounts, and acute as is the conflict of testimony, there is nothing very unusual about the issues to those who have experience in criminal courts. Such glaring contrasts between the case for the prosecution and that for the defence are of frequent occurrence, but fortunately for the judge they have to be decided for the most part by a jury, which gives no reason for its finding, and which acts or ought to act in accordance with the principle that the prosecution must prove the case beyond all reasonable doubt. We do not, however, think that we can discharge our duty by simply saying that we find for Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette, or for the police constables. To take that course would deprive our inquiry of much of its value, and it would do little or nothing to assist the Commissioner of Police in the discharge of his duty, or to satisfy the public, who are naturally concerned in the question whether the constables exercise the important powers with which they are invested by law honestly and efficiently.

Seeing that this is the first case upon which we report, we think it well to make some general observations as to the principle and the method according to which the Commission ought to determine disputed matters of fact. In this case we have such acute differences between the parties that the decision involves a special degree of responsibility in coming to a conclusion. Our position is one of unusual difficulty as compared with that of an ordinary court of justice. We have, it is true, all the powers, or substantially all the powers, of the High Court or of the Central Criminal Court, but the issues that come before them do so in accordance with a prescribed procedure, and the manner in which judges and juries ought to arrive at verdict and judgment is well settled. In regard to every issue of fact upon which the final verdict and the consequent judgment must be found and entered the law casts upon the one party or the other to the litigation the burden of proof, and accordingly in regard to those issues it is quite proper and legitimate for the tribunal after listening to the witnesses, considering the documentary evidence, and weighing the reasons for and against the acceptance of either version, if it cannot with certainty or with any confidence decide upon the evidence, to find against that party upon whom the law has cast the burden of proof. Courts of justice exist for the purpose of giving redress to some person who demands it against another person, or for the purpose of punishing men accused of having committed crime. It is accordingly only fair to throw upon the person demanding redress or on those who on the part of the Crown demand that a defendant should be punished the duty of satisfying the Court as to the truth of all the material allegations upon which the validity of the claim for redress or for punishment, as the case may be, by law depends. We are not sitting as a court of justice, and we have no power to give redress to anyone who complains before us of misconduct on the part of police officers, nor have we any power to inflict punishment upon police officers who in our opinion have failed to discharge their duty. We are appointed to inquire and report upon the manner in which the members of the Metropolitan Police Force discharge their duties in regard to the three classes of cases mentioned in our terms of reference. We sit as persons appointed to make a general inquiry, and our inquiry into any cases of misconduct on the part of individual officers is only undertaken as part of that general inquiry, and with a view to enable us to give an answer to the general question implied in the terms of our Commission. We have no right to throw any special duty upon Gerothwohl and Lavalette. Seeing that they had made a complaint, it was their duty no doubt, as honourable men, to attend to support it, on pain of being condemned by public opinion, if they did not, but it was equally the duty of the constables, whether Gerothwohl and Lavalette came forward or not, to come before us and to acquit themselves if they could of the very grievous charges made against them. Our primary duty is not one owed to the parties who come before us in each case and cannot be discharged by the simple application of rules as to the burden of proof. Our function is, therefore, one that can only be properly fulfilled by making the most thorough search into the facts bearing on the conduct of the police in each case which is reasonably possible, and then deciding whether any and what kind of misconduct is proved against any of the police concerned.

Our duty then being to endeavour, without regard to the interests of anyone who comes before us, to arrive as to each matter which we investigate at the very truth of the affair it seems to follow that we ought not to consider ourselves bound by the rules of evidence acted upon habitually in our courts of justice. Those rules, the result of long experience, and now brought into a form stripped of all unnecessary technicality, are admirably adapted for their purpose and are in practice so convenient and so helpful in arriving at a just decision that they ought naturally to be those to which we ought as a rule to conform; but we see no reason why we should, having regard to the character of our task, feel ourselves rigidly bound by them in our inquiry. We are not aware that any Royal Commission to inquire and report has affected to follow them without exception, and in dealing with the various particular cases which have come before us, we have thought it right to take a good deal of oral evidence from the witnesses which would not have been admissible at the trial of a criminal case and have also allowed ourselves a greater latitude as to the documentary evidence than would be correct if we were trying the constables whose conduct was impugned in court. Thus we have in each case thought it fair to take note of the facts connected with the career of every constable upon whose veracity doubt had been thrown, or suggested itself to us by looking at what is called his "Defaulter's Sheet." We have not hesitated to make use of the reports and communications between officers of the Force which came into being in the ordinary course of police administration and action. So again in this case we have inquired into incidents which took place at Vine Street Police Station on the night in question, not immediately or directly connected with the Gerothwohl affair; so again we have derived some help from the evidence of two expert witnesses, Dr. Dent and Dr. Nelson Hardy, who were not called, to use a technical term, by Gerothwohl and Lavalette: so also we have taken into account knowledge of police methods and incidents connected with the action of the police in regard to summary arrest derived from the evidence which we have taken in regard to complaints made by other persons. In short we have treated this complaint of Gerothwohl's not as an isolated case, but as one among a good many others relevant to the inquiry.

Our decisions on the principal issues in this case depends almost entirely on oral testimony. In many disputes which come before our courts where there is a great conflict of evidence the judge is assisted by having before him letters or documents which directly relate to and which came into existence during the period in which the disputed events occurred, and which being in themselves indisputable affords solid ground from which to reason as to and criticise contradictory statements. But that is not the case here. We have before us the letter of Gerothwohl to the Secretary of State written almost immediately after the trial at Marlborough Street, but it carries conviction no further. We have, too, the written reports of the constables, which are useful as a check on the evidence given before us, as was shown in cross-examination, and also the charge-sheets and official records kept at Vine Street Station. Still in the main our judgment must turn upon the view we take of the oral testimony given by the witnesses. Our task is, therefore, one of no ordinary difficulty.

Seeing that the matter primarily turns on the credibility of two sets of witnesses, one naturally asks what characters they bear respectively. Common experience leads us to believe that men who in their several callings and in the society in which they move behave with such reasonable correctness as to earn the esteem of their associates are more likely to tell the truth even about matters in which their interests are at stake than those whose conduct justly earns the censure of those who know them. We have known cases in which everyone would have agreed that a particular version of a transaction ought not to be trusted, simply because of the obvious and proved bad character of all or of the majority of the witnesses upon whose testimony it was advanced. The test of character is one consideration which may fairly be taken into account in deciding cases of this kind. Here, however, the test of character does not seem to help us at all. All the witnesses who came before us as to this complaint may, we think, be described as of good character. Their positions in life vary very considerably, of course, but we are certainly not prepared to say that a professor is necessarily a man of better character than a policeman. Of Lavalette we know nothing except what is entirely in his favour. Gerothwohl occupies positions of trust for which none but a man adjudged to be of high character could possibly be selected. But a precisely similar statement must be made of P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, and Inspector Berry. P.C. Isaacson had been over nineteen years in the Force, and his record is excellent. Save for one offence committed many years ago, and long since forgotten by his superiors, he has been guilty of nothing but breaches of discipline which from the point of view of character are of trivial concern, while he has on many occasions been commended for meritorious acts of bravery. Nor can anything be urged against the character of any of the other police witnesses except P.C. Wellbelove, who has recently been punished for misconduct. In our opinion, therefore, we cannot solve the problem raised by this case by reference to the character of the witnesses, and say we believe the one side because the witnesses on the other side are men of bad character.

There are two things which are worthy of notice in comparing the witnesses on the one side and on the other, and which require some comment. First of all Gerothwohl and Lavalette are men of superior education, Gerothwohl especially being skilled in the use of language. The constables on the other hand are men of obviously inferior education to that of these gentlemen. We cannot allow the superior education of Gerothwohl and Lavalette to weigh in this case in the scales to their advantage. From our experience, though men who have received a University or professional education are more accurate, more careful in the choice of words, and less prone to exaggeration, than men of little or no learning and culture, yet we cannot say that they are more honest; at most we can only allow that an educated observer is more likely to give a verbally accurate, clear and coherent account of what he has seen or heard than an ignorant man trying to give his recollection of the same thing on the assumption, of course, that both are obviously trying to give true evidence. We cannot accept education as a surer guarantee of truth than ignorance in the recollection or description of matters where self interest is concerned. It is often more difficult to find out the falsity in the case of an educated witness than in the case of an unlettered one. To our minds therefore the different degrees of education of Gerothwohl and Lavalette on the one hand and of the constables on the other hand do not seem to afford us much help. Secondly, all the witnesses on the Police side, except Dr. Mitchell, are members of the Force, and he himself has such a connection with the Force as is involved in his being a Divisional Surgeon. Practically, therefore, the issue is between what we may call the civilian witnesses on the one side and the police witnesses on the other. This is also the case in regard to a good many of the other matters before us. In fact the question what is the value and credibility of police evidence assumes for us a very great significance. Everyone knows that attacks are often made upon police evidence just as attacks are made upon "expert" evidence. There are not wanting those who have a rooted disbelief in the credibility of policemen when they are in the box, and who believe that in nine cases out of ten a constable does not hesitate to tell a lie, to distort facts, or to exaggerate an incident in order to procure a conviction in a case in which he himself is the prosecutor, or to help a comrade. In our opinion such judgments upon the police as witnesses are quite unsound. We do not think it is possible to make any generalisation upon the subject without doing possible wrong to a very useful class of the community. Speaking as the result of our own observation we should say that there is no more ground for attributing habitual perjury to policemen than to any other class. The truth is, it is impossible to lay down any general rule. To disbelieve or to suspect a witness simply because he is a policeman, strikes us as an eminently dangerous course if one wishes to arrive at the truth of a disputed affair. The better course is to treat a policeman's evidence exactly as the evidence of other men is treated, its value being considered, tested, and criticised separately in each case.

Next, we ought to remember, in considering the claims of witnesses to be credible, the kind and the extent of the interest they have in the result of our deliberation on the case. Without being obnoxious to the charge of taking an unduly cynical or pessimistic view of human nature one may confidently say that experience of life leads one to the belief that real or supposed self-interest is the strongest amongst the factors that determine the actions of ordinary men with regard to all matters not directly connected with domestic or sexual relations, or perhaps religious belief. Bearing this in mind everyone who has to decide issues depending on oral testimony ought to ask himself what is the interest of each witness in the result of the case. One can hardly help feeling that the man who has no pecuniary or other selfish interest in the result is more likely prima facie to give an honest account of something he has seen or heard than one who has; and although we do not for a moment deny that there may be men who speak the truth, without regard to the consequences to themselves or others, yet we are bound to say it is a very safe and proper rule in deciding upon different versions of a transaction to attach much greater importance to the evidence of disinterested than to that of interested witnesses.

These considerations give us some, though not very much, help with regard to the case in question. We are fortunate, for instance, in having the testimony of Sherrington and of the medical men, all of whom may be fairly described as disinterested witnesses, but the principal witnesses cannot be so described. To P.C.

Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, P.C. Divers, P.C. Wellbelove, and even to Inspector Berry, our decision is a matter of much moment. It is not too much to say that although we have no direct authority over them their future prospects and career depend largely on, or may be gravely affected by, the views we express as to their conduct. The interest of Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings is not of the same kind. The interest of Timmings is so slight that we are inclined to class him as an independent witness. The interest, however, of Gerothwohl and Lavalette is obviously very considerable. Under the circumstances they cannot claim to be simply members of the public coming before us wholly in the public interest and actuated only by a desire to secure the efficient and correct conduct of the London Police. It is true that Gerothwohl suggests that P.C. Wallington and P.C. Isaacson should be dismissed as a public danger, and that they should be prosecuted on public as well as private grounds. But consider the circumstances. As the sequel of an evening passed in a somewhat aimless, though in no sense an improper wandering in the most crowded West End streets on a Boat Race night, Gerothwohl and Lavalette found themselves charged at a Police Court with being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly. The charge was, it is true, dismissed, but Gerothwohl is in our opinion in error in treating the decision of Mr. Denman as an acceptance of the defendants' story, and in referring to it as "a complete acquittal" in his letter to Sir Mackenzie Chalmers of the 14th April, 1906. Gerothwohl and Lavalette could if they chose have brought a civil action or could have instituted criminal proceedings against those who had wronged them. We do not think their failure to take either course is a circumstance which tells against them, but the mere fact that they appealed to the Home Office, and, after the appointment of this Commission, came before us with a view to exposing what Gerothwohl calls in his letter to the Secretary of State of the 22nd April, 1906, "a grave public scandal," does not entitle them to be deemed independent or impartial witnesses. Although their interest in the outcome of our investigation is not so vital as that of the constables, still they must be regarded as being interested witnesses.

The result of these observations is to convince us that this is not one of those cases in which we can safely arrive at a decision per saltum, as it were. We can discover no general or broad reason for accepting the account given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette in preference to the account given by the police witnesses. The surest method, therefore, by which we can arrive at the truth, if it be possible to do so with any certainty, is to bear clearly in mind the acts of misconduct alleged to have been committed by each constable which we have set out with particularity above, and next to pick out and keep distinct in our minds the relevant facts which are either admitted or not disputed or proved beyond doubt, and then to select and discuss separately the principal issues raised. Now the principal admitted facts have been set out above, or appear from a comparison of the story told by Gerothwohl and Lavalette with the police account. If that comparison be made, it will be seen that practically there is no contradiction of the evidence given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette as to what happened down to the time at which Sherrington left them. So also there is no serious conflict of testimony as to what took place after they had been taken from the charge room and placed in the cells. The dispute that arises is as to what took place during a few minutes between midnight and a quarter-past midnight when the prisoners were undoubtedly in the dock, and as to whether they were or were not then drunk or under the influence of drink. But it is worthy of notice that from a comparison of the two accounts it may be inferred: (1) That all the constables concerned were perfectly sober. There is no suggestion that any one of them was in the slightest degree the worse for liquor. (2) P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington were duly on patrol duty, and in proceeding to Piccadilly they were acting in strict accord with their duty. (3) There was in Piccadilly a large crowd of persons, and there was a great deal of disorder there at or shortly after midnight. (4) There is no suggestion that before the arrest of Timmings these constables had been in conflict with or badly treated by anyone, or that anything had happened likely to lead the two constables to lose their tempers. (5) Neither P.C. Isaacson nor P.C. Wallington had ever met Gerothwohl, Lavalette or Timmings before, and Gerothwohl and Lavalette had never seen Timmings before. (6) Before the arrest of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, whether it took place in Piccadilly or in Vine Street, there was no conversation between them and the two constables except that, if the constables speak truly, P.C. Isaacson loudly cautioned Gerothwohl, Lavalette, Timmings and others in Piccadilly twice. (7) No one at the time of Timmings' arrest remonstrated with P.C Isaacson either on his making the arrest or on the manner in which it was effected. (8) There was no attempted rescue of Timmings, and no interference either by Gerothwohl and Lavalette or any other person in the crowd with P.C. Isaacson in the execution of his duty or supposed duty.

The Two Principal Questions.

When one comes carefully to compare and consider the cases presented to us by Gerothwohl and Lavalette on the one hand and the police on the other, especially if we read over the evidence in extenso, we find that there is a considerable number of points upon which the testimony is contradictory or in some respects conflicting, or as to which discrepancies are disclosed; but two main questions emerge as being of a fundamental character: the first is the question, Were Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings drunk, or if not drunk markedly under the influence of drink at about midnight on the Boat Race night? The second is, Were Gerothwohl and Lavalette arrested in Piccadilly, or just outside, or at the entrance to Vine Street Police Station? The latter is in our view the crucial question in the case, because, whether Gerothwohl and Lavalette were drunk or sober, if they were arrested with the violence and at the place described by them, the police officers concerned were guilty of misconduct of a very grave kind. The gist of the misconduct alleged is from our point of view the abuse of authority involved, and the unnecessary force employed in arrests made in the way described by the complainants. The offence of perjury which is also alleged against the constables, although in general a much more serious one than assault not causing actual wounding or maiming, or made with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, is here, if indeed it has been committed, a subordinate and consequential crime to which the guilty parties were forced almost as a matter of course for their own protection. The primary offence alleged against these policemen strikes us as one of the utmost seriousness. It is, indeed, not easy, putting aside some imaginary cases of continued fraudulent blackmailing done in the capacity of a police officer, to conceive more dangerous conduct on the part of a constable than that which is alleged against P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, and P.C. Wellbelove in this case. Especially charged and sworn to keep the peace, clothed with authority and invested by law with special powers of arrest they, if the charge made be true, assaulted and deliberately arrested two men, who whether drunk or sober were about to enter the police station quietly, and having done so falsely charged them with being drunk and disorderly in another place, and falsely stated that they had arrested them at that other place. But although the question of the place and manner of arrest is the principal issue that we have to decide, the question as to the condition of Gerothwohl and Lavalette is also of great importance, because the value to be attached to their evidence and the probability of their version of the whole affair and of its details being true are obviously to a considerable extent dependent upon their sobriety at the time.

We think that the soundest method by which we can arrive at a decision of the case with as much certainty as is reasonably possible is first to consider whether at about midnight on April 7th the three prisoners were drunk or sober, and then having, if possible, come to a conclusion upon that question to pass on to discuss the question of the place of arrest; and although the answers to these two questions will not conclude the whole matter, yet if we can arrive at something like clear and certain answers to them, such light will be thrown upon the whole transaction as to make the remainder of our task comparatively easy.

The Condition of Gerothwohl, Lavalette, and Timmings at about Midnight.

In discussing the question of the condition of each of the three prisoners as to sobriety it is expedient to separate the case as to Gerothwohl and Lavalette from that as to Timmings; and we will first discuss the evidence as to the condition of Gerothwohl and Lavalette.

In the proceedings before us Gerothwohl and Lavalette naturally, as complainants of misconduct on the part of the police, gave their evidence first, but in dealing with the matter it seems better to state and to criticise the police evidence in support of the view that these gentlemen were drunk as alleged, and it seems well also to separate the consideration of the direct testimony of ordinary witnesses from that of medical gentlemen who have given us their evidence and opinion.

Now, taking that course we have to take into account on the police side the evidence of P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, P.C. Divers and Inspector Berry. P.C.

Isaacson, who was the first witness called on the police side, gave an account of his movements and of what took place in St. James's Street to the effect summarised above; and we confine our attention for the moment simply to those portions of his evidence which directly bear upon the question of drunkenness. After saying how he came with P.C. Wallington to St. James's Church, he said:—"I saw a man Q. 1094 named Timmings, Gerothwohl, Lavalette and two others. There may have been a third, but I am not certain as to a third one. There were five people walking arm in arm, causing people to go off the footway going east. After speaking to Timmings, and when he refused I arrested him. He was drunk." Dr. Gerothwohl who was cross-examining the witness on a report of what had been deposed to at the Police Court, said:—"At the Court you said 'Decidedly drunk.'" Q. 1171
And P.C. Isaacson answered "You were all three drunk." Dr. Gerothwohl continued—"Will you kindly tell us how you distinguish between people who are drunk and people when they are not particularly drunk." P.C. Isaacson answered—"There is one stage of drunkenness when a man is entirely incapable of taking care of himself and he loses the use of his legs. Another stage of drunkenness is when a man is Q. 1172 very drunk in his head and he gets it over like that (illustrating), but he can walk without assistance. There is a third stage of drunkenness when a man gets Q. 1173 more than he should take, which makes him become quarrelsome, and wishes to kick Q. 1174 up a row with everyone he meets, and that is the stage you were in. (Q.) How do Q. 1175 you know it was the third stage? (A.) There are several stages. By your appear Q. 1176 ance, by your manner, your speech, your eyes, and how you walked. (Q.) Did I speak to you? (A.) When in the station you did. (Q.) But before that I mean? (A.) I spoke to you. (Q.) We said nothing? (A.) No, you did not speak a bit. (Q.) Then how could you tell by my speech? (A.) By your appearance, by your Q. 1177 general behaviour, and by your general conduct in the street. A gentleman dressed as you were, in his sober senses would not behave in the manner in which you did." Later on when being asked when he formed the opinion that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were drunk, he said:—"When I saw them behaving in that manner, Q. 1211 after I had cautioned them a second time. (Q.) There was not much time? (A.) I Q. 1212 thought they were the worse for drink. I do not say they were rolling drunk or beastly drunk." In answer to a further question he said he thought they were the worse for drink. "From the appearance of their eyes, and from the appearance Q. 1213 of their faces—the colour of their faces—and the way in which they were acting. (Q.) Do you say their faces were coloured? (A.) Their faces were red and Q. 1214 flushed." (Q). "You would expect that they would have been drinking a good deal Q. 1216 before their faces became flushed, would you not? (A.) They were all sufficiently drunk and under the influence of drink to make them quarrelsome, and when men are in the state of drunkenness that they were in they are inclined to be quarrelsome." "That was my opinion at the time I arrested them—that they were Q. 1217 drunk." Being more categorically asked whether they were "Not under the influence Q. 1219 of drink, but drunk?" he answered, "Drunk. There is no doubt whatever in my mind about it." There is more in the evidence to the same effect.

Now the comment that one naturally makes upon this evidence is that it does not pretend to be founded upon any minute physical symptom except the alleged fact that their faces were flushed, which it is quite possible an observer, even under the circumstances which P.C. Isaacson described, might notice. Putting aside that one indication there was nothing upon which P.C. Isaacson could base his opinion that they were drunk except their behaviour—that they were walking arm in arm with three other people, behaving in a noisy and disorderly manner in the streets and without regard to the caution which he, as constable, had given to them. If P.C. Isaacson is speaking the truth, and if in fact Gerothwohl and Lavalette did so far forget themselves as to indulge in the kind of conduct alleged, no one would, we think, blame P.C. Isaacson for coming to the conclusion that they were not sober. It does not, however, follow, as a matter of course, that in fact they were drunk. If this disorderly conduct were admitted we should be inclined to attribute very considerable weight to the judgment of an experienced constable like P.C. Isaacson. Here, however, the very facts upon which he himself admits that he formed an opinion as to the condition of the prisoners are in dispute, and without accepting his version of what took place his evidence carries us no further in our attempt to solve the problem of the condition of these persons.

P.C. Wallington gave evidence to the same effect, and his evidence is open to precisely the same criticism

The evidence of P.C. Divers upon this point is, however, entitled to some weight. He did not pretend to have seen anything of the five men in a row "booing," and so forth, or any of the circumstances related by the other constables as having taken place before the arrest of Timmings, and, indeed, he seems not to have seen or, at any rate, noticed Gerothwohl and Lavalette until they came into the charge room after he had placed his own prisoner Timmings in the dock. His evidence on the question of drunkenness is founded solely on what he saw and heard in the charge room. After referring to the condition of Timmings whom he had brought along, with
Q. 1961 which we will deal, and after expressing the opinion that Timmings was drunk, he was asked: "With regard to Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette, when they got there they
Q. 1962 certainly were not, according to you, in the same condition as Timmings? (A.) No. (Q.) There was a very noticeable difference, was there? (A.) I should not have known they were drunk only from the excited condition they were in." Later on, in answer to
Q. 1965 another question, he said: "I thought they were drunk because they were in such an excited state." Then being asked whether he thought a man might be in a very
Q. 1967 excited state and yet not be drunk, he replied, "Yes, quite right." Now whatever view may be ultimately taken as to the credibility on other points of P.C. Divers, we cannot but think that he is speaking quite fairly on this question. It is perfectly clear that the only data upon which he formed an opinion as to the condition of Gerothwohl and Lavalette were their actions and appearance in the dock. We believe that P.C. Divers honestly thought that they were not sober, but it seems to us that his opinion, though natural enough, is not of any great value to us in a case where the excitement upon which it was based may be possibly explained by the arrest of the complainants and the unpleasant position in which they were placed.

We come now to the evidence of Inspector Berry, who was in charge of the station on the night in question, and here if we can trust the witness we come to a matter which is distinctly helpful. Prima facie there is no reason at all why we should not regard Inspector Berry as an entirely honest witness. He has been long in the force, and no one can suggest on the evidence any reason for believing that Inspector Berry was actuated on this Saturday night by any malicious motive in regard to any of the rather numerous prisoners with whom he dealt on the night in question. On that night he was on duty from 10 p.m., and had, when the three prisoners with whom we are concerned were brought in, dealt with a very considerable number of charges. Between 11.50 p.m. and 12.30 a.m. he took 5 charges, exclusive of that against Gerothwohl, Lavalette, and Timmings, namely: 3 before and 2 after dealing with that one. These facts we take from the charge-sheets for this night at Vine Street, which we have inspected and which are clearly documents that came into being in the ordinary course of business. Not one of the persons charged on this night at Vine Street except Gerothwohl and Lavalette has made any complaint as to Inspector Berry's conduct. It is perfectly clear that he had not the slightest personal animus against any one of these three prisoners as they were total strangers to him; nor have we been able to discover anything to show any special degree of friendship or even acquaintanceship between him and any of the constables concerned in this matter. We may assume, then, that when he came from where he was standing at the door of the Inspector's office when Timmings was brought in and he found that he had new charges to attend to, he intended to do his duty and to act in accordance with the ordinary rules prescribed.

Inspector Berry, after describing what he observed and what took place when he went into the charge room and took his place at his desk after the three prisoners in question were in the dock, went on to give evidence as to the allegation of drunkenness. The Inspector's answers on this point deserve attention:—Mr. Eldon
Q. 2166 Bankes—"As regards the allegation of drunkenness, would it be your duty to inform yourself, as well as you could from their appearance, whether the charges could be justified? (A.) Yes, I should exercise my personal opinion whatever the constable
Q. 2167 said. (Q.) What was it that led you to think from what they said and did in the charge room that the men were under the influence of drink or drunk? (A.) They smelt strongly of drink, their faces were very flushed, their voices were rather thick, they did not seem to have proper control over their tongues, and their eyes had a
Q. 2168 glassy appearance, which follows from drink. (Q.) Were they very excited? (A.)
Q. 2169 Yes, Dr. Gerothwohl particularly, but Mr. Lavalette not so much. (Q.) Upon that you took the charge, you entered it, you read it over to them, and they made no answer? (A.) No answer whatever." There are some other answers given by the Inspector bearing upon the question of the prisoners' condition, but the gist of his evidence is given in his answer to question 2167. The data upon which the Inspector forms his opinion are these: the smell of the breath, flushing of the face, thickness of speech, some loss of control over their tongues, which we suppose means a hesitation or stammering, or something of that kind, and a certain glassy appearance of the eyes. If the Inspector's observation was accurate and these symptoms were noticeable we think they afford strong reasons for believing that these two prisoners were under the influence of drink, though whether they could fairly be described as "drunk" is a question on which there might be difference of opinion seeing that the term is one of ambiguous import. Still even assuming accuracy of observation and good faith on the Inspector's part, he may have been mistaken in thinking their appearance and excitement were due to drink. It is not suggested that either of them staggered or had lost control of his limbs, and the description of their behaviour in the dock, given by the Inspector himself, does not suggest that they had reached any advanced stage of intoxication.

In making these observations we have assumed that Inspector Berry acted in good faith. It is only fair, however, to point out that Gerothwohl impugned his honesty and veracity in his letter to the Home Office and in his cross-examination of the Inspector before us. Having regard to the fact that our conclusion on the question we are now discussing depends mainly on independent and medical evidence, it is not necessary at this stage of our judgment to make any observations on Inspector Berry's character or conduct, except that we see no reason to qualify what has been said above as to the spirit in which he approached the taking of the charges against the complainants and Timmings.

We have now dealt with all the police evidence on the question of drunkenness except the expert evidence of Dr. Mitchell with which we deal below.

Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's Case.

Gerothwohl and Lavalette, of course, asserted expressly or impliedly throughout the whole course of their evidence that they were perfectly sober. They are men obviously not in the habit of drinking to excess, and they gave us a rational account of the way in which they had spent the evening. These facts tend to confirm their statements, but in endeavouring to solve the difficult problem before us we think that their evidence is so inextricably mixed up with the main question that their asseveration of sobriety ought for the moment to be dismissed from our minds for the same reason that we ignore any value which, under ordinary circumstances, might be attached to that of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington.

Sherrington's Evidence.

Fortunately for Gerothwohl and Lavalette they had a few minutes before 11 met a gentleman who was acquainted with Lavalette, but who according to his recollection had not met Gerothwohl before. Sherrington, who is a well-known barrister, was called both at the police court and in our proceedings. He gave an account of his accidental meeting with Gerothwohl and Lavalette on the evening in question, and he entirely corroborated that which we had already received of that meeting from them and the evidence they gave as to the conversation which took place in the Trocadero Restaurant. The conversation lasted for a little more than half an hour and Sherrington had therefore every opportunity of noticing their condition; he left a little before 11.30 p.m.; and he told us that they were then perfectly sober.

We have here the testimony of a witness who is as disinterested as any witness who could possibly be obtained. He gave his evidence in such a way as to carry to our minds the conviction that he was conspicuously fair and careful. He was in a position to judge of Gerothwohl and Lavalette's condition without any uncertainty whatsoever, and there is no reason to doubt that they were, as he said, sober when he left them. One observation, however, must be made, not in qualification of Sherrington's evidence, but with a view to considering the possible subsequent condition of Gerothwohl and Lavalette. Sherrington left them in the street, and got into a cab; he did not therefore have the opportunity of seeing what, if any, effect the whisky they had just taken had upon them when they came out into the open air. His evidence, notwithstanding this, makes it clear that they were sober at 11.30, and raises a presumption in favour of their having been sober at midnight. We have no direct evidence apart from their own as to how they spent the time between 11.30 and the time at which the affair began a few minutes after midnight outside St. James's Church. All the public-houses and places of refreshment shut at midnight on Saturday, and that being so the period during which it was possible for Gerothwohl and Lavalette to take further refreshment becomes limited to half an hour. In any case, supposing that they were in a place of refreshment and were able to get a drink even after the clock had struck, the period during which they could obtain anything more than they had had at the Trocadero is limited to some 35 minutes. Making every allowance for the effect of the one whisky apiece that they, perfectly sober men, took at the Trocadero, it does not seem to us at all likely that the drink they then had would be sufficient to make them drunk at midnight, or to put them under the influence of liquor. If, as seems to be the case, they were men who were habitually very moderate in the use of stimulants, it is of course possible that when they got into the open air such an effect was produced upon them by the whisky they had just taken and the lively scenes in which they found themselves as to cause them to lose their ordinary self-control; still that does not seem to us to be at all probable. They were both strong young men, in the enjoyment of almost perfect health, as we know from the tests to which later on they were subjected by Dr. Davis and by Dr. Walker. If, therefore, they did exhibit at a quarter past twelve the symptoms mentioned by Inspector Berry, we think they must have taken further refreshment during this half hour.

Q. 259 Let us see what they did according to their own account. They "walked down Coventry Street to Leicester Square, keeping in the middle of the road." Then, "On coming back towards Piccadilly," they "came back on the pavement and proceeded down Piccadilly in order to take" their 'bus home, and they got as far as St. James's Church when the incident of Timmings' arrest took place. According to Lavalette's evidence they "walked down Lower Regent Street," as far as the "Continental," keeping in the middle of the road so as not to mix with the "crowd which was being thrown out of that hotel." It is obvious that in this not very long walk there was the most ample opportunity for their taking one or even two drinks and yet accomplishing the distance they traversed in half-an-hour or 35 minutes. If one walks at an ordinary pace the ground over which they passed could easily be traversed in about a quarter of an hour, though, taking into account the crowded state of the streets, the period might be lengthened by slow sauntering without any intentional stopping to half-an-hour or even more. The account therefore which they give is quite consistent with the theory that they took another drink or two. On the other hand, having regard to the state of mind in which both of them were, as displayed in the conversation at the Trocadero, and seeing that they had spent the evening in by no means a convivial manner, and that they had had plenty of opportunities between the time they finished dinner and the meeting with Mr. Sherrington of getting as drunk as they pleased, there seems no reason why they should have taken any more, and why they should not have been proceeding soberly home, as they say. Of course, if we believe P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington's story about their conduct in Piccadilly, it would be probably true to infer that they did take more drink, but that story is in dispute, and we have no right at the present moment to assume that the police story is true. Eliminating that, it seems to us that the presumption upon the evidence discussed up to this point is in favour of their not having taken anything to drink after Sherrington left them.

Medical Evidence on Police Side.

But we have now to consider the medical evidence. On the police side Dr. Mitchell, the Divisional Surgeon of the C Division, was called, and on the other side two gentlemen practising in Kensington, Dr. Ivor Davis and Dr. Henry George Walker, gave evidence. It is unfortunate that owing to Inspector Berry not having understood, as we think he should, that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were denying that they were drunk, Dr. Mitchell was not sent for, as he should have been, to examine the prisoners before the charge was taken, and that owing to some mistake in the transmission of the message, which seems to have been due to an accident, the medical gentleman

Dr. Stewart, whom they summoned, did not attend. It was not until a quarter-past 2 in the morning that Inspector Berry suggested that they should see the Divisional Surgeon, and that upon their assenting Dr. Mitchell was called in. Dr. Mitchell examined Gerothwohl at 2.30 a.m. and Lavalette at 2.45 a.m. So that two hours and a quarter had elapsed since the former and two hours and a half since the latter had been placed in the dock. Dr. Mitchell's evidence therefore assumes the character of expert evidence, save so far as his description of their physical condition at the time of the examination may be looked upon as plain statement of fact. Neither Gerothwohl nor Lavalette said anything as to the circumstances of their arrest to the doctor, and it does not appear that he had any information upon the matter or as to their accusations against the police. Dr. Mitchell, it is true, had been on the premises when these prisoners were charged, and when leaving the opposite room (i.e. the inspector's office) after a quarter-past 12, he had seen three men in the dock, who, no doubt, though he was not able to swear as to their identity, were Gerothwohl, Lavalette, and Timmings. He made in the corridor outside the cells a very careful examination of both Gerothwohl and Lavalette, and embodied the opinion which he formed as to their condition in two entries, from which copies called certificates were made, in the Occurrence Book kept at the station. He also made in his own notebook some notes of the symptoms of the prisoners. The entries in the Occurrence Book are as follows: "I examined at 2.30 a.m. Maurice A. Gerothwohl and found him recovering from the effects of excessive drinking. I think he is not now drunk." "I examined at 2.45 a.m. Q. 3210. Henri Lavalette and found him recovering from the effects of excessive drinking. I think he is not now drunk."

The evidence which Dr. Mitchell gave as to the examination and the method by which he arrived at his conclusion is as follows:—"(Q.) Will you tell us what are Q. 3213. the indications which you look for of drunkenness, or of a man having been drunk? (A.) Do you mean the symptoms? (Q.) Yes? (A.) I generally examine the eyes Q. 3214. to begin with, and in almost every case I find the pupils dilated and inactive. They do not react to light, the whites of the eyes are usually congested, the speech is hesitating and stammering, the expression vacant, gait unsteady, the lips parched, and the breath smells of drink. (Q.) Those are the symptoms you look for Q. 3215. in order to make up your mind? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What did you find upon your Q. 3216. examination of these gentlemen that led you to form the conclusion which you state in your certificate? (A.) I examined them as to gait, and found it perfectly steady; the expression was intelligent, the voice in either case was not thick, and they did not stammer or hesitate, and I therefore came to the conclusion that they were sober; but when I examined their eyes I found the pupils still dilated, I found their lips parched, and their breath distinctly smelling of drink, and therefore I concluded that they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking." These answers contain the substance of Dr. Mitchell's evidence.

The certificates based upon the symptoms which Dr. Mitchell observed resolve themselves into two propositions, namely that (1) Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not drunk at 2.30 a.m. and 2.45 a.m., and (2) they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking, which is tantamount to saying that their condition was such that as a skilled medical observer he was bound to infer that they had been drinking to excess. As to the meaning of the first proposition no difficulty arises in its application to the condition of the prisoners at that time. It meant that whatever amount of alcohol they might have recently consumed, its effect so far as its control over mental or physical action was concerned had quite passed away. With regard to the second proposition, it should be noticed that it is of a very ambiguous character. The form of words used by Dr. Mitchell may possibly mean that they showed symptoms of being habitual drunkards, or of having had a drunken bout three or four days or a week or more before. But used in the context in which they here occur the words seem to apply to recent drinking by the prisoners. Again, the word "excessive" is of uncertain import; it may be construed as meaning that they had taken so much drink that they had been quite drunk, or only enough to become noticeable; but probably a criticism of that kind might be directed against almost any summarised conclusion arrived at by an examining doctor, especially when the form of words has to be abbreviated as much as possible for the purpose of entry in an official book. Taken in conjunction with Dr. Mitchell's oral statement, we think that his opinion may be put clearly enough in the following way :—That the prisoners were sober in the sense that the effect of drink so far as it affected the will or muscular action had completely passed away, but that certain symptoms which he mentioned were observable, and that from them he was bound to infer that they had consumed so much alcoholic liquor that they had been recently under the influence of drink to such an extent as to affect their appearance and conduct.

That being so, his evidence amounts to a very important corroboration of the view taken by Inspector Berry. The strength of that corroboration depends upon whether we can believe Dr. Mitchell's statement as to the symptoms he observed, and whether the inference which he drew from those symptoms is either necessarily or probably sound. Prima facie Dr. Mitchell is entitled to implicit credence. He is a Doctor of Medicine, he has practised for many years, he has had as Divisional Surgeon of Police for a considerable number of years great experience in testing the condition of persons with a view to determining whether they were sober or not, and he had an entirely favourable opportunity of observing the condition of these prisoners. Until we had the opportunity of visiting Vine Street Station at night we had rather imagined that the circumstances under which the examination took place might not be very favourable for exact diagnosis. We pictured to ourselves the corridor referred to as a dim, rather ill-lighted, narrow place, where even a careful surgeon, and certainly one performing a disagreeable duty in the dead of night, might easily make mistakes unless there was something to put him especially upon his guard. This idea was entirely unfounded. We have been to the corridor in question late at night, and we find it so exceptionally well lighted and so broad and convenient a place for making a man walk up and down and observing his gait and so forth, that it could only be a very negligent or unskilful surgeon who could make a mistake in discovering the absence or presence of symptoms such as those relied upon by Dr. Mitchell.

A suggestion, of course, which may be made, and which, indeed, to some extent was made by Gerothwohl in his cross-examination, is that Dr. Mitchell, though, of course, not intentionally dishonest in examining prisoners, may allow himself to be misled by a professional bias in favour of the police. We can discover absolutely nothing to warrant any suspicion of the kind. The utmost that can be said in support of such a suggestion is that insensibly, almost without knowing it, a doctor who is often called in for the purpose of deciding whether he thinks a man is drunk or not, and finds in nine cases out of ten that he is so, becomes liable to take an unfavourable view of slight indications which to the ordinary man in the street would have no particular significance. That such may become the attitude of a Divisional Surgeon of Police is of course possible, especially if he does not take pains to note carefully each of the points which he regards as a test which ought to influence his opinion in some book which he may use so that he may check himself when he comes to make his entry in the Occurrence Book. It does not seem to us likely that any such tendency can have affected Dr. Mitchell on this occasion. It is true that the case then presented itself to him as merely an ordinary one, but it is also true that in accordance with his custom he wrote down at the time points which he noticed as important data for his conclusion.
Q. 3216. It does not seem to us reasonably possible to believe that Dr. Mitchell can have been under any mistake when he wrote down—"I found the pupils dilated, their lips parched, and their breath distinctly smelling of drink." It is the practice of Dr. Mitchell, as we know from seeing him examine persons in the corridor at Vine Street Station, to observe the eyes of such persons through a magnifying glass as well as to note down at once the result of his inspection. The fairness and the completeness of the examination are confirmed by the fact that Gerothwohl and Lavalette do not dispute the statement made by the doctor as to the tests to which they were subjected, and also by the fact that he wrote down that
Q. 3216. he found their gait was steady, the expression intelligent, the voice not thick, and that they did not stammer or hesitate. Indeed, it would be difficult to hint any doubt upon the matter with plausibility were it not for the fact that equally careful examinations of the two prisoners were made by Dr. Davis and by Dr. Walker soon after they left the station, and that both these doctors found the eyes of Gerothwohl and Lavalette normal and not dilated, failed to detect any smell of whisky or spirits about the breath of either, and seem to have noticed nothing unusual about their lips. It is, of course, quite possible that the symptoms noticed and relied upon by Dr. Mitchell at 2.30 and 2.45 a.m. may have completely disappeared when they came to be examined by the Kensington doctors. But possibly that is not the case, and, if so, the evidence of those gentlemen may throw doubt upon the accuracy of Dr. Mitchell's diagnosis.

So much as to the existence of the symptoms described by Dr. Mitchell upon which he founded his opinion. As we have said, we understand he means to convey to our minds that he believed he was right in concluding from those symptoms that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were drunk or much under the influence of liquor quite recently, and at the time when they were brought into the cells. The question then is, what weight are we to give to the inference which he draws from the somewhat scanty but not necessarily insufficient data which he had before him? In effect he says—"I believe that they were drunk or under the influence of drink about midnight, because, though they could walk steadily, and so forth, their lips were parched, their breath distinctly smelt of drink, and the pupils of their eyes were dilated." Dr. Mitchell seems to have had no difficulty at all in coming to that conclusion, and that he did so perfectly honestly seems to us beyond argument. It is, however, open to us to believe that he made a mistake. He knew nothing then about the scuffle and assault outside the station, if, in fact, it took place. Gerothwohl and Lavalette maintained silence as to the events which had led to their being in the dock; and the doctor had not for the purpose of making his entry anything more than what he himself personally observed, and the fact that they had been arrested on a charge of being drunk and disorderly.

The question whether the symptoms noted by Dr. Mitchell might not be accounted for by the alleged experiences of the prisoners was naturally raised in his examination before us in various forms, and the excitement manifested in the dock and its possible effects upon the physical condition of the prisoners were then present to the doctor's mind. Perhaps the most important questions and answers are the following:—"(Q.) With regard to the smell of drink. Would anybody be able to Q. 3358.
detect what they had been drinking from the smell? (A.) I smelt distinctly in the breath of both whisky, and probably wine and beer. (Q.) Why do you say probably wine and beer. (A.) Wine and beer ferment in the stomach and produce sour condi- Q. 3359.

the drink would not oxidise in a stuffy police cell as it would outside. After all, speaking of drunkenness, it is difficult to say when a man is really drunk. My own opinion is this: Given an individual who through excessive indulgence in alcoholic stimulants becomes a danger to himself or the public, or an annoyance to the public, or commits acts against his own interests through his having over-indulged in stimulants, that man is drunk. Some people run away with the idea that unless a man falls on the floor or in the gutter, and cannot get out of it, he is not drunk; but that is not my opinion. regard to the smell. How long do you think the smell would last from a man who had taken, we will say, two whiskies and sodas from 11 o'clock to 12.15? How long would he continue to smell? (A.) So much depends. If he is in the open air it would pass off in half an hour where oxidisation is going on, but if that man is in a stuffy police cell it might last two or three hours or longer. I have often found that. (Q.) When you examined them, and they had been in a stuffy police cell Q. 3362.
for two hours and three quarters, and when you found them still smelling, would that be from two whiskies and sodas. haps it might." The effect of these answers is that the violence to which Gerothwohl and Lavalette had been, if their story is true, subjected, and the consequent mental and physical excitement in the dock would, in his opinion, not be sufficient to account for the symptoms which Dr. Mitchell observed, and to some extent, at any rate, it seems to us obvious that he is right. We may put aside the "parched lips" as not being important since it is not of itself an indication of drunkenness. The smell of the breath, however, cannot have been caused by the assault and the excitement. So, again, as to the dilated pupils; that symptom cannot have been due merely to such an unpleasant experience as they allege. The fact that the pupils of their eyes were dilated in an exceedingly well lighted corridor after coming from a dark cell is clear proof that their eyes did not act to light at that time. It seems difficult to believe that this could have been the result of the alleged sudden violence of the police. It looks to us therefore as proved beyond reasonable doubt that Gerothwohl and Lavalette had before midnight drunk such a quantity of alcoholic liquor that typical signs of their having done so were observed more than two hours afterwards. Gerothwohl and Lavalette admit that they had taken whisky at a little before 11.30 p.m. Whether the small quantity which they then took would account for those symptoms in their particular case, or whether they took one or more drinks afterwards is one upon which we can hardly expect to get certain guidance from any of the doctors, but the inclination of our opinion is that the answer on this point must be against Gerothwohl and Lavalette. It does not, however, seem to us to prove necessarily, as Dr. Mitchell says, that the drinking must have been excessive in the sense that they were drunk. We should hesitate to express any view on the point but for the fact that Mr. Clinton Dent, who read the relevant portion of

Q. 48913. the evidence of Dr. Mitchell, said that though he thought Dr. Mitchell's opinion sound, the word "excessive" seemed to him to be the whole point. The Chairman
Q. 48914. thereupon said, "I put it to you in this way: is it a true scientific inference from the data which the doctor had before him?" and his reply was, "I think the word 'excessive' is too strong as I read it there." That observation seems to us to support the view we take, that when examined by Dr. Mitchell both Gerothwohl and
Q. 48915. Lavalette showed symptoms which could not have been caused simply by violence and consequent excitement and must have been caused by some quantity of drink, but that the symptoms were not such that we are bound necessarily to infer that they had been drunk at midnight.

This concludes what we think it is necessary to say about the medical evidence on the Police side.

Medical Evidence on Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's Side.

Gerothwohl and Lavalette upon being released took the precaution of at once proceeding to submit themselves to an examination by two independent medical gentlemen of position with whom they were personally unacquainted. They walked
Q. 287. to Hyde Park Corner and there took a cab to the house of Dr. Ivor Davis, who resides at 3, Drayton Terrace, South Kensington, and had an interview with him.
Q. 1009. According to Dr. Davis he was awakened at ten minutes to three. It is clear that the time he gives is incorrect, but of course allowance must be made for the difference of clocks or watches. As we know from Inspector Berry and from Dr. Mitchell's entry in the Occurrence Book, which there is absolutely no reason for doubting, Gerothwohl was examined at 2.30 a.m. and Lavalette at 2.45 a.m. If those times are nearly correct, as is probable, then the time given by
Q. 1054. Dr. Davis is considerably too early. Dr. Walker, who resides at Marloes Road, was called up by Gerothwohl and Lavalette at 4 o'clock. It appears that the examination by Dr. Davis took half-an-hour. If we allow ten minutes for going from Drayton Terrace to Marloes Road they must have left Dr. Davis at 3.50, and if that be so then they arrived at Dr. Davis's somewhere about 3.15. This calculation would give them 25 minutes to get from Vine Street Station to Drayton Terrace, a time which, as they walked as far as Hyde Park Corner, is perhaps a little short. We think we may take it as pretty certain that they were with Dr. Davis a few minutes before half-past three. However, the discrepancy as to time is in any case not very great, and may be disregarded.

At the interview Dr. Davis was fully informed as to the occasion of the visit, and was evidently made fully alive to the kind of medical problem presented to him, and he knew that he would very likely be called to give evidence at the Police Court. He subjected both Gerothwohl and Lavalette to the same tests. The examination he made was severe and so exhaustive that it is difficult to suggest what else he could have done. Taking Gerothwohl first the doctor says in regard to him that (a) he examined the eyes and found them normal; they acted to light Q. 1019. and they were not dilated; there was a little congestion of the mucous membranes (conjunctiva), but that did not indicate anything. (b) He could detect no smell of whisky or spirits about the breath. (c) He examined Gerothwohl's hands with a paper held between the fingers, and there was no tremor of the hand or arm. (d) He made Gerothwohl put his two feet together, close his eyes, and then turn round and round in a circle as on a pivot, and Gerothwohl did so perfectly. (e) He made Gerothwohl walk, and he did so perfectly straight. (f) Gerothwohl's pulse was normal. (g) He made Gerothwohl repeat sentences after him and pronounce very difficult words, and this also Gerothwohl did perfectly. Lavalette was subjected to a similar examination. As to both, Dr. Davis's conclusion was that they were not under the influence of drink.

Dr. Walker's evidence was to the same effect as that of Dr. Davis. He examined both gentlemen separately and did not detect about either of them any signs of drink.

We see no reason for drawing any distinction between the weight to be given to the evidence of these two medical gentlemen except this, that Dr. Davis's examination took place half an hour earlier and therefore half an hour nearer the time at which Dr. Mitchell's diagnosis had been made. The testimony of these two gentlemen is undoubtedly important, but after giving it the best consideration it does not appear to us to be so conclusive as Gerothwohl and the two witnesses themselves seem to think. That Dr. Ivor Davis's examination was more rigorous and more exhaustive than that of Dr. Mitchell is perfectly true, and if Dr. Mitchell had found that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were still drunk or not sober at half past two it would have possessed a very critical value. In regard to many points the results of the examination agree with those obtained by Dr. Mitchell. Two of the three symptoms upon which Dr. Mitchell relied are, however, expressly negatived by Dr. Davis, and another (the parched lips) is not touched upon. Dr. Mitchell found the pupils of the eyes dilated. Dr. Davis found the eyes normal, acting to light and not dilated. Dr. Mitchell noticed distinctly in the breath of both whisky, and probably wine and beer. Dr. Davis noticed no such smell. There is therefore as to two very important statements a contradiction between the diagnosis of these two gentlemen. We do not think, as we have said above, it can be reasonably suggested that Dr. Mitchell was mistaken, and for an exactly similar reason we think it is practically impossible that Dr. Davis can have made any mistake, and no suggestion of intentional falsehood on the part of either can possibly be entertained. It seems to us, however, that the contradiction can be reconciled quite naturally by the fact that when Gerothwohl and Lavalette got into the open air and walked away the symptoms mentioned by Dr. Mitchell disappeared simply by the lapse of time and by contact with the cool air of an April morning.

So much for the evidence of Dr. Davis and Dr. Walker as to the actual condition of their patients when they saw them. Dr. Davis, however, expressed an opinion Q. 1026. upon a question put to him by Gerothwohl who said, "I have only one question to put to you, and that is whether in your opinion we might have been drunk two hours before. (A.) No, it is impossible." Following up that question later on Mr. Q. 1046. Rufus Isaacs asked: "You told us that there was no indication of their having been drunk two hours before. Take the time we have in this case, namely from 11.30 to 12.10. Was it possible at the time you saw either of those gentlemen that they could have been drunk between 11.30 and 12.10?" and the answer was "They could not possibly have been." In answer to the next question, "Was it possible that they Q. 1047. might have been not drunk but under the influence of drink," he replied, "No, I do not think so." Further asked whether, if they had been under the influence of drink during that time, he would have been able to detect it by the examination he made at 3 o'clock, the doctor replied, "I think so; in fact the odour would have been Q. 1048. distinct if they had been drinking steadily, but if they had had one drink I should very likely not detect the odour of that at all. I tested particularly for the odour that night, but unless I got quite close to them I could not detect it." That answer at first sight looks as if it conflicted with what the witness had already stated, to the effect that he could detect no smell of whisky, but we think he was speaking hypothetically. As we understand those answers they amount to this, that in Dr. Davis's opinion, having regard to the condition in which Gerothwohl and Lavalette were when he saw them, they could not possibly have been "drunk" at midnight, and that it is not probable that they could have been even under the influence of drink at that hour. Of course if we are right in thus interpreting the opinion of the doctor (and if we accept it) it would be conclusive of the case, because we can see no possible ground whatever for doubting the absolute truth of Dr. Davis's diagnosis; but it seems to us a very doubtful inference, and we heard Dr. Davis's answers with great surprise. Still the same opinion, though not with such certainty, was expressed by Dr. Walker, who having said that neither Gerothwohl nor Lavalette showed any sign of having been under the influence of drink, said he agreed with Dr. Davis that if they had been under the influence of drink some two or three hours before probably some symptoms would have been noticeable. The Chairman then said, speaking to Gerothwohl, "You had better put to him" (the witness) "the exact time, as Mr. Rufus Isaacs puts it. Supposing they had been drunk or under the influence of liquor between 11.30 and 12.10, would their condition have been the condition that it was when you saw them? (A.) No, I think not." Still it seemed to us that the opinion expressed was a somewhat risky one, and feeling that, we took the opportunity when Mr. Clinton Dent, the Chief Surgeon of Police, was examined before the Commission to ask him what his view of Dr. Davis's judgment was. The Chairman had put the facts to him and read the questions and answers to which we have just referred, and Mr. Clinton Dent said: "Speaking for myself I think it is too positive a statement." The same question was put to Mr. Nelson Hardy, who has had twenty-one years' experience as Divisional Surgeon of Police at Dulwich, and his view was that Dr. Davis's expression of opinion was "altogether incorrect," and "that he was not warranted in going so far as he did." Then in answer to Mr. Whitmore, who put the question thus: "You mean it is not impossible that they might have been drunk," he replied "Yes." We are therefore quite clear that we cannot accept Dr. Davis's opinion as by any means conclusive, and indeed that we ought to regard it as one of a very speculative character.

Qs. 1060–1061.

Q. 1062.

Q. 48361.

Qs. 49090–49097.

There is a word or two which we ought to add in regard to Dr. Mitchell's evidence. When we first read the certificate it struck us, seeing that he was called in after the prisoners had been a long while in the cells, that the very form of the certificate suggested that he (Dr. Mitchell) was wishing to summarise his view in a manner favourable to the police. We did not think for a moment that he intended to be unfair or improperly try to shield the police, but we did think that he had gone beyond what was strictly necessary under the circumstances, and we accordingly asked him several questions tending to elicit what was his real duty under the circumstances. His answers to those questions completely satisfied us that he was quite right in going into the whole matter, and in making the entry in the Occurrence Book, briefly putting what he believed to be the real condition of the prisoners.

In connection with this point it should be noticed that neither Gerothwohl nor Lavalette said one single word to Dr. Mitchell about their having been assaulted by the police. We are not saying that they need have done so, nor are we pressing that as a point against them, but as Inspector Berry also does not appear to have told the doctor anything about the accusation made by the prisoners or of their excitement in the dock, the inference is that Dr. Mitchell when he examined Gerothwohl and Lavalette knew nothing to induce him to believe that there was any particular occasion for shielding the police, or that the matter was one of any unusual importance.

Summing up the effect left on our minds by the evidence of Dr. Davis and Dr. Walker it comes to this—that it leaves the evidence and the value of the judgment of Dr. Mitchell quite untouched; it shows that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not only sober, but were in excellent physical condition; it proves conclusively what no one had suggested—that they were not drunk and incapable at midnight—but as to whether they had been appreciably under the influence of liquor at midnight it affords no certain clue.

The Excitement of Gerothwohl and Lavalette.

There is one other topic which has a bearing upon the first question before us. We mean the unusually excited appearance and behaviour of Gerothwohl and Lavalette when in the dock at the police station. As to the fact that they conducted themselves in an extraordinary manner there is no doubt. They protested loudly, they shouted noisily ; Gerothwohl flourished a card and changed his position in the dock, and so forth. Except as to the raising of his stick and the way it came to be broken there is little conflict of evidence as to what took place in the charge room. In discussing the question as to the place of arrest we have deemed it necessary to examine minutely that evidence in order to try to ascertain what they said at that time and how far the Inspector really understood their allegations. It is not necessary for our present purpose to anticipate the result of that examination. It is sufficient that it is common ground that both these prisoners displayed in appearance and behaviour great and unusual excitement.

For their excitement there must have been some cause. P.C. Divers and Inspector Berry not unreasonably thought it was due to drink. Gerothwohl and Lavalette evidently thought that an explanation was necessary, and the suggestion to be gathered from their account is that it was due entirely to the emotions of anger and indignation, and the mental confusion and temporary loss of balance naturally caused by a sudden and violent personal outrage. The policemen, too, it was said by Gerothwohl, were all shouting, and, as we gathered, he mentioned this as some excuse for his own shouting. But substantially the reason advanced for their behaviour by Gerothwohl and Lavalette was the ill-treatment which they described.

Now it is clear that as positive disproof of the allegation that they were drunk or under the influence of drink when in the dock such an explanation is by no means conclusive, because the sudden and violent arrest may have been committed as they say and yet they may not have been sober. Still it cannot be denied that if there were no other ground whatever for believing they had taken too much the theory that their excitement was due to their ill-treatment would be a reasonably sound and satisfactory explanation of their behaviour in the charge-room.

This completes what it occurs to us to say as to the question of the condition of Gerothwohl and Lavalette.

The Condition of Timmings.

The next question we have to discuss is—What was the condition of Timmings ? Was he drunk or was he under the influence of liquor, or, as he told us, quite sober ? It should be noticed that Timmings is not a complainant against the police in the same sense as Gerothwohl and Lavalette. He did not make any complaint to the Home Office about his conviction, nor did he of his own motion come forward upon the appointment of the Commission. Upon inquiry we found that he had given at the station his correct name and address, and we caused a summons to be sent to him. He came quite willingly and made his statement to the Secretary as directed, and it was upon that statement that the Chairman examined him, allowing him so far as was possible to tell his story in his own way. It does not appear to us that the fact that Timmings did not come forward to make an independent complaint against the police is a circumstance of any importance. His attitude throughout was one of indifference. His silence at the Police Court and his showing no desire to make common cause with Gerothwohl and Lavalette either there or till he was actually before us exhibit consistency of purpose.

Although Timmings did not make any formal complaint to us it is clear that that does not in the least absolve us from considering the question whether the police were guilty of misconduct in his case just as much as in regard to Gerothwohl and Lavalette. The question of Timmings' condition is not only important in determining whether he was rightly arrested by P.C. Isaacson, but because his evidence is relevant to the main question which we have to decide. It is true that assuming the veracity of Gerothwohl and Lavalette he can only directly corroborate their case in reference to a portion of the series of events upon which that case depends. He could not say anything about what is alleged to have taken place just outside the police station, but he was, quite consistently with the story as told by them, able to speak as to the circumstances of his own arrest, as to what took place on the way to the station and in the charge room, and as to their conversations in the cell. The value of this evidence, however, largely depends upon whether he was sober enough to observe and recollect accurately what was taking place.

The Police Case Against Timmings

Let us see then how the evidence stands as to Timmings. The police case
Q. 1094. in the main was the same as that against Gerothwohl and Lavalette. P.C. Isaacson says he saw the three prisoners in Piccadilly all drunk and shouting. Before us he repeated this statement, and said emphatically Timmings was drunk, and that he had got hold of Gerothwohl's right arm. He was confirmed at the Police Court and before us by P.C. Wallington. With regard to Timmings, as with regard to the others, their evidence is not of the slightest value unless we are prepared to accept the whole story as told by them. When we come to the evidence of P.C. Divers, however, that is not the case. It is common ground between all concerned that at some point or other on the way from St. James's Church to the station P.C. Divers was either alone or together with P.C. Isaacson in charge of Timmings. P.C. Divers' evidence carries the matter a
Qs. 1957–1960. good deal further. He told us he had formed the opinion that Timmings was drunk on the road from Piccadilly to Vine Street Station, that the prisoner was able to walk all right, but that he sometimes staggered a bit, and that he could feel the jerk on his arm as the prisoner staggered ; and he drew a distinction
Qs. 1961 1962. between his condition and that of Gerothwohl and Lavalette. Then he said, "I should not have known they were drunk only from the excited condition they were in, and they were certainly not in the same condition as Timmings." If that evidence is to be trusted there seems no doubt that Timmings' condition was not normal, and the reasonable inference is that he was more or less drunk.

The evidence of Inspector Berry was practically the same with regard to Timmings as in regard to the others ; he noticed his breath when he passed in front of the dock ; but of course, as Timmings according to all accounts was quite quiet, the Inspector could not have come to the conclusion that he was drunk except upon very superficial signs.

The Case for Timmings.

Both Gerothwohl and Lavalette had something to say about Timmings' condition. Of course, seeing that if their account is true, they had had no conversation with him and could not have had any close inspection of him before they were in the dock, and that during the time they were there by their own admission they were angry and noisily shouting, their opinion as to his condition could only be based on what they saw of him before he was thrown down by P.C. Isaacson and what they observed in the cell. Gerothwohl does not say categorically that Timmings was sober, and he describes him as " weeping and apologising to the police very much." We understood that to refer to the time when they were in the dock. If it meant that he was weeping and apologising on the way to the station, that hardly accords with the evidence of P.C. Divers. If it does apply to that period, and it is true that he had been knocked about by P.C. Isaacson, it would seem to tell rather against Timmings' sobriety, because if he was sober he might be crying very much ; but still one does not see why he should be apologising for having been knocked down, and a similar comment may be made if he were crying and apologising in the dock. Timmings himself says nothing about apologising. Lavalette was asked the question directly whether he thought Timmings was sober, and he answered that he was quite sober. As to the weeping and the apologising he says nothing, and he also stated that in the cells Timmings categorically said, "I am not drunk," although neither Gerothwohl nor Timmings confirms such a positive statement.

Upon the whole, even if we were to accept Gerothwohl and Lavalette's story as in the main true, no great weight could be attached to their evidence as to Timmings' condition. It is evident that they did not apply their minds at all to the question whether he was drunk or not, but that they were assuming his sobriety as a matter of course, because it was their impression that they had seen him walking quietly along when he was arrested by P.C. Isaacson.

Coming now to Timmings' own evidence, shortly summarised it was this. He was 19 years of age, and was in April of last year living with his father, who is a coachman. He himself is a groom, and he had been in service earlier in the year until he became ill from acute rheumatism. He had been three weeks in the infirmary and three weeks in a convalescent home, and on the Boat Race night he had been home a week out of employment, and the doctor who had treated him had given him some direction about treatment—"He told me not to touch any intoxicating liquor, only I could have a glass or two every now and then." He had been at home the greater part of the Saturday in question, though he had been out once during the evening, and at ten minutes past eleven at night he "thought a blow on the 'bus would do me better than sticking indoors." Accordingly he took a 'bus after taking a glass of bitter at the Redcliffe Hotel, a public-house in the Fulham Road. He got off the 'bus at the Leicester Arms or the Leicester Hotel in Leicester Square; he had a glass of bitter there and he left the public-house a few minutes before it closed, that is to say a few minutes before 12. He then walked to Piccadilly, being on the south side until he got to St. James's Church. He did not get quite as far as the church "because there was a big crowd, and a rather biggish constable pushed me against a cab-wheel." To use his own words, "I picked myself up, and as soon as I picked myself up the constable arrested me. I told him he was making a mistake, and he told me to come along with him—he would see all about that. He took me very nearly up to the top of Swallow Street." When they got to the top of Swallow Street, the constable (i.e., P.C. Isaacson), whom Timmings identified before us, handed him over to another constable, whom he also identified as P.C. Divers.

Q. 3418, but see Qs. 3568, 3569.
Q. 3423.
Q. 3439.
Q. 3443.

That is all that bears on the question of drunkenness in Timmings' evidence in chief.

What are we to say about it? If we put aside the other circumstances in the case, what would one conclude from Timmings' own statement about himself? Here we have a young man not fully recovered from an illness which had obviously been very severe, and he admits that his doctor had told him to be very sparing in the use of intoxicants. He asks us to believe that he went out late at night for a "blow," simply for a kind of constitutional outing for the benefit of his health. He had been out before that evening, and the necessity for taking the air between 11 and 12 o'clock on an April night is not very obvious. His intention in going out is of no great importance, but we have no doubt he did so for the express purpose of seeing what was going on about Piccadilly Circus, and to join in the general hilarity which appears incident to a Boat Race night. He admits having two glasses of beer, but it is not to our minds likely that when once he had got into the desired neighbourhood he contented himself with one glass at a public-house in Leicester Square. He was certainly not averse to going into public-houses, because it accidentally came out that on Sunday, as soon as he had got back to Fulham, and notwithstanding the scrape he had got into, the first thing he did was to go into the Redcliffe Arms for refreshment. It seems to us quite likely that he took more on Saturday night than he either admits or remembers. That, however, taken by itself is by no means satisfactory proof that he was drunk or markedly under the influence of drink, but taken in conjunction with what undoubtedly followed, it has very considerable significance. See what took place. If we are to believe his story, when he got to St. James's Church he was suddenly pushed down and arrested without the slightest cause or justification. As to the exact circumstances of his arrest the accounts vary. Those of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington are clear and precise enough, that he was one of the five men who were arm-in-arm shouting, and refused to behave themselves when cautioned. According to Gerothwohl and Lavalette he was pushed down and arrested while walking quietly along a pace or two in front of them at a place where he was not surrounded by the crowd. According to the detailed account which he gave in cross-examination there was a considerable crowd all round him when he was arrested ; it stretched right up to him, in front and behind; they were close all round, touching him, "just like a swarm of bees." He was walking quite by himself, but there was no space all round him; he denies that he was in front of the crowd, but says he was on the pavement and yet not on the pavement. He was just on the kerb, and the crowd stretched from him to the wall, and nobody could pass the other way if they wanted to go in the other direction ; there was a great deal of shouting all round him.

For the moment we will pass by any attempt to reconcile or to criticise these various accounts of what took place when Timmings was arrested. If either Gerothwohl and Lavalette's account or that of Timmings be true, there was no justification for his arrest. If his own recollection be correct it is quite possible that P.C. Isaacson in forcing his way to the front of the crowd may have pushed him and have arrested him under what in that case would be a mistaken belief that he was one of the active disturbers of the peace. But, apart from some suggestion of that kind, we are asked to believe that P.C. Isaacson arrested Timmings wantonly and without motive. However the affair really began, the attention of the "big" constable must have been drawn to him by something which he observed in Timmings' conduct or appearance, and even if the constables are lying as to the exact circumstances of the arrest it is more probable that Timmings was disorderly than that his being picked out was entirely fortuitous, and if he did behave in a disorderly way it is, having regard to his admissions, probable that he was under the influence of liquor.

Our doubt as to the truth of Timmings' view of his condition is strengthened by his own account as to what he said in the cell in conversation with Gerothwohl. Asked if he had a conversation with Gerothwohl, he said, "Yes, he asked me if I was hurt, and I told him not much to make a fuss about, but I felt a little pain. I told him about the illness when we got to know each other. I told him it was more illness than drunkenness, and that the constable had made a mistake."

Qs. 3495–3497.

Gerothwohl's account of the conversation is fuller. According to him, Timmings said, "When he was put into the cell he felt very ill because he had been thrown. He was ill before, but that made him worse"—something to that effect. Later Gerothwohl added, "I fancy in the notes I have here that he said it was more illness than drunkenness." Lavalette does not mention the use of the phrase.

Qs. 384–392.

We think we may take it that Timmings did in the cell say that his condition was more due to illness than to drunkenness, and without placing any unduly strict or adverse interpretation upon it, it does seem to suggest that he knew he was not quite sober. It looks to us as if what he meant to say was "It" (meaning his behaviour and his present condition) "was due to the fact that the illness had made the drink which he had taken upset him." Some light is thrown upon the point by his answers in cross-examination. "(Q.) You have more than once said it was more illness than drunkenness? (A.) Yes. (Q.) That conveys the impression, does it not, that you were drunk, but that you were more ill than drunk? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Is that what you mean to say—that it was more illness than drunkenness? (A.) Certainly it was. (Q.) But there was some drunkenness in it? (A.) Two glasses of bitter would not knock me over. (Q.) It may depend. But is that what you mean to convey —that it was more illness than drunkenness; that you were the worse for liquor, but it was because you were ill that you were so bad? (A.) Certainly not. Two glasses of bitter would not touch me, I do not think. (Q.) Why did you say it was more illness than drunkenness? (A.) That was my opinion. (Q.) Is that your opinion still? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Then there was something peculiar about your behaviour, was there not? (A.) There was not the least sign of bad behaviour, or anything, or shouting on my part. (Q.) What were you explaining by saying that it was more illness than drunkenness? What was more illness than drunkenness? (A.) The policeman said I was drunk. (Q.) Were you not explaining your own condition as more illness than drunkenness? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Therefore there was something that required explanation in your condition? (A.) I cannot say that. I say I was queer, that is all." The effect of those answers (and we ought to say the witness made them very fairly) is that what he meant to convey by what he had stated in the cell was that he was not entirely sober, but that the beer he had taken had had a greater effect upon him than usual because of his illness.

It may be mentioned here that there is no doubt that Timmings was crying in the dock. It may of course be suggested with a considerable amount of force that seeing that he was quite young the very fact of his arrest might make him cry, and that is the explanation which Timmings gives, because he asks us to believe that he broke down, not because he was in a maudlin condition from drink, but because he was overcome by the possible consequences of what had taken place—"Because I was downhearted and afraid that it would reach my mother, who was ill." He says, moreover, that it is quite untrue to say that he was apologising in the dock, and so far from apologising to the police, his recollection is that he told the constable he had made a big mistake. On the whole, the crying does not seem to tell much either way. Qs. 3682–3688.

We now come to what has if not a crucial yet a very important bearing upon the question with which we are now dealing—his complete silence in the charge room and on both occasions on which he appeared in the police court. There can hardly be any mistake about it, because he was categorically asked whether he had ever before the day on which he was examined by us suggested that he was not drunk, and his answer was "No." The point need not be laboured. There is no doubt about the fact, and a very strange fact—if, indeed, he was sober on the night in question—it is. Timmings appeared to be a bright, alert cockney-bred groom, quick and more than ordinarily intelligent. He reads the newspapers, and some of his answers to some of the questions put to him in cross-examination suggest that he knows a good deal about London life, about what goes on in the police courts, and about the sort of conduct that brings people into the clutches of the police; and it is difficult to believe that such a young man, if he were when really sober unjustly arrested by the police, could have maintained the absolute silence and passivity displayed by him under the circumstances. That he did not say much, or indeed anything, in the charge room, even when the charge was read over, may be explicable even if he were sober, and it was natural enough if his mind was confused by drink; but if he was quite innocent of the charge made against him his silence at the Police Court would be astonishing even under ordinary circumstances, and would be still more astonishing when we consider that the case at once developed into one of obviously unusual gravity. Consider what the position was in the Police Court and what Timmings, who was sober enough no doubt in the Court, saw and heard. He heard the two men who had been his companions in the dock and in the cell on Saturday night defending themselves by counsel with the utmost vigour, and he must have gathered that they were alleging that they had come on his behalf to complain of the brutality with which he had been treated by the police. That he was asked by Mr. Denman what he had to say in some proper form of words there is no doubt, and it is not easy to believe that if he had been perfectly sober, when arrested, he would not, on the Wednesday at least, have stated what he knew about the affair and defended himself to the best of his ability. The inference that we draw from his silence is one much more creditable to Timmings than the explanation which he himself gave of this silence. On Monday and on Wednesday he knew the plight into which he had got, he was still ill, and he still knew how he felt on Saturday night when he came into collision with the police, and we think it was his knowledge that the beer he had taken, whatever its quantity, had been too much for him that made him tongue-tied, and he felt that if he once endeavoured to explain the matter or to tell an untruth about it, he would only find himself worse off before the Magistrate than if he held his peace, and therefore he allowed the Court to do what it liked upon his tacit admission of guilt.

The explanation that he gave of his silence is one that is not, however, unbelievable. In effect, he tells us that his state of mind was this: He had got into trouble, and although he was quite innocent of any bad behaviour or of any shouting, and in his own opinion he was not drunk, it was entirely useless for him to struggle against the police, as conviction was a dead certainty whatever he might say or do, and that the Magistrate would inevitably believe anything the police said; he was brokenhearted over it, and he wanted to get it over quickly. Well, that may be entirely true. It may be that even in the case of an intelligent young man by no means ill-educated, having regard to his father's position, such a belief about the power of the police, the way in which they use it, and the authority which their word possesses in a police court, might exist. But it seems very doubtful whether Timmings' real conviction went so far as that. He himself, when pressed as to why he did not tell

Q. 3709. the Magistrate that he had not been drunk, said "I thought I would get it over quickly. I was told by an ex-policeman, if you want to know the truth, that the policeman
Qs. 3709–3728. had me and he would make me pay." He would not give us the name of this ex-policeman, and in fact seemed not to know it, but he said that he could find him, and that he had witnesses to say what the ex-policeman said. Being further pressed he told us the ex-policeman said to him, "If the constable has got you it is no use your getting out of it. What is the use of saying anything?" It is not at all unlikely that some such conversation took place, but the advice given seems to be quite as consistent with the belief on the part of the adviser that Timmings was drunk as that he was sober. Timmings also told us that in conversation with his father the latter made the somewhat oracular remark—"If the policeman says you were drunk
Q. 3805. you must have been drunk." Timmings seems to have thought that all his father meant was that it was no use his making any defence, though on being asked whether he thought his father believed the policeman he said "I expect so." He added, "They
Q. 3808. generally have their way from what I can see of it."

We have now gone over all the portions of the evidence that directly affect the question of Timmings' sobriety. The view which we have formed is that though Timmings was not very drunk he had taken a great deal more than was good for him in his weak condition, and that he was in such a state as to make it quite likely that he joined in the disturbances in Piccadilly to some extent or other.

Conclusions.

The principal conclusions of fact at which we arrive with certainty from the foregoing consideration of the first question are :—

(i.) Gerothwohl and Lavalette were sober when Sherrington left them.

(ii.) They had ample time and opportunity to take more drink between that time and the time at which Timmings was arrested.

(iii.) P.C. Divers honestly thought they were drunk when in the dock.

(iv.) Doctor Mitchell's diagnosis was accurate, that is to say, at the time he examined them (2.30 a.m. and 2.45 respectively), their breaths smelt of drink and the pupils of their eyes were dilated.

(v.) The diagnosis of Dr. Davis and of Dr. Walker was quite accurate, but the opinion expressed by the former that Gerothwohl and Lavalette could not have been drunk or under the influence of drink at midnight is unsound, or at any rate very speculative; but though the absence of all indications of drink at the time these doctors examined them is not inconsistent with their having been under the influence of drink about four hours before, it makes it improbable that they had been drunk in the ordinary acceptation of the term at that time.

(vi.) The excitement displayed by them in the dock may be wholly accounted for by the assault, but it is not inconsistent with their having been drunk or under the influence of drink.

The general inference we draw from these conclusions, coupled with the admitted facts of the case, is that neither Gerothwohl nor Lavalette was on the night in question drunk; but it is common ground that they were both very much excited in the charge-room, and we are not satisfied upon the evidence we have just analysed that they were not to some extent under the influence of alcohol. We have ample testimony to warrant us in believing, as we do believe, that both these gentlemen are habitually sober and even abstemious men. In saying that as the result of our consideration of the case up to this point we are not satisfied that the mental excitement displayed by them at the police station may not have been partly due to alcohol, we do not wish to be understood as making any reflection upon their characters for sobriety.

The Second Question.

Place of Arrest.

Let us now consider the second and principal question which we have to decide, namely, the question of the place at which Gerothwohl and Lavalette were arrested. One's first inclination is perhaps to think that this point is practically dependent upon the question whether Gerothwohl and Lavalette were sober or drunk about midnight on the evening in question.

If Gerothwohl and Lavalette were sober, as they say, it is still possible that they were arrested in Piccadilly, and if they were drunk or under the influence of liquor it is still possible that they were arrested just outside Vine Street Station. The importance of their sobriety lies in this, firstly, that it makes the disorderly conduct attributed to them more unlikely, and, secondly, that it tends to support their evidence, because in that case it may be urged that it is not likely that two sober men could be wholly mistaken as to what took place in regard to their arrests; while if they were drunk or under the influence of liquor, the improbability of two men of their position and character behaving in the silly and rowdy way alleged by the police is greatly diminished and may possibly disappear altogether, and the story which they have told may be the confused and distorted recollection of a series of events which passed very rapidly when their powers of observation were weakened and their minds muddled in consequence of undue indulgence. Seeing that the direct evidence bearing on their condition is not quite conclusive, in dealing with the question where they were arrested it seems better to approach it with an open mind on the question whether they were or were not to some extent under the influence of drink when the affair commenced.

It is unnecessary to repeat Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's evidence as to what took place outside or on the steps of the police station or as to their movements after the time when Timmings was arrested in Piccadilly. It is a clear enough story. The question for us is, Do we believe it? The allegation that constables of good character violently arrested two perfectly sober men proceeding to a police station because they suspected on admittedly very slight grounds that those men were going to say something to the Inspector as to a prisoner who had been arrested in a street crowded in parts with groups of disorderly persons, is certainly strange. It is by no means unbelievable on that account, because very extraordinary things, which upset one's preconceived notions and one's ideas of probability, are often occurring. The story is, as we have said above, a possible one, and that, not simply because there is nothing in the laws of nature which makes it impossible, but because of the conditions prevailing at the place where the arrest is said to have taken place, and because the official character of the persons concerned made it easy for them to take men unawares with comparative safety. Gerothwohl and Lavalette, in walking along Vine Street, cannot have thought of the necessity of guarding themselves from violence on the part of policemen, and the instinct of anyone who may have seen the alleged arrest would be to assume that the proceeding was all right and that the constables had good grounds for the apprehension. Still, in dealing with an accusation of this kind against men who from the character of their duties are peculiarly liable to having such a charge made against them, it would be, in our opinion, very unsafe to assume its truth without some reasonably satisfactory corroboration. That, we apprehend, will not be denied by anyone having to administer justice. But there are cases in which the proposition must be received with some qualification, namely, cases in which the misconduct alleged is of such a kind that, from its very nature, the possibility of direct confirmative testimony is absolutely impossible. That is so in all cases where the victim of an alleged outrage or misconduct has placed himself, or is placed by the course of events, completely in the hands and at the mercy of a person or persons who, as he alleges, took advantage of the situation to commit the misconduct asserted.

Now, it must be said that when once a man is in the hands of the police, once he is within the precincts of a police station, whether in custody or not, he is, or may be, completely at the mercy of the police officials. That, however, is not quite the present case, because here the alleged outrage commenced, at any rate so far as Lavalette is concerned, before he was in the police station, and as to Gerothwohl, it commenced on the steps of the police station, that is to say, at a place where somebody standing, say, at the top of Piccadilly Place could see what was going on. But, practically, at midnight in Vine Street two men close to the door of the police station might find themselves, as seems to have been the case here, in a practically empty street, and, therefore, as much at the mercy of police officials as if they were in the corridor leading to the cells. If so it is not possible for them to obtain the testimony of observers not connected with the police, to corroborate the story they tell, and the consequence is that the mere absence of direct corroborative evidence does not tell against the complainants with anything approaching that degree of force which it would do in an ordinary case. Any tribunal that has to deal with an offence alleged to have been committed under such circumstances as those asserted before us ought not to dismiss the matter merely for want of such direct corroboration. The duty is still imposed upon the tribunal of carefully examining every circumstance that has the slightest relevancy in order to discover if there is anything that tends indirectly or inferentially to support the charge. In doing so it ought to bear in mind, however, that just as it is difficult in this class of case for the complainant to obtain any direct and personal corroboration, so also is it easy for any person to make a charge which it is difficult to disprove because the accused are the only persons who ex hypothesi can give on their side a direct and personal contradiction.

Before considering whether there is in this case any corroboration of the story told by Gerothwohl and Lavalette, let us see what light, if any, is thrown on the matters in dispute by facts which can be gathered from inspection of the place where the alleged assault and the consequent events occurred, and from evidence the weight of which does not depend materially on the truthfulness of any of the men concerned in the affair.

Vine Street Station: Its Position and Approach.

The main entrance to Vine Street Station, through which prisoners are taken, is situated in Vine Street itself. The Station is the last house in the street on the left hand side if one walks from Swallow Street. There is a block of buildings at right angles to it, and looking towards the station from the corner of Vine Street and Swallow Street one would imagine that the street is a cul-de-sac. That, however, is not the case. Immediately opposite the entrance to the station there is a narrow passage which is a public way for foot passengers leading to Piccadilly, and which is called Piccadilly Place; and between Vine Street Station and the block of buildings above mentioned there is a narrow passage which leads in a curve to Regent Street, which is called Half-Moon Passage. We have been there at night, and have found the street and the entrance to the station also well lighted. The ground floor of the police station stands a few feet above the level of the pavement, and the interior is reached by a flight of five steps. These steps do not project beyond the front of the building, but rise in a kind of tunnel to the corridor or passage which runs into the charge room, the door of which is in fact opposite the entrance door. That being so, if a constable were to arrest a man just before he put his foot upon the first step he could be seen by anyone standing a short distance away either in Vine Street or Piccadilly Place, and possibly by anyone with good eyesight looking at the entrance from the corner of Swallow Street and Vine Street or from the bottom of Piccadilly Place where it runs into Piccadilly. If a person were arrested while on the steps mentioned the arrest could not be perceived by anyone not standing somewhere almost immediately opposite the entrance.

On the whole, the result of our view of the premises was to make us think that the place rather lends itself to misconduct if it can be supposed that police officers ever desire to treat people roughly. The station is no doubt conveniently situated, as it is in close proximity to Piccadilly Circus and easily accessible from Regent Street and Piccadilly, but still, its site may be not unreasonably described as somewhat obscure and secret for a public building. It compares unfavourably in this respect with that of most of the stations with which we are acquainted.

Number of Constables in the Charge Room

We now turn to another point. The account of Gerothwohl and Lavalette states that the number of police officers in the charge room was considerable; in Vine Street, after passing the corner, they say they observed, besides the constables in charge of Timmings, two at the entrance to the station. The question of the number of constables in the charge room or about the station is not of primary importance, but it has a relevance as being a point by which we may test the witnesses' powers of accurate observation, and because if there were several constables about ready to help P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington the fact might facilitate the accomplishment of those constables' desires. Let us see what Gerothwohl and Lavalette say on the matter. Gerothwohl's statement is: "Just before we reached the station I noticed Q. 259.
there were two policemen standing on each side of the entrance." "Just as I put my foot on the first or second step I was seized behind, shoved forward up the steps, and on the staircase P.C. 43 let go of Timmings, turned round and facing me this way, he seized me, twisted me round, and flung me on to another constable. That constable flung me back. I was again seized by No. 43, and twisted into the dock. As I was twisted into the dock I saw Mr. Lavalette following, spinning round from one policeman to another." This statement brings on the scene two policemen on the pavement at the foot of the stairs, P.C. Isaacson himself on the staircase, P.C. Divers, who was in charge of Timmings, and possibly another constable; that is, including P.C. Isaacson, five constables. Lavalette's account is this: "Just as I was doing that the policeman who had been following Q. 825. us seized me by the arm and pushed me against the wall, when another policeman took hold of me and I was pushed against another policeman on the steps, and finally I found myself in the dock." This accounts for one policeman who had been following them—one of the five whom Gerothwohl's account brings on the scene—a second policeman who took hold of Lavalette, and a third policeman on the steps—that is, three constables. Of course the second and third constables mentioned by Lavalette would almost certainly be two of Gerothwohl's five. Putting the two accounts together they seem to involve the participation of six constables. According to Gerothwohl there were in the charge room quite fifteen. He also stated, "There Q. 675.
were a great many constables in the station, and a great deal of chattering going on." Lavalette in his evidence in chief said, "There were eight to twelve constables Q. 825.
in the charge room," and in cross-examination ten to twelve.

We are, however, in a position to determine almost with certainty the number of officers in the charge room, unless we are to assume that there was an utter disregard of the rules of discipline at Vine Street on that particular night. The taking of the charge against the three prisoners in question must have taken, one would think, at least five minutes, but it may have taken less. It cannot, however, have taken much more, unless the Vine Street charge sheets of that evening are inaccurate as to the time of taking the different charges, which were considerable in number on that evening, though by no means exceptionally large for a Saturday night.

Here, we may say before stating what the charge sheet disclosed, that it was indicated more than once in the course of our inquiry that according to popular belief a police station is a place where a practically unlimited number of police can be found at any time. In those police stations where there is a section house, that is a boarding house for policemen, there may of course at any moment of the day be a very considerable number of men off duty resting in their cubicles or occupying the common room. The section house, whether it is in a separate building or not, consists of an aggregation of rooms not approached through the charge room, and the inspector or sergeant in charge of the station does not permit his office, the charge room, or any of the rooms set aside for the discharge of office business to be used by any men off duty. Of course, any constable, even if off duty, who has some special reason for asking a question or bringing a message to the inspector in charge may come to the charge room temporarily, but any user of the charge room by constables on duty or off duty for the purposes of conversation or reading would be entirely contrary to the discipline of the station. At stated hours the men about to go off duty and those about to go on duty are paraded at the station. This operation does not involve the constables coming into the charge room.

Under the Regulations arrangements are made for the distribution of the men on duty in each division and in connection with each station during the three eight-hour periods into which the day is divided. To each man "on duty" a particular duty is assigned, and by the aid of the monthly "roster" and the sergeants' daily "state" one can ascertain the place at or near which each man on duty ought to be found at any moment. According to the usual rule there is in each station on duty (1) an inspector or station sergeant whose duty it is to superintend the work of the station, see callers, keep order and receive or refuse charges; (2) a gaoler who is in charge of the cells and who takes over persons detained after they have been charged and the charge has been accepted from the police constable who brings in the prisoner; and (3) a police constable who stands at or near the door, whose duty it is to keep order there, to admit persons coming on business to the station, and to assist if need be in keeping order in the charge room or in bringing in a prisoner. Besides these persons there is usually one who is placed in the telegraph and telephone room whose duty it is to receive and dispatch messages. As a general rule no other uniformed constable is on duty in the station or allowed to stay in the charge room except for the purpose of doing the temporary duty which brings him to the station. The men on duty do come and go into the station; they bring in prisoners, they carry messages, they may come for some such purpose as fetching an ambulance, or asking for the aid of a superior officer in cases of emergency, and so forth. Sometimes police constables thus arriving in the course of their duty may belong to other divisions, but in general such temporary uniformed visitors belong to the division in which the station is placed. Besides these uniformed constables there may be found coming and going others in plain clothes engaged on detective business wishing to make inquiries, to give information, or to consult the books and papers in the office. These, of course, have the entrée to the inspector's office as well as to the charge room. The moment a police constable on duty has discharged his business, he ought to return to his beat or point, and an inspector would be failing in his duty if he allowed him to linger or chat in the charge room. Except the inspector and the two other police constables mentioned, and those coming on business, no officers on duty except superior officers, e.g., a superintendent or sub-divisional inspector, can properly be in the station except on merely temporary business. No change is made in the arrangements on a Saturday night, nor was any change made even on a Boat Race night till this year. The only deviation from the normal state of things on such an occasion as that of the Boat Race is as to the disposition of the patrolling officers, and they are then naturally concentrated where experience shows that when the places of amusement and public-houses close the greatest crowds are likely to collect. Accordingly, there is no reason at all to doubt that the police witnesses are speaking the truth when they tell us there was nothing unusual in the Vine Street arrangements at midnight on the night in question. It is idle to suppose that any special number of constables was collected at the station in the expectation of something out of the ordinary happening. Whether Gerothwohl speaks truly or not, the arrival of these particular persons at the station was as much unexpected by Inspector Berry as their arrest was by themselves. It seems equally idle to suggest that between the time of the arrest of Timmings in Piccadilly and the arrival of the prisoners at Vine Street, either P.C. Wallington or any other police-constable who had seen Timmings' arrest could have intentionally got together a body of constables to come and crowd the approaches of the station, or the charge room itself.

Bearing these things in mind, let us now see what light the documents, which came into being, be it observed, in the ordinary carrying on of the business of the police station, and not with any special reference to the charge with which we are concerned, throw upon the matter. In the Occurrence Book we find the following entry :—

Roll Call C.D. — At 12 night all men off duty present and correct and unnecessary gas extinguished.

(sd.) E. West, P.S. 35 C.

Duty S.F. — F.P.S. 41, C. Smith reports having called the Roll at S.F., all men off duty present and correct.

(sd.) W. Berry, Inspector.

These entries refer to the men who resided in the section house, and who were off duty, and were made in accordance with the rule laid down to be followed every night. They show that at midnight none of the men off duty can have been loitering round the entrance to the station, at least, it makes such a thing very improbable.

Now let us see what charges were made from a few minutes before midnight until half an hour after midnight. It should be remarked with regard to the entry giving the "Date and hour brought to station," which has to be filled in by the officer taking the charge, that no interval of time less than five minutes is recognised or noticed.

The following table shows the particulars as to the prisoners brought in, the charges taken, and the time at which they were brought to the station, for the period just mentioned, which are relevant to our present purpose.

Looking at these charge sheets it will be seen that the two charges taken next before Timmings was brought into the room were those against F. F. and G. G. The entry "12.10 a.m." means the time at which they were brought into the station. Owing to the rules explained above that does not affect to be accurate to a minute. Accordingly, so far as the entry shows, F. and G. must have been brought in a little before or a little after 12.10 a.m., but certainly before 12.15 a.m., at which Timmings is entered as brought in.

The entry immediately before that relating to F. is the one relating to F. N., and it will be observed the time of his being brought in is 11.55 p.m., so that there was an interval of about fifteen minutes between his arrival and that of F. and G. This interval is so long that if the proceedings were conducted with reasonable celerity (and there is no reason to believe the contrary having regard to the number of charges dealt with in the course of the twenty-five minutes) there can be very little doubt that if the rules of discipline were observed P.C. MacDonald, the charging constable in that case, had finished his work in the station and gone back to his beat before P.S. Longton came in with F. Accordingly we may assume that when F. was brought in there was no constable in the charge room except Inspector Berry and the gaoler Walsey, P.C. 438, who, as we know, from the inquiry before Major Wodehouse, was on duty that night. We exclude, of course, from consideration the constable in charge of the telegraph and the telephone. Two officers came in with F. F., Inspector Randall as a witness and P.S. Longton as charging constable; and with G. G. who arrived after F., came P.C. Sennitt, 329 C, who had him in custody.

If the only material we had were the charge sheet it might be quite proper to conclude that all or any one of those officers were present when Timmings came in, and, if so, there would have been six constables in the charge room at that time, and if all three stayed whilst the charge against Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings was being taken there would have been nine constables in the charge room. We, however, have before us the note of the evidence taken at the inquiry before Major Wodehouse, and before him P.C. Walsey and Inspector Randall gave evidence. P.C. Walsey says that he saw Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings brought in, though he could not remember in what order they came in. He says, "I was engaged with a prisoner in the cells at the moment the inspector was investigating the charge." We understand him to mean that as they were coming in he took a prisoner to the cells, because he goes on to say "I came back and saw the stick lying on the table broken in half, and the prisoners were in the dock. The charge was about to be taken." He added that the prisoners made no reply to the charge, that he did not hear them make any statement in his presence, that he put them in the cells and that they said nothing to him at the time; but this witness also said, "They sat down pending the inspector's investigation." That is a thing nobody else had suggested, and it is quite clear that his recollection as to the details of the case cannot be trusted. But we think what may be trusted is the fact that at the time when Timmings came in both the cases of F. and G. had been dealt with and that the prisoner he was putting in the cell when the three came in was one of those persons, and if so, the police officers concerned in the two preceding cases might, if they were doing their duty smartly, get clear of the premises before Timmings arrived; at any rate there was some short interval, because after the charge was accepted the taking of a prisoner from the dock consumes, as we know from having observed the proceedings personally, a little time; and one, at any rate, of the three officers concerned had time to get away, because Inspector Randall, who had been in the charge room as a witness in the charge against F., came in with P.C. Swindon in charge of H. D. and R. E. D., while Inspector Berry was taking the charge against Gerothwohl and the other two prisoners. It may be well to quote his own words as to what he saw and heard on coming in the second time. "Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings were in the dock as I entered the charge room. Inspector Berry was taking their names prior to entering the charge against them. I saw nothing of the stick. They were just handing their cards to the Inspector taking the charge. They were protesting, particularly one of them; I do not know which by name, but the stoutest one of the three." (Clearly Gerothwohl.) "He was protesting very much on being charged. He said he came to the station behind the other man who had been brought there. I did not hear the others say anything." In answer to the question, "Who was in the charge room when you got there," he said, "There were the three constables, the three prisoners. I do not know whether there was another prisoner waiting to be charged. I am not quite certain. I took in a prisoner and a constable brought another in." They were obviously the two D.'s. Although Inspector Randall was not quite sure, he was right in suggesting that there may have been a prisoner waiting to be charged, because in the charge sheet it will be noticed that at the same time (12.15) at which Timmings and the others were brought in C. is entered as having come in with P.C. Sennitt, it is just possible that as an entry of 12.15 does not purport to be the exact moment, C. may have been brought in a minute or two before 12.15, dealt with rapidly, and that he may have been the prisoner whom Walsey was putting in the cell when Timmings was brought in. It seems, however, to us from the order of entry that he was dealt with afterwards. However, it should be noticed that the same constable who is entered as having brought in G. at 12.10 is entered as having brought in C. at 12.15, both upon a charge of begging. The matter is not of much importance, because it only involves the question whether P.C. Sennitt was in the charge room when Timmings came in; and if so, when Inspector Randall came back there would be four constables in addition to the Inspector and the gaoler in the charge room.

Putting all the facts together it seems to us perfectly certain that there were not more than six officers all told in the charge room when Inspector Randall and the constable brought in the D.'s and found Gerothwohl and the other two in the dock. That being so, it is shown that Gerothwohl in saying there were fifteen constables in the charge room, and Lavalette when he said, correcting his first statement, from ten to twelve, were not observing accurately, and the actual facts prove that their recollection is not trustworthy, while on the other hand it confirms
Qs. 1143–4. what P.C. Isaacson told us, i.e., that when the charge against them and Timmings was being taken there were four constables and the Inspector in the room.

Now there is no doubt both Gerothwohl and Lavalette were very noisy and excited in the dock, and it may therefore be urged that their mistake as to the number of the constables was due to their mental condition. How far their anger and indignation at their arrest as alleged, if they were quite sober, might explain a mistake as to numbers is open to dispute. But what appears to be another error in numbers committed by Gerothwohl cannot be explained on any such ground, for it was made as
Q. 259. to something he saw before the occurrence of the alleged outrage. He stated positively to us :—"Just before we reached the station I noticed there were two policemen standing one on each side of the entrance." It is quite clear that it is not the custom at Vine Street or any other police station to put two men on guard at the door. It is the practice to have one, and at Vine Street on this night P.C. Wellbelove was, it is admitted, there on duty. We have no doubt that in suggesting that two constables were standing on guard one on each side of the door Gerothwohl is in error. It is, of course, possible that a constable may in breach of duty have been idling there and talking to P.C. Wellbelove; but it is not likely, for loitering there would be risky for a man on duty. It was a busy night, and the section house was closed. The movements of P.C. Sennitt and Inspector Randall show that neither of them could well have been standing still or even been at the entrance when Gerothwohl arrived there. The former brought in two different prisoners within ten or fifteen minutes, and was either in the charge room or on his way to the station with his second prisoner when Gerothwohl and Lavalette arrived. The latter was probably then in Piccadilly, since he brought in H. D. whom he arrested there while the three prisoners we are concerned with were still in the dock.

Suggested Corroboration by Timmings.

The only direct corroboration of any part of the story of Gerothwohl and Lavalette which is in dispute is afforded by Timmings. If their evidence is true, he could hardly have seen the assault on them at the entrance to the police station, because it appears from their account that when Gerothwohl was first seized Timmings was on the staircase in front of them. He did not in fact affect to speak as to what may have happened in Vine Street after he had been taken through the door. But his evidence as to the circumstances of his arrest and what took place on the way to the police station and in the charge room demands attention.

The details of Timmings' arrest, as described by Gerothwohl and Lavalette, need not be repeated. He was walking quietly along, seemingly sober, a big constable passed him rapidly, pushed him down against a cab, and arrested him in such a manner as to arouse their indignation at what they felt to be brutal treatment. Let us see how far Timmings himself supports this description. His evidence on the point was as follows: "You got as far as the Church? (A.) No, I could not get quite as far as the Church, because there was a big crowd and a rather biggish constable pushed me against a cab wheel. I picked myself up, and as soon as I picked myself up the constable arrested me. I told him he was making a mistake, and he told me to come along with him—he would see all about that. (Q.) Should you know the constable again? (A.) Yes, I should; by the rough way he handled me I should know him? (Q.) What kind of man was he—a biggish man or a small man? (A.) A very big man. (Q.) Had he any moustache or beard? (A.) Yes, rather a heavy moustache. (Q.) When he said 'We will soon see about that' what did he do with you? (A.) He took me very nearly up to the top of Swallow Street." It will be noticed that beyond the use of the words "rough way he handled me" there is not the slightest suggestion of any brutality or great violence, or that he was hurt or cried out, or anything of the kind; on the contrary, according to his recollection he picked himself up and quite rationally and sensibly told the constable he had made a mistake. Of course if he did say so (P.C. Isaacson says not a word about that or about pushing him down), while his observation tells in favour of Timmings' sobriety it does not add any convincing support to Gerothwohl and Lavalette's view that the arrest was brutal, because if it were brutal one would suppose that the victim would have been crying out, or inarticulate, or if able to articulate would shout out, "Do not do that!" or "Why are you treating me like this?" or some exclamatory remark of that kind. Qs. 3439–3443.

In his cross-examination as to his arrest, Timmings gave a series of answers without the slightest hesitation and in a perfectly natural manner which are worth quotation in extenso. After he had been cross-examined as to the number of glasses of beer he had had at the Leicester, the examination goes on thus:—"And then you started to come back? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And then it was that you were arrested? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was there a considerable crowd all round you? (A.) Yes, there was. (Q.) Right up to you in front and behind? (A.) Yes. (Q.) They were close all round, touching you? (A.) Just like a swarm of bees. (Q.) If it is said that you were walking quite by yourself with a space all round you and nobody there at all, that is not right? (A.) It would not be right. (Q.) They were all like a swarm of bees right up against you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Were you in front of the crowd? (A.) No, I was going along this way. (Q.) Were you on the pavement? (A.) No, I was on the pavement and yet I was not on the pavement? (Q.) That means to say you were on the outside—the kerb? (A.) Yes. (Q.) As you say, you were neither on nor off the pavement? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was this crowd stretching from you to the wall? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Right across? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Whether they were arm in arm or not they were straight across the pavement? (A.) Yes. (Q.) So that nobody could pass if they wanted to, coming in the other direction? (A.) No, I understand they could not. (Q.) That is the way in which you were proceeding? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was that the way in which you had been proceeding all the way from Piccadilly Circus? (A.) That is the way you would have to proceed. (Q.) It is quite likely if you went there. There is no doubt that is the way you had been walking all the way from Piccadilly Circus. You were just on the kerb, and there was somebody or another between you and the wall, and no foot passengers could get the other way at all? (A.) You could not help it. (Q.) Was there a great deal of shouting? (A.) Yes, there was. (Q.) Shouting all round you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did you feel inclined to shout? (A.) No, I did not." Now, if those answers are to be trusted the arrest of Timmings was effected under circumstances which much more closely tally with the police account than with the account given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette. They are both perfectly sure that, according to what they saw and recollect, Timmings was not an individual in the midst of a crowd, but an isolated person, walking on the pavement or near the edge of the pavement alone and very quietly. "There was a crowd a good many yards ahead; some young men in a ring, and between that crowd and ourselves there was a youth walking very quietly by the side of the kerb." That is what Gerothwohl saw. When they were nearing St. James's Church Lavalette noticed that they were alone. He told us: "There was a little crowd of people there in front and a little knot of people behind. We were quite alone. We Qs. 3651–3672. Q. 259. Q. 822.

saw Timmings walking along with his hands in his pockets. Then we heard a noise in front and we saw a constable, Isaacson, pass behind a cab and push Timmings, and Timmings fell against the wheel of the cab." Later on in his cross-examination he
Qs. 970-982 told us that when he saw Timmings "two or three paces from us, walking alone with his hands in his overcoat pockets, he was not shouting, he was walking erect, not swaying at all;" and then he described how the constable passed them, as he thought, on the wall side of the street, walking fast, and how without speaking to Timmings he saw him push the young man, and he added, "I may say that Timmings is an absolutely helpless sort of man; he is very weak; he was crying and apologising, and he did not dare say anything." As to the last observation, if we are to believe Timmings, far from not daring to say anything, he did dare to make what was quite a pertinent observation.

Comparing, then, the result of Timmings' recollection with the account of his arrest given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette, we find that his story agrees with the latter in that (a) Timmings was arrested on the side of the kerb on the south pavement of Piccadilly near St. James's Church, and (b) that before being arrested he was pushed against a cab wheel; but the two accounts disagree as to a very material point. According to Timmings he was not walking alone but in the midst of a crowd of persons swarming round him like bees. The police account differs from both these versions. According to them Timmings was in a crowd but he was in the first rank arm in arm with other persons, and P.C. Isaacson positively denies the pushing down.

As to what took place after his arrest, Timmings, while agreeing with all the witnesses that he was taken to the police station through Swallow Street, says that
Qs. 3444-3449. he was "handed over to a young constable" (whom he identified before us as P.C. Divers) "at the top of Swallow Street." The "top of Swallow Street" probably means the corner at which Vine Street runs into it, but it may mean the point of junction with Piccadilly. Whatever place in Swallow Street Timmings may have wished to indicate as the place at which he was handed over, the fact of his being handed over there or anywhere else on the way to the entrance of the station is quite inconsistent with an essential part of the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story. The very gist of their narrative as told is that they followed Timmings and the constable who had arrested him, and who had been joined by another constable at the corner of Swallow Street and Piccadilly, without molestation right up to the door of the station, when they were suddenly set upon. Timmings' evidence on this point, so far from confirming their account, attacks it in a vital point. His statement as to the place at which the handing over occurred is indeed not in accord with that of P.C. Divers,
Q. 1860. who told us he took over Timmings in Piccadilly; but the recollection of Timmings that he was handed over before arriving at the station is a circumstance of much significance.

The only other part of Gerothwohl and Lavalette's narrative as to which Timmings could possibly give any direct confirmation is as to the way in which they were brought into the charge room, and what took place there. We think it well to quote the
Qs. 3454-3459 passages in Timmings' evidence bearing on this point. "(Q.) Perhaps you had better tell us was anybody else in the room when you were put in the dock? (A.) Yes, there were about a dozen; I do not know what sort of people they were, but they seemed to be arguing the point with Inspector Berry. I do not know what they were arguing over. (Q.) You say Inspector Berry. Had you known Inspector Berry before? (A.) Not till I heard his name. (Q.) You had never been to Vine Street before? (A.) No. (Q.) The inspector, whom you afterwards found to be Inspector Berry, was in the room when you were put in the dock? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Was he talking to other people? (A.) Yes, he was arguing the point there. (Q.) While that was taking place, what happened? (A.) There was a Qs. 3467-3476 terrible rush outside, and then I happened to see two gentlemen being thrown about just like a football, and these gentlemen happened to turn up. (Q.) Now come back to what took place in the charge room at Vine Street. Were they put in the dock? (A.) Yes, they were pushed in. (Q.) You had better describe in your own way what took place? (A.) These two gentlemen were holding out their cards, and about a dozen voices all halloaed out, 'We do not want that. What is the name and address?' Just like that. Then I saw one constable take the gentleman's stick away. The two gentlemen were shouting with excitement and very upset, and they kept on denying the charges and saying they had come to speak on my behalf. (Q.) Were they talking loudly? (A.) Yes, sir, very excited. (Q.) How were the constables behaving? (A.) They were all round in a bunch standing on the off-side of the dock. One constable came up, I think it was the constable who arrested me, and broke the walking stick. (Q.) The constable who arrested you, that is the big man? (A.) Yes, that is the one I think took the walking stick. (Q.) It was the same man who arrested you who took the stick? (A.) Yes, that is what I think. (Q.) Did you say anything yourself at this time? (A.) No, not at all, I was weeping and crying, that is what I was doing. (Q.) Did you hear the charge read over by Inspector Berry? (A.) I did. (Q.) Did you say anything? (A.) No. (Q.) Why not? (A.) Because I did not know what to say, and did not know what to do."

It will be remembered that Gerothwohl gave a somewhat striking account of the way in which he and his companion made their appearance in the charge room; he said it reminded him of a game of skittles with human nine-pins in which he was afraid the ball suffered more than the nine-pins. Timmings' phrase—"There was a terrible rush Q. 3459. and then I happened to see two gentlemen thrown about just like a football and these two gentlemen happened to turn up"—is certainly peculiar, and gives one the idea that both his observation of what went on and the fact that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were the persons who "turned up" when the game was over were merely fortuitous occurrences. Of course Timmings can hardly mean that his noticing this particular incident was a pure matter of chance. The unusual phraseology, making every allowance for the indirect and peculiar turns of expression in which imperfectly educated witnesses often state facts, looks to us as not at all one that could have been hit upon by Timmings without some suggestion from an outside source. In the use of the metaphor about football we think one may suspect some recollection of Gerothwohl's own graphic illustration. We do not think that Timmings was in the room when Gerothwohl gave his evidence, but he admits that he had read newspaper reports of our proceedings, and he may well have allowed his own account to be coloured by reminiscence of other people's phrases. It looks as though Timmings was not speaking as to that part of the case with an unrefreshed recollection.

It will be noticed that his statement about there being a dozen people in the room when he was put in the dock, though consistent with Gerothwohl's and Lavelette's statement of the number of persons in the room, cannot possibly be true if our determination of the number of persons in the room at the time is correct.

There is one other point worth noticing in Timmings' statement as to how Gerothwohl and Lavalette were brought in: in cross-examination, when asked whether he would pledge his word that they were thrown about like a football, he Qs. 3749, said "They were going from one constable to the other." Neither Gerothwohl nor 3750. Lavalette say that anything of the sort took place before Inspector Berry. Gerothwohl says that P.C. Isaacson twisted him into the dock, and that if done without undue violence might be a fair description of the constable's method of forcibly directing him into the dock, and is not necessarily a thing which would attract the attention or require the rebuke of the Inspector; but, as we understand his story, the undue violence alleged took place on the steps and in the corridor and not in the charge room. Certainly that is the case so far as Lavalette is concerned, and it is obviously a more likely account than that of Timmings.

It seems practically certain from documentary evidence that came into being in the ordinary course before any controversy had arisen as to the conduct of the police that Inspector Berry had, at the time when Timmings was brought in, dealt with the charge against G. G. before beginning to deal with that against Gerothwohl and the others, and that Timmings' recollection is faulty when he says that when he first got into the dock any people were arguing with Inspector Berry. His account of what took place after they were all three in the dock seems substantially the same as that of the police and the complainants.

Bearing in mind these comments, the result of Timmings' evidence seems to us to be this: If he was, as seems to have been the case, so much under the influence of drink as to make it likely that he had been joining in the shouting and disorder in Piccadilly, that fact must seriously lessen our confidence in the accuracy of his observation at the moment and his recollection of what he thought he observed so far as details are concerned. If, however, he was in such a state that we may rely upon his being able to see and to remember what took place, then his testimony as to the circumstances of the arrest and as to his being handed over in Swallow Street, seriously damages Gerothwohl and Lavalette's account, but to some extent he corroborates the part of their narrative which deals with the way in which they were brought into the charge room.

The "Commotion."

A point was made, or rather suggested, by Gerothwohl during his cross-examination of Inspector Berry as to an admission by him that he had heard a "commotion" and had come out to see what it was. If the point were established it might afford some indirect corroboration of the complainants' story, because the form of the answer would seem to indicate that he heard something unusual. Some noise is always made by the arrival of a prisoner in the charge room, and the noise made by the coming up the steps and along the corridor of four men would be quite accurately described as a "commotion." The point suggested really is that the Inspector heard in this case a "commotion" of a kind different to that which usually accompanies the bringing in of a prisoner. The matter arose thus: Inspector Berry was asked "Did you hear a commotion," and he replied "Some distance off in Piccadilly." He then denied coming out of the front room on hearing the "commotion," and said that he was in the charge room. It appears from other answers made by him that that is not absolutely accurate, because he was in fact standing, when Timmings was brought in, in the doorway or just about the doorway which separates the charge room from his office. Absolute accuracy on such a point is of course not to be looked for in any case such as this. It was then put to him by Gerothwohl that he had said at the police court: "I was standing in the charge room by the dock when they were brought in. There was such a commotion I went out to see what it was." The witness disclaimed having used those words at the police court; his exact words were: "Not to that effect. I do not remember that." But being asked whether he remembered saying something to that effect, he replied "No, not exactly." Gerothwohl was reading from the shorthand note of the evidence in the case of Gerothwohl and others heard at Marlborough Street Police Court on the 11th April, 1906. Those shorthand notes were put in, and the words suggested by Gerothwohl as having been used by the inspector were these: "I was standing in the charge room by the dock when they were brought in. There was such a commotion I went out to see what it was."

Q. 2211.

See Qs. 2714, 2716, 2717.

Q. 2218.

Those words are undoubtedly in the note, but they must be considered in connection with what followed. The note runs after the inspector's answer in the terms just stated thus:—"(Q.) Such a commotion just outside? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Do you know that was where these gentlemen were arrested? (A.) I do not. (Q.) Would that account for the commotion? (A.) No, it was further away. I heard it in Piccadilly down the passage opposite. (Q.) I thought you said there was such a commotion at the door? (A.) No, outside I said. (Q.) I suggest if the arrest took place there it might account for the commotion? (A.) It might have been part of it. I was inside the station." That is no doubt a true report of what passed at the police court, but before us, though pressed by Gerothwohl, the inspector did, after denying the use of the words in the sense he thought suggested by that gentleman, deny that he uttered those words. Why the Inspector should deny his having given such an answer as was suggested is not very clear, and seeing that Gerothwohl was reading from the transcript in his hand, the witness, whatever view be taken of his character, can hardly have intended to mislead us on the point. It looks as if he really did not think he had used the exact words put to him. The matter being cleared up by looking at the transcript there does not appear good ground for alleging that the commotion referred to by the Inspector was not the noise coming from Piccadilly.

In this connection, reference may be made to what P.C. Wellbelove said about shutting the door of the charge room. He told us that is his duty when a rather unusual crowd goes in, to shut the door, and that when he heard the shouting in the charge room he shut the door on that occasion.

More important, however, bearing upon the same point is the evidence of P.C. Divers. In cross-examination by the learned Counsel for the defendants at the police court, he said according to the shorthand note, "I saw nothing of the affair except that I took Timmings. The other two followed close. There was a great row, as the other two were violent." When P.C. Divers was before us he was cross-examined by Gerothwohl, from the shorthand note. The suggestion made was that at the police court in answer to the question, "Was there an awful row just as you were going to Vine Street," P.C. Divers had answered, "Apparently from the violence of the prisoners in trying to get away." Q. 1928. The answer he gave to that question before us was, "I think the question asked me was, 'Whether I thought it was inconsistent with your being arrested outside the station.' I think that was the question. You are referring now I believe to my cross-examination at the police court." The question being again put to him he said he could not quite follow what was meant. The constable then looked at the document from which Gerothwohl had been reading and said, "The question was asked me—'Was there an awful row just as you were going to Vine Street Station.' I understood that differently at the police court. The question I understood was—'Did you think the noise outside the station was inconsistent with Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette being arrested outside?' to which I replied, 'Apparently, from the violence of the prisoners in trying to get away.'" Mr. Rufus Isaacs then called attention to the next question and answer in the document which the witness had in his hand, saying: "The story now is that they were arrested in Piccadilly and tried to make their escape when they got to Vine Street. Your answer is 'I do not know, I only took Timmings to the station.'" The cross-examination being continued, P.C. Divers said he thought he heard an awful row coming from that direction—outside Vine Street, or Piccadilly it might be. Counsel for the Police before us then called attention to the fact that there was another question and answer in the shorthand note. "Was the row that you heard caused by their being arrested in Vine Street under protest? (A.) I do not think so." In Qs. 1933–answer to Mr. Dickinson the witness said "I heard a row outside. I was inside the 1938. station when I heard it. I thought it came from the direction outside in the street—in Vine Street—or from the direction of the passage which leads direct into Piccadilly, where the crowd would be at the time," and he said he thought it was quite likely it was such a row as to lead him to think that somebody was trying to avoid arrest. His answer to Mr. Dickinson, which was given with every appearance of frankness, seems to us probably quite accurate, and, if so, we may take it that an undoubtedly sober and competent observer in the charge-room did hear a noise which was like that which might be caused by a prisoner trying to get away. That it to some extent assists the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story is the case. It may be said that the kind of noise made by pushing a man forcibly up steps and along corridor is hardly distinguishable from the noise which might arise from forcibly preventing the man from escaping, and, therefore, that the "row" heard by P.C. Divers was caused by the setting on to and arrest of Gerothwohl and Lavalette. But the noise made by two constables and two prisoners in coming into the charge room would in any case be considerable. If that be so, the importance of the point seems very largely to disappear, because, if, indeed, the arrest of Gerothwohl and Lavalette did take place as described it was probably not attended by any great unusual noise; the whole success of the operation depended upon surprise, celerity, and such a use of force, that precluded anything in the nature of a struggle or a fight; in fact, there was not, according to Gerothwohl and Lavalette, any kind of struggle whatever; they became helpless in a moment, and the affair was so sudden that they only recovered breath and voice when in the dock. The worth of this criticism must obviously be matter of individual opinion, but on the whole our view is that the noise that P.C. Divers heard proceeded from some causes outside the station, unconnected with any produced by the arrival of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, whether in an orderly or a disorderly manner.

Indirect Corroboration afforded by what took place in the charge room.

Apart from what Timmings has told us there is no direct evidence to corroborate Gerothwohl and Lavalette's story. Though there were hundreds of people in Piccadilly and scores within a few yards of St. James's Place, and though great publicity had been given in the newspapers to the case in all its stages, no person unconnected with the affair who was in Piccadilly on this night came forward to give evidence for them. Whichever version of the story be true, the arrest of Timmings must, one would imagine, have been seen by some persons besides Gerothwohl and Lavalette, and if all three arrests took place in Piccadilly and the police story is true, it is almost certain that the incidents connected with them must have been observed by a great many persons in that street. However that may be, no one has volunteered to come forward to say what he saw. This circumstance does not strike us as being more in favour of the one version than the other. According to both accounts, Swallow Street and Vine Street were nearly empty, and it was not suggested by anyone before us that the procession of the six men concerned was attended by any crowd. It is true that P.C. Wellbelove said before Major Wodehouse that there was a large crowd following the other two prisoners, i.e., Gerothwohl and Lavalette, but not interfering with the police, that the crowd was such that he could not see whether the constables had hold of those two gentlemen, that the crowd was all round them, each side and behind, and that he dispersed the crowd. But no such statement was given in evidence by any witness before us, and it is evident the advisers of the police attached no credence to his statement, which was in contradiction to the evidence of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington.

It seems to us that it may be argued with some force that the behaviour and conduct of Gerothwohl and Lavalette in the dock, and especially the statements which they made when there, afford indirect confirmation of their allegation that they were arrested just outside Vine Street. Let us see exactly what their own evidence as to what took place in the charge room is. Gerothwohl said in the course of his examination before us, that when in the dock, just before the inspector
Q. 273. came in, he took out a piece of paper and wanted to take the numbers of the constables, and that Lavalette did the same. He did not mention it when giving his evidence in chief, but it is obvious, we think, that he means it was the first thing that he did, because he refers the action to the period just before the Inspector came in—that is just before he advanced from the doorway and passed before the prisoners in the dock. Gerothwohl began thus—"I saw Inspector Berry emerge from
Qs. 260–269. that room and walk to the desk, which is there. . . . Then I immediately began protesting and flourishing my card. I said 'I want it to be given to the inspector.' It was dealt with in this sort of way: 'We do not want your card.' I remember even the inspector said that himself. I went on flourishing my card and mentioned that I should write to the Provost of my University, and, of course, I was in a
Q. 260. great fury." "At that time I was holding the rail of the dock, and with my stick alongside. I was flourishing my card with the other hand. Police Constable C.R. 43
Q. 261. pulled my stick away and broke it deliberately across his knee. . . . . Then my card was eventually taken. I was asked my name and address. . . . . .
Q. 262. The policeman spoke to the inspector, but there was such a row at the station
Q. 263. that I really did not hear what was said. . . . I do not remember him saying
Q. 264. anything to us. He read the charge to us. . . . The charge was read out.
Q. 266. I heard something about drunk and disorderly. . . . I said we had come about
Q. 269. this third man Timmings. . . . I did not hear where" (i.e., where we were drunk and disorderly) "because there was an uproar in the place. There were a great many police constables in the station, and a great deal of chattering going on." That was what Gerothwohl told us in the course of his examination by the Chairman.

The following questions and answers in cross-examination should also be noted:—

Q. 486:—"After the stick incident you were protesting, were you not? (A.) Oh, yes, very warmly."

Q. 487:—"And protesting that you had not been disorderly, but that you had come to the station of your own accord to give information about Timmings? (A.) Yes."

Q. 488:—"That was the substance of your protest? (A.) That was the substance of my protest."

Q. 489:—"I suggest to you that the only ground of your protest was that you had not been disorderly in Piccadilly, and that you had come to the station of your own accord to assist Timmings? (A.) I did not put it at such length. I said we had come about this third man. I had not heard the constable's charge of being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly at that time."

Q. 490 :—"When you said that did the inspector turn to the constables and ask them as to where they had arrested you? (A.) It is very possible that he did. I would not swear that he did turn to them, but I think it is possible. He did say something to them. I do not know whether it was at that moment."

Q. 491 :—"Did they say in your hearing that you had been arrested on the pavement by St. James's Church in Piccadilly? (A.) I could not hear owing to the uproar there was."

Q. 492 :—"Who was creating the uproar? (A.) I was trying to flourish my card and give it to the inspector, and there were four policemen round the dock and so on."

Q. 493 :—"There was nobody there creating an uproar except yourself? (A.) Possibly, perhaps I had some ground."

Q. 494 :—"I am only trying to find out what the uproar was? (A.) They joined in."

Q. 495 :—"You really suggest that to the Commission, that the policemen joined in the uproar? (A.) I am putting it strongly, but when I was giving my card they talked as loud as I did."

Q. 496 :—"You say you did not hear what the constable said? (A.) No, because I was in such a state, wanting my card to be given to the inspector."

Q. 497 :—"After the inspector had questioned the constable about this point about which you were protesting, did he sit down then and take the charge down in writing? (A.) I could not say that, I do not know; I do not remember; very possibly he did."

Q. 498 :—"After he had taken something down on the charge sheet did he read it out to you? (A.) He read out the charge. I confess that in all this turmoil I did not hear much of it."

Q. 499 :—"You repeat again that there was a turmoil, but I suggest to you there was nobody making any turmoil there at all except yourself. This is what he wrote down at the time as the charge. He first of all gives your name. Had he taken the name from you? (A.) Yes, he asked us our names and addresses."

Q. 500 :—"Then he said 'All drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly, Parish of St. James's? (A.) I only heard the words 'drunk and disorderly.'"

Q. 501 :—"Is it not the fact that when he read that out to you you said nothing? (A.) I should think if I had I should have been howled down."

Q. 502 :—"Who by? (A.) By their refusing to take my card and pooh-poohing, and saying 'We do not want your card.' I am trying to give you an impression of the sort of uproar I mean to imply. I saw it was useless."

Q. 503 :—"The fact is that when the inspector read that out to you you said nothing? (A.) I said nothing then because I thought it was absolutely useless from the way they had been treating us."

So much for Gerothwohl's evidence on this point.

Lavalette gave his initial account in the following words :—"I was absolutely dazed in the dock. There I found Timmings and Dr. Gerothwohl. I was in the middle between the two. Then I heard Dr. Gerothwohl say 'Allow me to explain,' and he took his card and he passed me and he took hold of the railing like this —(illustrating)—and held it as he passed. He was rather nervous naturally. I saw Constable 43 get near the dock, and he took his stick and broke it across his knee. I tried to explain why we had come, and that at the door of the police station we had been set upon by the police. I said that at the station. I was so excited that I may not have heard what was said, but I know there was some noise in the court. There were about eight to twelve policemen there. We heard Constable 43 say something and we saw Inspector Berry taking down notes. Finally Inspector Berry said: 'Mr. Lavalette, Dr. Gerothwohl, and Timmings, you are charged with being drunk and disorderly.' Dr. Gerothwohl said 'Do you really think me drunk?' and the reply was 'Yes.' I spoke French at the time. We were then put out of the dock. I may say that the idea of taking a card was not very favourably looked Q. 825, &c upon by the inspector, who said 'We do not want the card.' All right. Who are you? What is your name?' and so on; in fact, we were not treated as we should have been. Then we left the dock. Dr. Gerothwohl then said to the constable 'I want to see a doctor.' Then I heard him say something, but there was very great excitement at the time, and I cannot say exactly what he said." In his cross-examination, after saying that he had a stick when he went in but he did not recollect being asked for it when he was in the dock, he said that the stick was on the table when he got into the dock. Then he was asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes "Were you also very excited when you were in the room?" and he replied "Very." In answer to Mr. Bankes he further replied that he said "I have come here to give my name in favour of this fellow when I was seized by that gentleman" (meaning Wallington). "Then I found myself here. I designated Wallington as that gentleman who pushed me into the police station as he got hold of or set upon me. I said to Inspector Berry that I had been assaulted at the door of the station."

Qs. 902–904.

Q. 907.

Qs. 936–938.

The material allegations that, as we understand, Gerothwohl and Lavalette ask us to believe as to what took place in the charge-room seem to be:—

(i.) That Inspector Berry did not maintain order in the charge-room, but allowed the constables present to talk and shout so loudly that in consequence of their clamour the prisoners did not have a reasonable opportunity of explaining how they came to be in the dock.

(ii.) That their excitement was caused simply by the personal outrage of which they had been the victims, and

(iii.) That notwithstanding the noise they did complain that they had been coming to the station to speak on Timmings' behalf and been arrested on the way to the station, that is that at the first opportunity they complained of the alleged assault and illegal arrest.

As to the first of these allegations there is a direct conflict of evidence. As to the third allegation there is no considerable divergence in the statements of the parties, while our view of the second must depend on the inference which we draw from the proved facts.

Alleged Disorder in the Charge-Room.

The police witnesses all deny that the description of their behaviour in the charge-room given by the complainants is true. Passing by the evidence of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington at present as being that of the most deeply implicated, constables, we find that P.C. Divers, whom, as we have indicated, we regard as a trustworthy witness, in answer to Mr. Eldon Bankes' question, "Was there anybody doing anything that could be described as commotion except Dr. Gerothwohl?" replied "I think not." He added that if there was any commotion it was of Gerothwohl's own creation; and that there was no one else there who was doing anything, either talking loudly or creating a commotion of any sort, except Dr. Gerothwohl himself. The only other question and answer which is to be found in his evidence, and which bears on the charge room scene, is the following:—

Qs. 2043 2044

Q. 1877:—"Did you hear Dr. Gerothwohl say anything? (A.) He was very excited while in the dock, and was making use of some words or other, but what they were or what they were about I could not say."

It is Inspector Berry who is the most important witness as to this part of the case, because he is the only one not directly concerned in anything which took place outside the station. It is reasonable to think that he approached the taking of the charge against these prisoners in just the same disinterested frame of mind as that which he seems to have displayed in dealing with those already made before him. For what took place before the prisoners were brought in he has no direct responsibility, and prima facie he may not unreasonably ask us to presume that he discharged his duty as officer in command of the station as honestly and efficiently in regard to this matter as in regard to the numerous other cases that came before him on this Saturday night. But of course it cannot be denied that the allegations of the complainants as to the conduct of the proceedings in the charge room gravely affect him. His general description of the scene in that room after the arrival of the three prisoners is as follows:—"They were put in the dock, and Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr.

Lavalette were in a very excited state, Dr. Gerothwohl particularly. He was throwing his arms about; he had his stick in one hand, holding it by the middle, and he shouted out something about that he was coming to the station on behalf of the other man, indicating Timmings, who stood in the dock. I asked the constable what the charge was. Isaacson said he saw them arm-in-arm in Piccadilly, drunk, shouting, and pushing people off the footway. I said, 'You hear what they say about being arrested on their way to the station. Where were they arrested?' Isaacson said they were Q. 2148.

That is all to be gathered from the inspector's evidence as to the way in which the two prisoners were conducting themselves, and as to their action in the dock. But the more important part of the inspector's evidence dealing with the charge room proceedings turns upon what he heard them say, and what inferences he drew from their remarks of protest or complaint. Upon this point the following questions and answers are worthy of attention :—

By Mr. Bankes :—

Q. 2172 :—"From what these gentlemen said you understood they were protesting about their arrest, because they were coming to the station of their own accord and were not disorderly. Did you understand that they were protesting on the ground that they were not under the influence of drink? (A.) No, I did not."

By Gerothwohl :—

Q. 2286 :—"Do you remember me flourishing my card in order that it might be given to you? (A.) Yes."

Q. 2359 :—"You heard our protest? (A.) About the way you were arrested."

By Chairman :—

Q. 2397 :—"Now, I am going to read a sentence from your report: 'As in my opinion they were all drunk, I did not place any credence in the allegations made by the two former prisoners respecting their arrests, and they were all charged accordingly.' The allegation, I think, is the allegation that they were going to the station to speak for Timmings? (A.) No—as to the way they were arrested."

Q. 2398 :—"'In the dock Gerothwohl stated that he and Lavalette were coming to station to hand in their cards on behalf of Timmings and were arrested when on way here.' That is, I take it, the allegation you refer to in the extract I have read? (A.) Yes."

By Mr. Rufus Isaacs :—

Q. 2585 :—"You understood it was, because you have told us here to-day that they protested, and not to waste time over this, inspector, did you not quite understand from the protest they made and repeated that their point was that they were wrongly arrested, and they had come to the police station in order to give evidence on behalf of Timmings? (A.) Yes."

Q. 2588 :—"I wish you would explain what you mean as to that. You told us that the moment they were in the dock they protested against having been arrested and where they were arrested, and they also said they had come to speak on behalf of Timmings. You understood that as a protest against being charged with any misconduct, did you not? (A.) I understood they were protesting against being brought there."

Q. 2594 :—"If that is the case, I should like to know what you mean by saying that you did not understand, as you told us on the last occasion that they were protesting that they were not under the influence of drink. Is not that a mistake on your part? Let me read you what you said? (A.) As regards the drunkenness, I do not understand they made any protest from beginning to end."

Q. 2599 :—"What part of it did you think they were protesting against? (A.) The particular place at which they were arrested."

By Mr. Dickinson :—

Q. 2698 :—"Did you see Dr. Gerothwohl offer you his card before that? (A.) Yes, I did; it was the same card that he was offering."

Q. 2699 :—"He was offering his card to you the whole time? (A.) Yes."

Q. 2700 :—"Why did you not take his card the moment he offered it to you? (A.) I myself was too far away to take it. It was taken within a very few seconds after, and the constable handed it over to me. He apparently did not want the constable to handle it. He wanted to give it to me himself. As a matter of fact, I was too far away, and if he had given it to the constable it would have been taken much sooner."

We have now called attention to all the portions of the evidence which have any important bearing upon what took place in the charge room. It does not enable us to arrive at an absolutely complete account of all the events that took place or the order in which they occurred, but still it enables us to form a fairly clear picture of the scene and to come to a sound conclusion as to what really took place.

Having examined the evidence, let us see how far the general account of Gerothwohl and Lavalette as to the scene in the charge room is likely to be accurate. The general inference which they ask us to believe is that the scene presented was of a somewhat extraordinary character, something like this :—In the dock a small weak prisoner weeping piteously; another prisoner gesticulating and shouting first in French and then in English; a third also shouting and flourishing his arms and vainly proffering his card, and moving from one position in the dock to another; ten or twelve or fifteen constables looking on "howling down" the shouts of the prisoners by the uproar made by their stentorian voices all raised at once; one constable forcibly snatching a stick from the hand of one of the prisoners and "deliberately" breaking it across his knee; an inspector carelessly sitting at his desk "pooh, poohing" the proffered card, and taking no pains to quell the disturbance. That is the kind of mental picture of the charge room proceedings which they presented to us. Can it be true? Can anything like it be true? At 12.10 a.m. G. G., a beggar, is brought in by P.C. Sennitt; he is regularly dealt with by Inspector Berry; all is orderly; Vine Street is practically empty save for the approaching procession of Timmings and the rest; then just as gaoler Walsey is taking G. to the cells Timmings arrives, and then Gerothwohl and Lavalette come upon the scene, and then in a moment the room is filled up; there is weeping and shouting in the dock, and ten or fifteen constables are drowning by their noise the protests of the indignant prisoners. It is evident to us that, whatever may be the truth as to the arrest of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, there is gross exaggeration in all this. Take the allegation as to the number of constables present. It is, as we have seen, as nearly certain as anything can be as to a point of the kind, that there were not more than five constables in the room when Inspector Randall came in a second time and saw the three prisoners in the dock. Gerothwohl multiplied the number of constables by three, and Lavalette by two. By reducing the number of constables present to the correct figures we have left only the gaoler who was attending to his duties, and perhaps P.C. Sennitt, with the three policemen concerned with the prisoners then in the dock. That four constables could make a great deal of noise if they tried is no doubt true. Whether they could have howled down Gerothwohl and Lavalette is not so certain, even if Inspector Berry gave them the opportunity of doing so. But there is no cause suggested for this misbehaviour on their part. If indeed

P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington had just been guilty of the alleged wrong one does not see why they should be shouting at all. It seems to us it was P.C. Isaacson's cue to keep as calm as possible and to watch the turn of events. That he spoke loudly and authoritatively we are ready to believe, and that P.C. Wallington joined in the conversation is likely enough, but that they or P.C. Divers did so noisily, or that Inspector Berry would have permitted them to do so, seems to us highly improbable. The wanton breaking of Gerothwohl's stick, again, is a thing that arrests one's attention; it appears a thing very unlikely to have happened, and yet Gerothwohl and Lavalette seem to have no more doubt that in fact it did happen than that earlier in the evening they had listened to a temperance lecturer in Soho. This stick incident we examine below as part of a criticism of the whole story put forward, and we will only anticipate what we there say by observing that careful reflection as to this part of the story leads us to reject the allegation as to the intentional breaking of the stick as too improbable to be entertained.

In our opinion, Gerothwohl and Lavalette's acccount as to this part of the story is exaggerated and inaccurate in several important respects; and that conclusion is confirmed by a little bit of evidence that came out before us quite incidentally, and, one may say, accidentally. It so happened that Dr. Mitchell had been called in to examine a prisoner, F. F., who had been brought in five minutes before Timmings, on a charge of being drunk and disorderly, and at the time Timmings was brought in the doctor was in the Inspector's office making his entry as to that case in the Occurrence Book. Having finished that he went out into Q. 3196 the charge room; and he tells us that he saw three men in the dock. Though he could not swear as to their identity, it is obvious they must have been Timmings, Gerothwohl and Lavalette; he says there were three men there, and there was a stick, and the stick was broken in the struggle. We are not referring to this statement of Dr. Mitchell with a view to raising the question of how the stick came to be broken, but as showing that the Gerothwohl and Lavalette picture of the condition of the charge room can hardly be true, unless we are to suppose that Dr. Mitchell is deliberately suppressing what he saw. In fact, he went from the Inspector's office, passed through the charge room while the three prisoners were in the dock, and he went to his own place, and in the ordinary manner, without seeing anything particularly unusual in the charge room. If in fact there had been twelve or fifteen constables there it would have been rather difficult for him to get through easily, and certainly if they were all engaged in howling down the prisoners his attention would undoubtedly have been attracted to what we cannot help thinking must have appeared to him an entirely unusual state of things.

We may state here that in none of the communications made to us, and in none of the cases inquired into by us, except the one now under consideration, was any complaint or suggestion made of the kind of disorder in a charge-room alleged by Gerothwohl and Lavalette to have taken place at Vine Street when they were being charged. Nor have we been able to discover in the course of our Inquiry any instance in which a prisoner has complained of being silenced by clamour or not allowed by the Inspector an opportunity of being heard.

Disregarding the denials of the incriminated constables, and assuming, for the sake of argument, that they are men likely to be guilty of all the misconduct alleged, the more we reflect upon this matter the more convinced we are that the representation given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette of what happened in the charge room on this evening while they were in the dock is wholly exaggerated and distorted. It does not, of course, follow from that that their description of their own mental state as recollected by them is equally faulty and inaccurate. Their recollection may be right enough as to that, and, if so, it is clearly shown that they were in a condition of some mental confusion, whatever may have been its cause. It is agreed that the two prisoners were very excited, shouting out and protesting loudly. But there was absolutely nothing extraordinary in that, and it is clear the charge was regularly taken; it may be, as we have indicated above, that P.C. Isaacson was talking very loudly, and we daresay that Inspector Berry did the same, and that the proceedings were not conducted with so much quietude as they usually are in a Court of Justice.

We think, therefore, we may take it as ascertained that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not howled down by the constables, but had a reasonable opportunity, if they themselves had been calm enough to take advantage of it, of telling their full and detailed story to the Inspector, the very man indeed whom they tell us they wished to see.

The Excitement of the Complainants.

We understand that the argument which Gerothwohl and Lavalette suggest to us is that their mental excitement was solely due to the illegal arrest and force of which they had just been the victims, and that this phenomenon itself shows that they had been subjected to the ill-treatment alleged. The validity of that argument depends upon the proposition that the sudden outrage they describe was under all the circumstances the only or most probable cause of their excitement.

That they were not drunk we know, and if we were certain that they were calm and orderly in Piccadilly, the fact that Gerothwohl and Lavelette immediately after they were placed in the dock behaved like furiously angry men, would strongly tend to show that something unusual must have happened before they were placed in the dock, and to that extent would afford corroboration of their account of a sudden attack just outside the entrance to the station. The whole force of the reasoning depends upon its being shown that there was no cause for the mental excitement other than the occurrence of this sudden attack. Until we are quite convinced that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were in no way excited from drink or other cause when they started from Piccadilly there seems to us to be very little in the point. That their mental state in the dock is consistent with their story is obvious; but it is not inconsistent with that of the police. Sudden arrest in Piccadilly may have caused it. The excitement of men arrested is often suppressed for a time and only becomes such as to give complete vent to itself when the full consequences of their predicament are brought home to them.

Nor are we sure that the kind of excitement displayed by the complainants was of the character that we should expect in men who had just been taken by surprise as alleged. Gerothwohl was in a great fury. That is his own description of his mental state. Emotions of anger and indignation undoubtedly upset one's mental balance, affect the soundness of one's judgment, and often involve complete loss of self-control. Angry and indignant men do things and say things which in calmer moments they would not do and say, even if their own feelings are justified by adequate cause; but we naturally ask ourselves, are such emotions likely to impair the senses to such an extent that you believe you see fifteen constables where there are only five, that you are being howled down by other people when you are really the only person howling, or that you see another man deliberately breaking a stick across his knee, when, in fact, it had been broken in the course of its being snatched from your hand? It is not a point upon which we ought to dogmatise, but our impression is that anger and indignation alone are hardly causes for such illusions. Again, the utterance of threats of vengeance or punishment, is the commonest forms that excitement due to anger produces, but is it usual that a threat should be of a futile and childish character? That was so according to his own account in Gerothwohl's case. He positively thought that he could frighten Inspector Berry by saying that he would write to the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin. Does that look like the threat of a man of twenty-seven whose mind is unbalanced simply by anger? It may be so, but it seems strange.

The matter must be left there. The suggestions which we have made in the course of these observations are matters which we must consider in connection with all the other facts which are proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

Admissions of Inspector Berry.

Let us now see how the evidence stands as to what Gerothwohl and Lavalette said as to their arrest, and what they really conveyed by their words to the Inspector.

Both gentlemen are quite in accord as to the cause of their giving up their intention of going home in a "bus" and going to Vine Street; and when they started from Piccadilly their intention was to complain, not about the fact of Timmings being arrested but about the brutal manner in which it was effected, and that when they got to the entrance to Vine Street Station they were arrested under the circumstances which have been more than once stated. Let us ask ourselves what, supposing that they had been entirely calm, they would have said, when they found that the tables were so suddenly and adroitly turned upon them, to the Inspector, who was the very man whom they wished to see. They would have assuredly told their story much as they told it to us, and the two main points as to which they would give information to the Inspector would be the fact that Timmings had been brutally ill-treated, and that they had been arrested at the very entrance to Vine Street Station just as they were coming in voluntarily to tell the Inspector what they had seen of that ill-treatment. We think there is no doubt that, notwithstanding the excitement under which they were labouring (whatever may have been the real and effective cause of it), they did use expressions while in the dock which show that both these ideas were in their minds. How far they succeeded in conveying to Inspector Berry precisely what they intended to say is another question. It is a little odd that Gerothwohl's evidence is the less precise upon this point. If the evidence which we have just set forth is looked at, the effect of what he tells us is that he was "protesting" that he had come to the station of his own accord to give information about this third man Timmings. That was the substance of his protest. We cannot find that he anywhere stated that Timmings had been brutally treated, or that he himself had been arrested on the way to the police station or on the steps of the police station, or any precise words of the kind. Lavalette said that he tried to explain why they had come, and that at the door of the police station they had been set upon by the police, and, according to his recollection, he did in fact succeed in saying so. Neither alleges that he told anything like a detailed or consecutive story of what had taken place, nor, if their view of what occurred in the station is correct, was it possible for them to do so.

The important thing for us at the present moment is not so much what these gentlemen think they said but what the police witnesses admit that they heard them say. Neither P.C. Isaacson nor P.C. Divers gives us any specific information as to the words or phrases used by the two prisoners. The most important answer given by P.C. Wallington on the point is that to Q. 1639, namely, that Gerothwohl said he was on the way to the station to complain of the brutality of the police when he was arrested and pushed up the steps, though subsequent answers indicate that he did not really understand that the complaint was of brutality to Timmings in particular. In that answer we obviously have the two elements that one would expect to find in the complete statement if the prisoners were either calm enough to make or had the opportunity of making it, namely, a complaint of brutality and of being arrested on the steps of the station. We have considered very carefully the evidence given by Inspector Berry, which has just been set out above, and, so far as we can see, there is nothing at all in it that can be taken as an admission that he heard anything about brutality of the police or brutality of the police in the treatment of Timmings. But though that is so as to the literal use of the word "brutal" or "brutality," he did not say anything before us to qualify his statement before the magistrate that they (Gerothwohl and Lavalette) "said they were coming to speak about Timmings being badly treated." The clearest admission made by the inspector was that contained in his report where he says :—"In the dock Gerothwohl stated that he and Lavalette were coming to station to hand in their cards on behalf of Timmings and were arrested on way here." That statement was admitted by him in his evidence before us, and we do not think that the admissions made by him can be carried any further than that. If so, according to Inspector Berry, the effect of the words spoken by the two prisoners, so far as he gathered them, was (1) That they were coming to the station on behalf of, or to give their cards for, Timmings; and (2) That they were arrested on the way to the station. It cannot, therefore, be said that Inspector Berry heard anything said by the prisoners from which he was necessarily bound to infer that they had been arrested at the entrance to, or on the steps of, the station. This, of course, may be perfectly consistent with P.C. Wallington's answer that he heard Gerothwohl say that he was arrested and pushed up the steps. Under the circumstances he may have caught a phrase that the inspector failed to hear or vice versa. It seems that one may properly conclude that when he took the charge the inspector knew well enough that Gerothwohl alleged that he and his friend had been arrested while coming to the station, either to make some complaint as to the treatment of Timmings or to give evidence in his favour. Further than that we do not think we ought to go. We cannot say that Inspector Berry admitted that he understood that the prisoners meant they had been arrested at the entrance to the station. He himself told us that if he had understood the protest to mean that he would have made inquiries upon the subject.

In considering the view which we ought to take of the inspector's conduct we shall have to return to this point. Here we have to consider the bearing of his admission upon the question we are now considering, namely, the place of arrest. Without putting the matter too high, we think it may be alleged that it affords forcible corroboration of the complainants' statement that they were arrested at the entrance to the station. It may be urged on their behalf that the moment Gerothwohl arrived, confused and furious, in the dock, and recovered his breath he used words, incoherently it may be, but still unmistakeably indicating that he and his friend had just been set upon and wrongly arrested while on the way to the station to say a word on behalf of a third prisoner; that the allegation that the police had committed a gross outrage was not a mere afterthought, and that the story told with circumstance at the police court was not a fabrication made with the object of extricating themselves from the scrape into which they had got with some credit to themselves as the defenders of public liberty against the tyranny of the Force. The argument may be pushed further. It may be said that if the police story be true, if they had been disorderly in Piccadilly and arrested there, there was absolutely no reason why the notion that they had been set upon on the way to the station should have occurred to their minds, since the mere fact of their saying they were not arrested in Piccadilly would not help them at all under the circumstances; that, according to the police account, though excited, they had been proceeding to the station quietly; and that, making every allowance for any extra excitement that may have resulted from the full realisation of their position when they were placed in the dock, there was absolutely no reason for their sudden and violent protestation that they had been arrested while on the way to the station unless something of the kind had happened. It is not necessary to pursue the argument because its strength is very obvious, and it does seem when put thus to be a very strong point indeed in favour of their allegation.

But let us consider a little more closely the weight to be allowed to this argument. Stated baldly, it comes to this:—Gerothwohl asserted while in the dock that he and Lavalette had been arrested, not in Piccadilly, but while on the way to the station to speak on behalf of Timmings; and therefore it is probable that he was arrested while on the way to the station. The ground of the probabilty which it is sought to deduce from Gerothwohl's assertion is, that there could, under the circumstances, have been no reason for Gerothwohl's inventing a lie or no possibility of his making a mistake as to the place of arrest. Why, it may be asked, should Gerothwohl have thought of protesting that he was arrested near the station if it were not the case?

Though it is admitted by the police witnesses that he did make the assertion that he and Lavalette were arrested while on the way to the station, its truth is denied by them. We are here face to face with the main issue, and we must recognise the possibility that Gerothwohl's statement in the dock may have been a mere invention. In considering that possibility we ask ourselves was there any motive for his telling a lie? Assuming the police case to be true as to the place of arrest, whether he and Lavalette had or had not foolishly joined in the disorder his position was a decidedly awkward one for a University teacher. He knew he was sober and may have felt no doubt as to getting off on that head, but he may have too readily concluded that simple denial of the disorder as against the word of constables was not a defence likely to be accepted by a magistrate. In custody, rapidly reviewing his predicament during the walk from Piccadilly to Vine Street, he may have hit upon the notion that it would be well to take the line that he and his friend were unjustly arrested because they were coming to the station to complain of the police. It may be said that such a suggestion in the case of a man of Gerothwohl's admittedly good character is extremely unlikely, and we see the force of the observation; but we at the same time have to bear in mind that men usually honest and men usually wise, when suddenly placed in situations of difficulty and embarrassment which may affect their reputations and their careers, do upon impulse very unwise and sometimes dishonest things. We also have to remember that to accept the truth of Gerothwohl's assertion involves our finding that two constables whose characters stand as high as those of himself and Lavalette have undoubtedly committed perjury. We have, however, not to decide the question thus raised by reference only to the evidence as to the charge-room proceedings, but upon all the material before us.

We must add too that if Gerothwohl's assertion in the dock was untrue in fact, it is possible that he may have made it under a mistake due to mental excitement. If from a combination of causes, Gerothwohl and Lavalette were already in an excited and somewhat hysterical condition, then it may be that they mistook the increased pressure caused by the constables rapidly guiding them up the steps, along the corridor and into the dock, for a violent and forcible arrest. It is not unusual for an arresting constable when he has brought his prisoner to the door of the station to tighten his grip, because experience shows that even a quiet prisoner on reaching the door of what may become a prison often exhibits a certain reluctance to go further which may end in an attempt to escape. Some support is afforded to the suggestion that they may have been mistaken as to the character of what took place on their arrival at the entrance by a careful examination of their description of the attack on them in the light of what we know about the number of constables in the charge room at the time. The conclusion one is forced to come to is that in the description of the attack as in regard to several other parts of the story there is exaggeration on the part of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, and we ought not therefore to overlook the possibility that they may be mistaken as to the extent of the force with which they were pushed up the steps and into the charge room. There is no allegation at all of any blow being struck; their hats do not appear to have been jerked off; they retained their sticks—at least Gerothwohl did; Lavalette's clothes were not disarranged; Gerothwohl said his collar was damaged, but only so slightly that he was able to put it right before leaving the station or on the way to Kensington. These considerations all tend to weaken the argument founded on their statements in the dock.

That argument seems to us the strongest that can be urged in favour of the complainants, but we cannot determine its real weight until we have fully examined and criticised their story.

Police Case as to the Place of Arrest.

The police meet the complainants' case with a categorical denial of all the material incidents alleged from the moment at which Gerothwohl and Lavalette first saw Timmings to that at which they were placed in the dock, and set up a counter case which is shortly summarised at the commencement of these observations.

In considering the issue as to the place of arrest we get no sure assistance from the evidence of P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, and P.C. Wellbelove, since as to that point it simply amounts to a contradiction of the complainants' case and an affirmation that the latter were arrested in Piccadilly; and we can find no satisfactory ground from our observation of their demeanour in the witness-box or from anything which came out during their examination before us for believing them in preference to Gerothwohl and Lavalette. Besides, they are the men who are most directly incriminated.

In dealing with the issue as to the place of arrest, we therefore think it well for the moment to put on one side their statements as being data which cannot in an inquiry like ours be allowed in the first instance to lessen such strength as the substantive case of a complainant may possess.

The evidence of P.C. Divers, however, on this point is of the greatest importance. Q. 1859, &c.
He told us that when he left his patrol in Sackville Street, he went to the assistance of his comrades in Piccadilly, that P.C. Isaacson handed over Timmings to him there, and that he thereupon took his prisoner alone to the station through Swallow Street without seeing any other arrest effected. If that is true the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story is contradicted in a most material particular, as both gentlemen are positive that they followed P.C. Isaacson and Timmings right up to the entrance of the station, and saw another constable (P.C. Divers) take hold of Timmings at the corner of Swallow Street and Piccadilly. That P.C. Divers was perfectly sober and took no part in the arrest of Gerothwohl or Lavalette are unquestioned facts. If his statements are true, he behaved in strict accordance with his duty as laid down in the regulations; if he acted as Gerothwohl and Lavalette say, he was guilty of a breach of discipline for which the ascertained circumstances disclose no sufficiently strong motive. The only interest that he could have had in giving false evidence was a possible desire to shield his fellow constables if they had been guilty of misconduct, for he was in no way incriminated by the allegations of the complainants. The only plausible suggestion which can be made against his veracity is that a feeling of comradeship induced him to perjure himself. We are not inclined to minimise the strength of the inducement or of the esprit de corps which exists among the police. If he had been giving evidence for the first time in the matter before us when the case had become notorious and everyone seemed to feel that the police of the C Division were on their trial, we should certainly have felt bound to look upon his evidence with some suspicion. But two things lessen the suspicion which might be reasonably felt as to his evidence. First, his statement as to the handing over of Timmings to his care is confirmed by that prisoner, though he puts the place of the handing over "at the top of Swallow Street," and not the corner of that street and Piccadilly. Secondly, P.C. Divers gave at the Police Court, on Wednesday, the 11th April, precisely the same evidence that he gave before us. No reports, it should be noted, had then been called for and they were not made till two days afterwards, i.e., on the 13th April.

Criticism on Gerothwohl and Lavalette's Story.

Before deciding what weight we ought to give to P.C. Divers' evidence, and before finally weighing and comparing both stories, it seems well to examine Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's story with a view to considering its probability as a whole, and in detail by reference to the ascertained facts of this particular controversy, and in the light of one's knowledge of human nature and experience of life. That is always a legitimate course to pursue when one has to choose between two contradictory narratives.

Q. 259. The moment we commence to apply to the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story the test of probability, taking it exactly as presented by them, we find difficulties in the way of its acceptance which it seems to us are not easily to be removed.

The story starts badly. Gerothwohl and Lavalette were proceeding down Piccadilly in order to take their 'bus home, and when they got as far as the church, P.C. Isaacson "pushed past them quickly and then roughly pushed" and arrested "a young man walking quietly with his hands in his overcoat pockets in front of them by the side of the kerb." There was no crowd round them, though there was a crowding "a good many yards ahead," and "people were very rowdy behind." It was not the fact, but the method of arrest that attracted the attention of Gerothwohl and Lavalette. It is the fact of the arrest under such circumstances more than the manner of its accomplishment that attracts ours, for we must confess that it appears to us extraordinary that a sober and experienced police constable like P.C. Isaacson, with scores of persons, as it seems, "shouting and booing" within a few yards of him to choose from, should suddenly pounce upon this small and inoffensive pedestrian as the object of his unpleasant attention. It is surely very unlikely that the affair really commenced like that. That P.C. Isaacson "pushed" past Gerothwohl and Lavalette, much as the former says, is probable enough, and is quite consistent with what he himself said. If Timmings was walking quietly alone P.C. Isaacson's action seems so wanton that one finds it difficult to believe it. What motive can be suggested for such an obvious neglect, or for such a ridiculously inefficient way of doing his real duty? It can hardly be that he was afraid, and that, feeling it incumbent upon him to arrest somebody so as to make it appear that he was zealously doing his duty he seized upon a man whom it was obviously quite easy to arrest, for the police constable's sheet shows commendations of so many acts of bravery as to make any suggestion of cowardice quite untenable. Can it have been bad temper? Hardly, for nothing appears to have occurred to annoy him or P.C. Wallington or the police in general. Lavalette told us his opinion then was "that the police were doing their work well and patiently." Gerothwohl testifies Q. 852. that they appeared to be very efficient, and they appeared to be doing what they could to restrain the people; they were smiling; they had "the genial smile which is characteristic of the London bobby," and were "taking it" (that is the disorder) "very Q. 598. indulgently so far as they could."

In all cases of this kind great attention should be paid to the commencement of the affair. Gerothwohl and Lavalette can hardly, if they were quite calm, and if they had the opportunity of observing, be mistaken as to the circumstances under which Timmings was arrested. What they tell us, however, as to that arrest seems singularly unconvincing, and their account of the matter is the first improbability which we noticed about their case.

The Alleged Brutality.

There is another point closely connected with that which we have just considered which deserves attention. We can discover nothing which clearly shows that Timmings, however he was handled by P.C. Isaacson, was really hurt by his treatment; there is no allegation by anyone that he was bruised or wounded. Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings himself go no further than to say that he was pushed; and having regard to the fact that he was recovering from an illness and, in the opinion which we have formed, also under the influence of liquor, we think a very slight touch might cause him to fall down. However that may be, it did not strike us, when listening to Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's account that the conduct of the police officer could possibly be described as brutal, or as necessarily implying the use of force greater than was reasonable under the circumstances for the purpose of apprehension.

The matter is not without importance, for it must be borne in mind that it was the exceeding brutality of P.C. Isaacson's attack on the young man quietly walking before them that attracted Gerothwohl and Lavalette's attention, aroused their surprise and indignation and induced them to decide to go to the station to give their cards to the Inspector. The fact of the arrest simpliciter may have surprised them, but as they do not affect to have heard anything the constable said they could not know for what the quiet young man was being arrested, and, under the circumstances, they could have hardly thought that the charge was one of being drunk and disorderly; for Timmings appeared to them to be quite sober. It was the manner of the arrest which led them to think that they ought to make a report to the constable's superior officer. We confess that by Gerothwohl and Lavalette's own account the occasion seems somewhat trivial. As we have said there was no blow with the fist and no bruise or wound was produced, and, what is more significant still, it is not said by anyone that Timmings cried out as if in pain. Timmings himself before us and in his conversation in the cell referred to his treatment in what we should think mild language, if indeed he had any real complaint against the way in which his apprehension was effected. Before us the impression left on our minds was that the real complaint was of the injustice of the arrest. However, it should be noticed that in the cell he said, according to Gerothwohl, "that he felt very ill because he had been thrown. He was ill before but that made him worse—something to that affect." Gerothwohl said he heard Timmings "simply say that he had been hurt by his fall. I heard him say something to that effect in the cell." Q. 391. When categorically asked whether Timmings complained in his (Gerothwohl's) hearing of any of the police constables he said (be it noted not quite consistently) "No; he was weeping all the time, and I heard him apologise." That may perhaps and Q. 392. probably does refer to Timmings' conduct in the dock or in the cell. Timmings' own account of the conversation in the cell is not quite the same and certainly he makes little of the "push" and the consequences. Asked if he had a conversation with Gerothwohl he said: "Yes, he asked me if I was hurt, and I told him not much to make a fuss about, but I felt a little pain." Then he added: "I also told him about Qs. 3495 to the illness when we got to know each other. I told him it was more illness than 3497 drunkenness, and that the constable had made a mistake." That looks to us as though it were Gerothwohl who was suggesting to Timmings that he had been badly treated, and not Timmings, who was of his own motion complaining of ill-treatment. Certainly what was uppermost in Timmings' mind was the arrest itself and not the way in which the police-constable effected it.

Taking the whole of the evidence on this point into consideration it seems that P.C. Isaacson cannot have been guilty of any such treatment of Timmings as could with any propriety be called "brutal." If that be so, the reason given for their intended remonstrance to the inspector by the complainants is certainly not a very strong one.

Intervention of P.C. Divers.

There is another feature of the complainants' story which invites criticism, and that is what we may call the intervention of P.C. Divers. Very great importance attaches to this point. In the ordinary course of duty only one police officer is supposed to be required to take a prisoner to the station, and it is only one who is required to make the charge. No officer on duty, whether on point duty, or on beat, or on patrol duty, is allowed to leave his point, beat or patrol without adequate cause. If the account given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette be true, and the police officers concerned did their duty in the ordinary way, P.C. Isaacson, who had effected the arrest, would simply himself have marched the prisoner off to the station, for there is no suggestion of any interference by any one with him, or of any crowd following, or of any likelihood of attempted rescue. Neither P.C. Wallington nor any other officer in Piccadilly could without breach of discipline have accompanied him to the station and into the charge room. If Gerothwohl and Lavalette's story is true then not only P.C. Divers but also P.C. Wallington was guilty of a serious breach of duty.

Let us consider the point more closely. P.C. Divers is a young constable who, however, had had at this time about two and a half years' experience. It cannot be suggested, therefore, that he had not had ample opportunity of learning the elementary duties of his business. P.C. Divers seemed to be a constable of more than ordinary intelligence; he spoke with a clearness above the average; and he gave us the impression of being a very capable officer. He must well have known (it is almost idle to suggest that he did not) the rule as to leaving his beat. His defaulters' sheet is clean, and we certainly thought him on the whole the best witness who came before us in this case to give evidence on crucial points except Sherrington. As to the question whether Gerothwohl, Lavalette, and Timmings were arm-in-arm when the last was arrested, whether P.C. Isaacson used unnecessary violence in Timmings' arrest, and whether Gerothwohl and Lavalette were arrested in Vine Street, he could not say anything consistently with his own description of the way he came upon the scene. According to him (and there is no contradiction upon the matter) he had been on point duty (i.e., regulating traffic, etc.) from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m., and then he was told off to take up a patrol at Sackville Street, and his duty under that order was to walk up and down that street. From a little after 10, when he took up that duty, down to a few minutes past midnight he had been patrolling Sackville Street. At that time a great noise in Piccadilly attracted his attention. Having regard to the fact that it was a Saturday night, and the consequently crowded condition of the streets, it was his duty to observe and to see if his aid was required for keeping order. If he came to the conclusion that the police in Piccadilly required assistance, even though not summoned by police whistle, it would be his duty to go to their assistance. He tells us that in the exercise of his discretion hearing the noise he went down to the corner of Sackville Street and observed; and seeing what was taking place he went from the corner of Sackville Street to cross Piccadilly diagonally; and as soon as he got on the opposite side of the road, just opposite the Church, before he got on to the path P.C. Isaacson handed over to him Timmings, and he took him to the station. He saw nothing of any other arrest. We know it is common ground that P.C. Divers did accompany Timmings to the police station, but the complainants and Timmings do not agree as to the place at which P.C. Divers first came into contact with Timmings. It is, of course, of the essence of the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story that P.C. Isaacson took Timmings to the station, and they say that it was at the corner of Piccadilly and Swallow Street that P.C. Divers joined Timmings, who was then in the custody of P.C.

Isaacson. Timmings does not agree with Gerothwohl and Lavalette on this point, for, according to his recollection, P.C. Divers joined him at the top of Swallow Street. Be it noted that if Gerothwohl and Lavalette's statement on this point is correct, P.C. Divers would be apparently without cause committing a breach of discipline in going with P.C. Isaacson and his prisoner to the station and in entering the charge-room. We say "apparently without cause," because it seems ridiculous to suggest that P.C. Isaacson required any assistance whatever in conveying so quiet and small a prisoner to the station. If there had been reason to fear a rescue and P.C. Isaacson requested P.C. Divers to come with him, the case might be different, but Gerothwohl and Lavalette agree, and in fact all the witnesses agree, that Swallow Street was practically empty at the time, and make no suggestion that any crowd was following in procession. Why then should this constable run the risk he did and commit a grave breach of discipline? Even if he went only as far as the entrance to Vine Street Station he ran the risk of meeting his sergeant, who would undoubtedly, if he did his duty, have reported him for being off his patrol. If he went into the charge-room, he would have found himself before Inspector Berry, who would have asked him why he was there. P.C. Divers tells us he committed no breach of discipline at all, and why should we disbelieve him? To our minds, he was an honest witness trying to state in language as accurate as possible exactly what he remembered of the events on the night in question; and one thing that struck us very forcibly in support of his general credibility was the fact that, though he might without running any grave risk of its being said that he was giving false evidence, if he were inclined to shield his comrades by departure from the truth, have sworn that he saw the five men arm-in-arm and the arrest of Timmings, and possibly that he looked back and saw P.C. Wallington arrest Gerothwohl, and P.C. Isaacson arrest Lavalette, he said nothing of the kind. His restraint in this regard argues very much in favour of his credibility. Q. 3446.

As to the fact that the intervention of P.C. Divers in the way stated by Gerothwohl and Lavalette would amount to a grave breach of duty, reference may be made to what was said by Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay upon this very point. He told us that P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington being on patrol duty it would be a breach of their duty to leave their patrol without some good cause; and then his examination proceeded thus:—Q. 3178. Supposing, for instance, they had properly gone to St. James's Church to deal with this crowd, would it have been a breach of their duty to have left it and to have followed these gentlemen to Vine Street unless they had arrested them? (A.) They would not certainly be justified in handing a prisoner over. Q. 3179. He certainly would not be justified in handing over a prisoner unless he had another himself? (A.) That is so. Q. 3180. Supposing Timmings was the only one arrested there would have been a breach of this man's duty to leave the crowd at St. James's Church and go to Vine Street? (A.) Distinctly so. Qs. 3176–3180.

The rule in the White Book in defining the duty of a constable on beat lays down that he may leave his beat "to act in cases of fire, accident or other emergencies." We think it is clear that this disorder in Piccadilly was a case of emergency, and if so, P.C. Divers was quite right in going into Piccadilly to see if assistance in keeping order was required. If his assistance was not required it was his duty to go back to his beat at once; but in fact, according to him, he was required, as P.C. Isaacson having another person to arrest he had a right to hand over Timmings to P.C. Divers. We may add that from what we have gathered in other cases very great importance is attached by superior officers to any leaving of a beat or patrol by a constable on duty. Of course there may be cases in which it may be quite proper for two constables to take one prisoner to the station, but it is quite unusual. The evidence in Riley's case affords an illustration of the difficulties which sometimes arise in the application of the rule. There a police-constable on point duty followed a prisoner who had just been arrested within his sight by another constable for a short distance (i.e., left his point), and that circumstance being pointed out the explanation given was that it was not unusual to do so until a prisoner had been taken a little way, and it became plain that one constable would be able to take him to the station, and there the constable, not being satisfied followed his comrade and the prisoner and found that the latter had attempted to get away. But here there could, as it seems to us, have been no excuse at all for P.C. Divers accompanying P.C. Isaacson and his prisoner at all. Pp. 557, 558

Under these circumstances we are entirely at a loss to understand why P.C. Divers should have run any risk by committing such a grave breach of discipline, or why P.C. Isaacson, having regard to the time when he was joined by P.C. Divers, even taking Gerothwohl and Lavalette's account as to the place to be accurate, and seeing that P.C. Isaacson could not possibly have had, at the time, any idea that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were coming to the station, should invite by speech or sign P.C. Divers to commit such misconduct. Our conclusion is that the intervention of P.C. Divers is not even plausibly accounted for by the complainants, and its taking place under the circumstances they state, adds another grave improbability to the truth of their story.

The Stick Incident.

There is yet another part of Gerothwohl and Lavalette's story which seems to us highly improbable, and which is also of some importance as throwing light on the state of mind of those gentlemen—we mean the account they gave of the way in which Gerothwohl's walking stick came to be broken in two in the charge room. According to their story, P.C. Isaacson pulled Gerothwohl's stick away and deliberately broke
Q. 260. it across his knee. There can be no question that if the constable in fact broke the stick in that way he was guilty not onlyof grave but of silly and ridiculous misconduct, which must, whatever leniency Inspector Berry may be supposed to have been willing to display, have led to rebuke by him, and consequent punishment. Considered as an act of misconduct the incident is, as far as we are concerned, only of secondary importance if he had already been guilty of the still greater offence of violent and illegal arrest. The incident is, however, of some significance for us in our attempt to arrive at the truth of the whole story.

Let us first see what Gerothwohl says. After describing what he had been
Q. 260. saying and doing, and what his state of mind was, he says "At that moment I was holding the rail of the dock, and with my stick alongside. I was flourishing my card
Q. 825. with the other hand. P.C. CR 43 (P.C. Isaacson) pulled my stick away and broke it deliberately across his knee. The pieces were produced at Marlborough Street."
Qs. 3468, 3470, 3473. This account is entirely confirmed by Lavalette and Timmings.

The police witnesses, on the other hand, all agree in saying that the stick was broken in a struggle while Gerothwohl was in the dock. P.C. Isaacson's account is—
Q. 1119. "Just before they were charged, Gerothwohl was asked for his stick, but he refused
Q. 1120. to give it up and raised it like that (illustrating). P.C. Wallington asked him."
Qs. 1120–1123. Gerothwohl did not give it up, and "there was a struggle to get it away, and in the struggle between the police constable and the prisoner it was broken."
Q. 1125. The pieces were handed by P.C. Wallington to P.C. Isaacson. P.C. Wallington's account is
Qs. 1590–1601. similar. He explained that in order to wrest the stick which Gerothwohl was holding up he took hold of it in two places and tried to twist it out of Gerothwohl's hands, and that in that operation it was broken.

Qs. 1875–1876. P.C. Divers gives substantially the same version.

Inspector Berry also gives an account which tallies in substance with that of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington, but he added that he as well as P.C. Wallington asked Gerothwohl to give up the stick.

This is substantially the evidence. That the stick was taken forcibly from Gerothwohl and that it was broken are therefore facts beyond doubt. According to Gerothwohl and Lavalette's evidence, given as the result of immediate ocular observation, it was broken intentionally by P.C. Isaacson. We pass over Timmings' evidence on this point as being less circumstantial and positive, and as being that of a man probably considerably under the influence of drink. According to the equally positive evidence of Inspector Berry, P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, and P.C. Divers, given before us and based on the same immediate ocular observation it was broken accidentally. Gerothwohl says that P.C. Isaacson "deliberately" broke the stick across his knee. There is no suggestion
Qs. 494 and 495 in his or in Lavalette's evidence that P.C. Isaacson was in a passion, unless the statements that "they" (the constables) "joined in the uproar" and "talked as loudly" as Gerothwohl was talking, may imply that that was the case. Besides, there is nothing at all in the whole story as told by Gerothwohl and Lavalette to show any cause for loss of temper. There had been no kind of provocative action on Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's part except their coming to the station; and the whole burden of their story is that P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington suspected their intention and trapped them on the steps of the station by subtly concerted action of a very cool and adroit character. Assuming Gerothwohl and Lavalette's story to be true, the cue of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington would be to be eminently cool, quiet, and correct in the charge room. So it seems to us that this possible explanation of P.C. Isaacson's action must be rejected.

Bearing all these things in mind we think that the account given by Gerothwohl and Lavalette as to the breaking of the stick is so highly improbable that we have come to the conclusion that it is untrue in fact, though it is possible that they honestly believe that they saw what they alleged. Whether the inaccuracy of their account of this incident be due to an intentional attempt to deceive the magistrate and ourselves and aggravate the misconduct of the constables, or whether it be due to their being so confused and excited that their senses were not to be trusted, it is in our opinion very damaging to the credibility of their case.

The Details of the Alleged Illegal Arrest.

We now come to consider for a moment the details of the alleged arrest in Vine Street; and it seems well to compare the accounts of Gerothwohl and Lavalette in order, among other things, to try and determine if we can with some precision the constables who were guilty of the misconduct involved.

After referring to the fact that P.C. Divers came up and accompanied P.C. Isaacson and Timmings up Swallow Street, Gerothwohl continued—"We followed, gradually gaining on them, and towards the middle of Swallow Street we were nearly abreast, when Mr. Lavalette stepped forward to look at No. 43, who was on the extreme left, to take his number. We then turned the corner of Swallow Street and Vine Street, and just as we were turning I just glanced like that (describing) and I saw a unit in blue—of course it was a policeman in his blue uniform. I did not stop to look at him, but I saw there was a policeman standing there. Then we proceeded behind them very closely towards Vine Street Police Station. Just before we reached the station I noticed there were two policemen standing on each side of the entrance. There was No. 43, there was Timmings and the police constable, who turned out to be No. 427 C, well in front, we following. Just as I put my foot on the first or second step I was seized behind, shoved forward up the steps, and on the staircase Police-Constable 43 let go of Timmings, turned round, and facing me this way he seized me, twisted me round, and flung me on to another constable. That constable flung me back. I was again seized by No. 43, and twisted into the dock. As I was twisted into the dock I saw Mr. Lavalette following, spinning round from one policeman to another. It reminded me rather of a game of skittles with human pins, in which, I am afraid, the ball suffered more than the nine pins." Q. 259.

Now according to that account P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Divers were on the steps ahead of Gerothwohl at the moment of his seizure. He was seized from behind. By whom? Apparently by one of the two constables who, it is said, were at the door. No others are mentioned by him as being in Vine Street, and the only other constable referred to is the one whom he saw just as they were turning the corner of Swallow Street and Vine Street. This constable may be identical with the constable whom Lavalette saw following them some yards behind, and if so it would seem to be P.C. Wallington. Notice then two facts. P.C. Isaacson was not the first aggressor. He cannot have seized Gerothwohl from behind, and as Gerothwohl's account stands, it was one of two constables at the door, neither of whom can have seen anything of the preceding events, who first attacked him. Taking that to be the case we then have it that P.C. Isaacson turned round and faced him, seized him, and so forth. That looks as if P.C. Isaacson expected the assault. What induced one of the two men at the door or both to seize Gerothwohl? It must have been some sign given or some words not overheard by Gerothwohl uttered by P.C. Isaacson while he was passing the two men at the door that induced the assault, unless we are to believe that one of the men at the door did so spontaneously of his own motion. However, there the matter is, and the story does not seem to us to be a very likely one. If Gerothwohl and Lavalette were coming in a noisy, threatening, and aggressive manner to the station, and had had an altercation with the man at the door, the thing might be possible enough, but there is no suggestion that that was the case at all.

Now let us see what Lavalette says. Having described the arrest of Timmings
Q. 822. he then proceeded, "We followed, and we went straight to Swallow Street, towards the east corner of Swallow Street. They crossed to Swallow Street from the west to the east, and we went on to the east side, and therefore in the middle of Swallow Street we joined them. At that time we were all five quite alone. I stooped over to look at Isaacson's number, as I thought he had been treating Timmings wrongly. I have forgotten to say that at the corner of Swallow Street the Constable Isaacson was joined by another constable from the other side, and Timmings was marched
Q. 823. off between the two to Vine Street." Then when he got to the top of Vine Street he says: "Then looking over for his number I noticed a man walking behind,
Q. 824. about 10 feet—a constable." Then he said: "That was a third constable in the
Q. 825. street. We then crossed to Vine Street, and in the middle of Vine Street we may have fallen back a few paces. I was walking along, but it was rather dark, and I wanted to make my charge founded before I charged him, as I was going to. Just as I was doing that the policeman who had been following us seized me by the arm and pushed me against the wall, when another policeman took hold of me and I was pushed against another policeman on the steps, and finally I found myself in the dock. I was absolutely dazed in the dock. There I found Timmings and Dr. Gerothwohl. I was in the middle, between the two." Notice Lavalette did not see any constable standing near the corner. He did notice, however, what Gerothwohl did not notice—a man following behind. This man may have been identical with the police-constable whom Gerothwohl saw "standing there." Of course, there could be no mention of P.C. Wallington by name at that time, for Lavalette had not, and indeed could not, according to his story, have noticed him at all, and yet undoubtedly a moment afterwards when Lavalette was in the dock P.C. Wallington was in the charge room. It looks, therefore, as if the man whom Lavalette noticed walking behind was P.C. Wallington, and if so, it cannot well have been P.C. Wallington who first assaulted Gerothwohl, but it may have been he who seized Lavalette's arm and pushed him against the wall, though it ought to be mentioned here that the presence of P.C. Wallington in Vine Street when he ought to have remained on patrol is in no way accounted for in this evidence.

Comparing the two accounts, we are bound to say that though there are some slight discrepancies, yet the wonder is not that there are discrepancies, but that the two stories agree so well. It was of the essence of the police plan, if there was such a plan, that the attack, the rushing into the charge room and into the dock, should be performed quite quickly and in a manner to surprise those attacked, and it cannot be expected that people thus taken off their guard and subjected to such unusual and confusing violence should be able to tell what took place, especially as it was night time, with very great precision. We do not attach any importance at all to discrepancies in the story, but we do attach importance to the fact that both agree in the view that P.C. Isaacson was not the first aggressor. If P.C. Isaacson had indeed brutally treated Timmings, and felt that he had done wrong, and noticed that he was being followed by two men under circumstances which gave him reasonable ground for believing they were coming to the station to expose him, we could understand his stopping (allowing P.C. Divers to go on into the station with Timmings) and picking a quarrel with the two men, relying on the aid of P.C. Wellbelove and of any other constable who might be about, causing them to be arrested, and charging them with interfering with him in the execution of his duty. But that is not the case at all. It is not he that takes the first action, and it is not even P.C. Wallington (who was following, if we are right in surmising that the man whom Lavalette saw was P.C. Wallington). It was one of two constables who knew nothing about the affair, and could know nothing about the affair. Even if P.C. Isaacson did signal in some way to P.C. Wellbelove or to somebody else that he desired the arrest of the two men following, it seems to us very extraordinary that, however much they might desire to please P.C. Isaacson or to support him in anything he had done, P.C. Wellbelove should run the risk naturally involved in an assault upon two seemingly quite sober men, who were certain the moment they were in the dock to allege that they had been subjected to so gross an outrage. The difficulties in the way of their account being believed were fully present to the mind of Gerothwohl, at any rate. In cross-examination by Mr. Eldon Bankes the suggestion he makes is that P.C. Isaacson guessed why they were coming, "If he knew he had made a mistake," and nodded or made some sign to the police-constables at the door, and that one of them acted on it. Neither Gerothwohl nor Lavalette state that they observed any nod or gesture or sign of any kind. That they make no such statement, though it would have strengthened their case, is a circumstance which certainly tells in favour of their honesty as witnesses; but the fact that the communication of the plan of action conceived by P.C. Isaacson was so little noticeable and yet so readily intelligible and so well carried out indicates a power of apprehension and a capacity for translating thought into action on the part of the constables concerned of such a high degree as to be somewhat extraordinary. Qs. 441–455.

Under the circumstances such a prompt and ready adoption of a plan conveyed by a mere sign without any verbal explanation is surprising on other grounds not connected with the mental ability of the constables concerned; for what was the state of things observed by P.C. Wellbelove and the other police-constables at the door on the assumption which, argumenti causa, we make that the Gerothwohl and Lavalette account as to the way in which the men concerned in this transaction got to the entrance of Vine Street Station be true? They heard the roar of traffic in Piccadilly; they heard too the noise of disorder coming directly through Piccadilly Place to the entrance to the Station; they knew it was a Saturday night and a Boat Race night when charges might be expected, and prisoners brought in not improbably in batches of two or three or more. Vine Street was practically empty. They saw two or three police-constables escorting from the corner of Swallow Street a very small and unresisting prisoner. The only wonder is that two constables should be bringing in one prisoner, and they would assume that that was capable of explanation; at any rate, it was no business of theirs. They saw a little behind the prisoner and the police-constables two young men walking quietly and obviously sober, seemingly making for the Station. There was nothing unusual in that. People are continually coming to Vine Street for all kinds of purposes and at all hours. Behind there was a police constable following. There was nothing unusual in that. He might have been coming to fetch an ambulance or to convey a message. There was no altercation, not even conversation going on between the two young men and the police constables and their prisoners. There was nothing which would give certain indication of the object of the two young men's visit. P.C. Wellbelove may indeed have imagined that their intention was to give evidence for, or that they were somehow connected with the prisoner, but there was nothing in that which would necessarily arouse particular interest or attention, or induce a suspicion that P.C. Isaacson might be prejudicially compromised; they might be coming to bail the prisoner out. The third or following constable had had no time to come up and talk to them before Gerothwohl put his foot on the staircase.

It is under these circumstances we are asked to believe that in the twinkling of an eye, and at an imperative but unobserved sign from P.C. Isaacson or P.C. Wallington, one, or it may be two, constables joined them in surprising Gerothwohl and Lavalette as described with all the swiftness, precision and success of a rehearsed dramatic episode. We are far from saying that such a thing is not possible. Constables, like soldiers, are accustomed to joint physical action, and are more quick at understanding what is required for the success of a violent operation of this kind than an ordinary citizen, and if it be admitted that they were willing to help in carrying out the subtly indicated idea of P.C. Isaacson there is nothing unbelievable in its dexterous and rapid execution. But even if that be so, it is surprising that the two police-constables acquiesced for P.C. Isaacson was not their superior officer. Even a momentary consideration must have shown them that it was a dangerous thing to do. The two young men were sober. Could it be imagined that they would take the wrongs inflicted on them with absolute quietude? The constables must have known they were running great risks. There was the risk of Inspector Berry's discovering what had been done, and even if it be assumed that they felt that he would be quite complaisant they must have known that the matter would not rest in the station, but would be questioned in the police court. They must have known that discovery and exposure meant disgrace and punishment. Why then should they, at P.C. Isaacson's bidding or suggestion, sacrifice themselves to prevent him from suffering the possible consequences of conduct of which they knew nothing except by the merest surmise?

Attitude of Inspector Berry.

The next point that occurs to us as necessary in weighing the probability of the truth of the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story is to try and ascertain how Inspector Berry stands with regard to it. Gerothwohl charges Inspector Berry with conduct denoting "culpable negligence not to say encouragement on the part of the Inspector." It is not quite clear, even assuming the truth of the Gerothwohl and Lavalette account, what this means. It may mean that Inspector Berry actually saw quite enough of the alleged "brutal methods" to justify rebuke or reporting of the police-constables concerned, and that he shut his eyes to what he saw, or that, without his actually seeing anything unusual or improper, he conducted the proceedings in the charge room in a careless and perfunctory manner, assuming that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were drunk, when if he had been reasonably observant and cautious he must have discovered that they were sober and that their statements though given excitedly were genuine—in short that if he had taken reasonable pains he would have discovered their story was true and refused the charge as in the end the magistrate dismissed it. We are not sure whether Gerothwohl and Lavalette go so far as to suggest the former, which amounts to saying that the Inspector was an accessory after the fact to the misconduct. For our immediate purpose it does not matter much whether that is so, for we are not for the moment concerned with finally estimating the blame, if any, to be cast upon him for his share in the proceedings, but with the bearing of his knowledge of what is alleged to have taken place on the stairs, and the manner in which Gerothwohl and Lavalette made their appearance in the charge room, upon the question immediately at issue—the place of arrest.

Q. 2142. According to Inspector Berry's own evidence, he was standing "at the door leading into the Inspector's office when Timmings was brought in." Now we have been to Vine Street Station and stood in the doorway, and we found it was quite impossible for him to have seen what was going on on the stairs, but we are quite certain that if the entry of Gerothwohl and Lavalette into the charge room was effected in the manner they describe the inspector must have seen enough to lead him to infer that some violent affair had just occurred, and was being ended in his presence. We cannot go so far as to say that he must or ought to have inferred that any persons were being surprised and arrested on the steps of the station, for it is not an uncommon thing for prisoners (i.e., men already arrested elsewhere), especially drunken prisoners, to resist in entering the station when perhaps for the first time they realise what is happening to them. Making, however, every allowance for that, we think what Inspector Berry saw and heard in this case, if Gerothwohl and Lavalette speak truly, must have led him to infer that something unusual was taking place, as to which he, as a superior officer, ought to have made inquiry. We know, of course, that Inspector Berry in substance admits that he quite understood that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were asserting that they had been arrested on the way to the station. But there is a very great difference between the hearing of loudly asseverated accusations of an illegal arrest outside the station and actual observation of any part of the improper violence alleged. We do not read his evidence as anything like an admission that he saw any violent twisting into the dock or anything unusual about the way in which Gerothwohl and Lavalette came into the room, but as an admission that if anything of the sort did take place he must have seen it. The matter is important for him, because if Gerothwohl and Lavalette are speaking the truth, he did by his silence and by taking the charge without any further inquiry connive at misconduct on the part of his subordinates and aid them in their attempt to pervert the course of justice.

Here again the acceptance of the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story involves us in the acceptance of conduct on the part of an officer which seems quite improbable. If we do believe the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story, we must find, at any rate, if we accept it implicitly, as told by them, that Inspector Berry was guilty of very gross misconduct in order to shield the constables concerned. One cannot help asking, What was his motive? Why should he incur the obviously great risk of any such action? We say obviously great risk, for a moment's reflection must have shown him that in dealing with Gerothwohl and Lavalette he was not dealing with criminals, or street loafers, or habitual drunkards, and he must have known that the chances were that if their protests were in the slightest degree well founded, even if they were the worse for liquor, they would persist in their accusation, and that more would be heard of the affair. We cannot therefore see any adequate motive for his not doing his duty. There is nothing to show any special friendship on his part for either P.C. Isaacson or P.C. Wallington. He himself had only been in the C Division for two and a half years. He had been seventeen years in the force. He had risen to a very responsible grade in the service, and bore the highest character, enjoying the confidence of his superiors. Surely only some very strong motive of self-interest could tempt such a man in such a position to imperil his career, when the greater part of it was over and he was approaching the period when he would expect to retire on his pension, by intentionally abstaining from doing what was one of the first and most elementary of the duties cast upon him—namely, the instant investigation of any gross breach of discipline on the part of his subordinate officers at the earliest moment. Among constables of the same grade one may imagine that the spirit of comradeship, which is proper enough, nay, necessary within reasonable limits, may induce even honest and generally trustworthy men to shut their eyes to a great many of the mistakes, and sometimes even the downright faults, of their fellow constables; but that as between an inspector and the constables under him, to whom he is not related either by ties of friendship or of blood, that spirit can be so vigorous and active as to induce complicity in wrong-doing leading to almost certain ruin is unlikely in the highest degree.

The more we reflect on the case the more difficult we find it to admit to ourselves that Inspector Berry can have knowingly connived at such misconduct as is attributed to P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington, and if he did not so connive, then it is very difficult to believe that part of Gerothwohl and Lavalette's account which relates to the manner in which they were brought into the charge room. Even if he be regarded as a not wholly trustworthy witness and one unduly partial to the police force and anxious to screen the incriminated constables, it is still improbable that without any adequate motive he would have joined his subordinates in trying to secure the conviction of innocent men at great personal risk. Whatever his real character, the suggestion that he connived at the misconduct if it took place of the two constables seems to us to be one of an improbable character.

Inadequacy of Motive.

Having now considered the probability of the occurrence of several links in the chain of events which together make up the Gerothwohl and Lavalette story, we will proceed to ask ourselves whether the story is probable or improbable as a whole. For that purpose let us again say what that story is in general terms.

Gerothwohl and Lavalette observe a young man brutally treated and arrested by a police-constable. They decide to go to the station to complain to the Inspector. They follow the police-constable and his prisoner, who are joined in Swallow Street by another police-constable. They follow them into Vine Street. Lavalette leans forward to look at the number of the police-constable who had made the arrest. Both Gerothwohl and Lavalette are perfectly sober. Neither Gerothwohl nor Lavalette speaks to any one of the police-constables, and neither interferes with the police-constables in any way. Arriving at the door of the station, both are suddenly assaulted, arrested, and put into the dock with the young man first arrested.

Such, put quite accurately but baldly, is the story. No one, as we have said before, can deny that it is a possible one; and no one will, we think, be inclined to deny that it is a very strange one. Even if one takes a view as hostile to the police, as a reasonable man can, and believes that the majority of the police do not shrink from abusing their authority, it can hardly be maintained that it is likely that without regard to the risk of discovery and punishment they should wantonly arrest innocent persons without an adequate motive. The complainants in this case quite recognise that, and their suggestion is that their movements attracted the attention of P.C. Isaacson or P.C. Wallington, or both, and that these constables inferred that they were going to give evidence on behalf of the prisoner Timmings, or, at any rate, to complain to the Inspector as to his arrest, and promptly arrested them and put them into the dock on a charge of being drunk and disorderly.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that things happened much as Gerothwohl and Lavalette say, it does seem quite possible (though not by any means certain) that P.C. Isaacson, who was in advance with Timmings and P.C. Divers, or P.C. Wallington, who was (as is to be implied from the story) following closely, may have suspected the intention of the two unknown gentlemen who were walking up Swallow Street, and that their suspicions were confirmed when Lavalette leant forward to look at P.C. Isaacson's number. Gerothwohl's suggestion is that it was the stooping forward of Lavalette to look at P.C. Isaacson's number that induced suspicion. That may be so, if Lavalette did really lean forward, but we must confess we think this alleged action on his part was a strange one under the circumstances. Why should he want the constable's number when he was following him into the station, had him in sight, and could point him out in the charge-room without difficulty? Even if he did in fact do so, it is difficult to see any sufficient motive for a resort to violence which was attended with danger, and the success of which could not prevent the two unknown gentlemen from ultimately saying what they pleased, both in the charge-room and at the police-court. P.C. Wallington had, so far as we can see, nothing to fear from anything they might say.

Q. 642., &c.

With regard to P.C. Isaacson the case is somewhat different. He may, on the supposition made, have felt that if the two unknown men did come into the station that they were going to make a damaging statement about him. But what was the worst he had to fear if the two unknown men did come into the charge room? It was he who had taken Timmings into the charge room, placed him in the dock, and charged him with being drunk and disorderly, and so forth. Timmings was not bruised or wounded; he was not groaning; he was walking quietly to the station. What would happen when he was in the dock and just being charged? The two unknown men having arrived at the door P.C. Wellbelove would inquire their business, he would probably show them into the waiting room, and then inform the Inspector that they wished to speak about the arrest. The Inspector would then order them to be brought in, and he would ask them what they had to say. What could they say? P.C. Isaacson could not know exactly, but he knew that their statement could not be very serious; there could be no allegation as to the use of the truncheon or anything of that kind, and P.C. Isaacson knew that after they had had their say he would have the opportunity of denying the charges or of explaining them away, and he would point out that Timmings had not complained before they came in, and he could also ask that P.C. Wallington should be sent for to support him. In the end the worst that could happen would be that the Inspector would report him for using some unnecessary violence, the probability would be that he would not express any opinion but simply take a note of the complaint and of the addresses of Gerothwohl and Lavalette and tell them that they might give evidence at the police court if they wished. Obviously the worst that could then have happened to P.C. Isaacson would be that the case might be dismissed if it should turn out that Timmings was sober, and that he might be cautioned for having used too much force.

If it had been shown that P.C. Isaacson had lost his temper or had been drinking the train of reasoning just suggested would be inapplicable; but as the evidence stands we cannot help feeling that the motive put forward as accounting for the alleged outrage is a very inadequate one. Our doubt upon the point too is increased when we reflect upon the fact that the illegal arrest would not silence their victims but only put them in a somewhat disadvantageous position as defendants.

Taking into account all these considerations, we feel very strongly that the motive alleged for this grave misconduct is inadequate, and affords no satisfactory explanation of the offence alleged to have been committed by these constables.

Conduct of the Defence in the Police Court.

The suggestion was made in the cross-examination of Gerothwohl by Mr. Eldon Bankes that he and Lavalette had at the police court adopted as the line of defence that a bona-fide mistake had been made in the matter by the police, and when Sir Edward Henry was recalled before us and made some comments for our assistance in regard to this matter he gave us the reasons which induced him to think that the police officers had not been guilty of any misconduct. He told us "I discussed Q. 52292. the case with the Home Office, and also with the Assistant Commissioner, and we looked at it from all possible aspects. I first considered whether, assuming good faith on both sides, the contradictory statements of Messrs Gerothwohl and Lavalette on the one side and of the witnesses for the prosecution on the other could by any possibility be reconciled. Defendants' counsel and Dr. Gerothwohl himself before the Magistrate attributed their arrest to a mistake on the part of the police officers, and this admission is dwelt on by the Magistrate in his order discharging the defendants." He then went on to state his reasons for thinking it impossible to accept the version put forward by Gerothwohl and Lavalette, and then he said: "I Q. 52292 may add that as soon as the Magistrate had discharged the case the defendants' attitude at once changed, and Dr. Gerothwohl wrote to the Home Office accusing the police of conspiracy and perjury, and demanding that they should be dismissed and prosecuted. Nothing fresh had transpired, and to me this change of attitude was not comprehensible; but, at any rate, it was quite clear that, as they demanded the criminal prosecution of the constables, I might with propriety, under the instructions given many years ago to the Commissioner by the Secretary of State, and quoted by Mr. Troup in his evidence, have altogether refrained from making any further inquiry in view of the possibility of proceedings in court being taken against the officers. I thought it better, however, to do what was in my power to clear up doubt in this case, and that is why I decided upon inquiry." In fact an inquiry did take place before Assistant Commissioner Wodehouse, and the notes of the evidence taken thereat are printed in the Appendix to the Evidence. It is obvious that if Gerothwohl and Lavalette did really in defending themselves adopt the attitude that there had been a bona-fide mistake on the part of the police, in the sense in which prima facie it was used by Sir Edward Henry, such a line of action would be so inconsistent as sensibly to weaken the trustworthiness of the evidence which they have given to us Let us then see how the matter stands.

Gerothwohl was asked the question by Mr. Eldon Bankes whether on the first occasion (that is the 9th April) when he was represented by counsel he had heard his Counsel tell the Magistrate that a bona-fide mistake had been made by the police. Gerothwohl answered "I did, and I was rather sorry for it." He was further asked Q. 431. "Did you also say that to the Magistrate yourself? (A.) No, I did not." Then Q. 436 followed these questions and answers: "(Q.) The statement you have now made to the Commissioners is entirely inconsistent with the police having made a bona-fide Qs. 437–439. mistake, is it not? (A.) I do not judge, but I am afraid it is difficult to reconcile it. (Q.) In spite of that, on the very first occasion your Counsel appeared that was what was said to the Magistrate? (A.) That is what my Counsel said to the Magistrate? (Q.) And you did not contradict it or interfere in any way? (A.) I cannot contradict my Counsel in open court, can I, even if I do not agree with him."

Mr. Denman, before whom the case was tried, gave evidence before us, and confirmed the accuracy of the shorthand note of his judgment. We need quote only a portion of the judgment. After stating that he need not put the defence to the necessity of calling further evidence, and making references to people out bent on amusing themselves, he said: "I have listened very carefully to the evidence given by the two defendants, Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette, and a friend who has been here, who is not likely to mislead me in a matter of this sort. I feel I must accept their statements, and I am glad to do so. They had not had any amount of drink which would cause them to be in a state of intoxication without some more exciting cause than is accounted for. I must remember what the circumstances were on this special night with all these great disorders occurring. They chose that occasion for amusing themselves by perambulating this thickly crowded and noisy neighbourhood on the last night of the week. I think that two educated Englishmen in the same position as themselves would have been specially careful, if they remembered the particular night it was, to keep out of such rowdy scenes which unfortunately, as they conceded, occurred on that occasion. They themselves have stated there was a great scene of riot, and that the police were under great provocation." "They identified themselves more or less with the person who was being charged. That person had not disputed the fact that he was drunk in any way, nor did he at the time dispute that he was behaving in a drunken and disorderly manner. It was identifying themselves in that manner with him in the scene that was taking place which got them into the trouble in which they are.....They have behaved so handsomely in stating the difficulties under which, in their opinion, the police were placed that I am only too glad to accept their account of the matter so far as it goes. It certainly strikes me as most agreeable that though in difficulties themselves they have paid a tribute really to the behaviour of the police in the matter. It is unfortunate that they should in any way have got mixed up in this matter. I feel bound now to discharge them." Fortunately we have a shorthand note of the proceedings in the police court with the accuracy of which Mr. Denman did not, on the points that were put to him from it, disagree.

Q. 795. A note of the first day says: "Counsel defending said Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette followed to the station when Timmings was arrested to give evidence, and they themselves were then arrested. I have a doctor here who will say that when he examined them they were not drunk. He examined them as soon as they could get to him after they were released I shall call the doctor and the defendants, and after their evidence I shall ask you to believe that there has been a bona-fide mistake on the part of the police, and ask you to discharge the defendants." It appears that the Magistrate then said: "As that is the line the defence takes I shall adjourn the case for the attendance of the Inspector who took the charge and Dr. Mitchell who examined two of the prisoners." On the second day of the hearing (the 11th April) Inspector Berry, P.C. Divers and Dr. Mitchell were called for the prosecution. Mr. Scott only put to Inspector Berry in cross-examination the allegation he had made in his observation to the Magistrate. We extract the exact questions and answers on the points from the shorthand note:—"(Q.) Did they say that they had come to the police station because they thought the third man had been rather roughly handled? (A.) They did not mention the words about the third man, but they said they were coming. The first man said he was coming, and the other said 'Yes, we were.' (Q.) What for? (A.) To speak about the third. They did not mention him by name; it appeared afterwards they did not know him. (Q.) They did at first state that they were voluntarily coming to give evidence about the treatment of the third? (A.) They said they were coming to the station about the third man being arrested. (Q.) Did they say that just as they approached the station they were set upon and brought in under arrest? (A.) They did not say that. (Q.) Did you ask the constable who brought them in whether that was so? (A.) Yes. (Q.) He said it was not so? (A.) He said they were arrested in Piccadilly. It is only a short distance away." It appears also from the shorthand note that after the evidence for the prosecution had

Q. 799. closed, Mr. Scott said: "I do not know, sir, whether you would allow me to state shortly what I propose to prove before calling my witnesses and address your worship afterwards. I propose to call Dr. Gerothwohl, Mr. Lavalette, Mr. Sherrington, a barrister, who saw them shortly before, and I propose to call two doctors"; and the Magistrate then said: "In a case like this I think you had better defer your remarks." Mr. Scott then said: "I shall call substantive evidence." After Mr. Sherrington had given his evidence the Magistrate stopped the case, so that it became unnecessary for Mr. Scott to address the Court. It does not appear from the shorthand note that any question was put either to Gerothwohl or Lavalette by Mr. Scott inviting their opinion whether a mistake had been made by the police, but it is hard to reconcile that with one of the answers given by Mr. Denman to Mr. Eldon Bankes.

Q. 778. The latter asked: "Do you remember whether Dr. Gerothwohl said anything in his evidence about its having been a mistake? (A). Yes, quite well. Counsel put the question to him: 'Do you invite the Magistrate to say there was a mistake?' or words to that effect. I think he showed a little reluctance about adopting that; he hesitated for a minute, as if he did not understand it. Then Mr. Scott put it to him, so that he could not fail to understand it: 'What I wish to put to you is, do you now invite the Magistrate to say that the disorder in the street led to a mistake being made?' and then he said: 'Yes, I do.' The whole defence put forward was to that effect. If it had not been, I think I should have thought that the case perhaps had not been run upon the proper lines. That was the defence put forward, and I considered whether I was justified in discharging them or not. Counsel enlarged very much upon the very great amount of disorder in the streets owing to its being the night of the University Boat Race." In reply to a question put by Mr. Dickinson Q. 793 to the following effect: "When you stated in the words you have read that they had behaved so handsomely in facing the difficulties in which, in their position, the police were placed, you were referring to the words that their Counsel must have said, and to nothing that they themselves had said." Mr. Denman replied, "Very likely. Of course they were responsible for their Counsel's defence. I am quite clear in my recollection, and in fact I do not think anybody disputes it, that they did both make use of the expression that there was a great crowd and a great disturbance, and that the police were under great provocation from the people, not including themselves. I think they both gave their evidence very fairly and very openly, and I had no reason to doubt that they did not do their best to give an honest account of the matter."

Upon the whole we do not think it is shown that Gerothwohl or Lavalette categorically admitted that they personally urged the Magistrate to adopt the view that there had been a bona-fide mistake on the part of the police owing to the conditions prevailing in Piccadilly. It does seem clear that Mr. Scott did make that suggestion, and that Gerothwohl and Lavalette did not repudiate anything he said. It does not seem to us that any blame whatsoever can be laid upon them for not interrupting their advocate. It is to our minds by no means clear what Mr. Scott meant by the suggestion that a bona-fide mistake on the part of the police had been made, having regard to the fact that he was instructed that Gerothwohl and Lavalette had not been arrested in Piccadilly at all, but somewhere on the way to the station. Taking Gerothwohl and Lavalette's account to be exactly true, it is at first sight not easy to see what the "bona-fide mistake on the part of the police" under which they arrested these gentlemen at Vine Street can have been. The only mistake that occurs to us as one under which P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington might possibly have been labouring when they effected the arrest of these gentlemen at the entrance to the station (if that indeed be the fact) is the honest belief that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were two of the five persons who had been the ringleaders of disorder in Piccadilly a few minutes before. If P.C. Isaacson believed that the two men so closely following Timmings, P.C. Divers and himself were really two of the five he cautioned in Piccadilly, he may have thought himself justified in arresting them at the door of the Station in respect of the disorder in Piccadilly, since their conduct and persistent identification of themselves with Timmings amounted to a continuance of the disorder. We ought not to lose sight of this suggestion as a possible explanation of the conduct of those constables. Here we only mention it as one that may have been present in Mr. Scott's mind when he stated his line of defence to Mr. Denman. It was, of course, his cue not to make an attack on the police if he could show a defence consistent with good faith on the part of all concerned, and make it easy for the Magistrate to acquit his clients without imputing misconduct to the constables; and as we have seen from Mr. Denman's judgment the learned Counsel's tactics were quite sound. It is, however, possible that what Mr. Denman meant to convey was that the arrests really took place in Piccadilly, but that the constables were mistaken in thinking Gerothwohl and Lavalette were arm-in-arm with Timmings and the others.

However this may be, it would not be fair to make Gerothwohl and Lavalette responsible for any act or suggestion of Counsel which they themselves did not clearly and specifically ratify and adopt as part of their evidence when they were in the witness box giving evidence on their own behalf.

Though in his answer quoted above to Mr. Eldon Bankes' question Mr. Denman told us that he remembered well enough that Counsel had invited him (the Magistrate) to say that there was a mistake, and something more to the same effect, and that the whole defence put forward was to that effect, i.e., that the police had made a mistake owing to the disorder, yet in his judgment he does not say specifically that that was the case, and it is very difficult, indeed, to discover what his opinion was as to the issue raised by the conflict disclosed in the evidence given before him as to where the defendants had been arrested. Of course, in one sense, whatever view may be taken of the case, the word "mistake" may be used in so large a sense that even a wrongful arrest outside Vine Street may be called a mistake. It may be that what Mr. Denman really thought, though he does not explicitly say so, was that the place of arrest became irrelevant because he thought that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were sober, and that therefore he could not convict them of being drunk and disorderly.

The general effect left on our minds is that neither the conduct of the matter at the police court by their Counsel nor its treatment by the Magistrate can be used adversely to Gerothwohl and Lavalette.

Conclusion as to the Place of Arrest.

We have now stated and commented on all the portions of the evidence and the arguments suggested by its consideration, which appear to us relevant to the question of the place of arrest. Our conclusion is that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not assaulted and arrested at or near to the entrance of Vine Street Police Station as alleged, but were arrested on the south side of Piccadilly.

The Police Counter Case.

We have now arrived at conclusions upon the two crucial questions upon which the final solution of the problem presented by the conflicting evidence in this case must depend. The gravamen of the complainants' charges, the accusation which was of obvious public interest and aroused general public attention, was the allegation that three or more constables wrongfully surprised and arrested two innocent and inoffensive persons going to a police-station on lawful business, and that an Inspector and other constables in the charge-room joined in or connived at brow-beating and silencing them in the dock. Our finding that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were arrested in Piccadilly amounts to an acquittal of all the police accused of the outrageous misconduct alleged. But our task is not yet finished. We have still to inquire whether P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington were justified in arresting the complainants in Piccadilly. The issue raised on this point turns on the question whether we ought to accept the two policemen's account of the circumstances of the arrest. The story they told us is of the simplest and most ordinary kind. Hearing a disturbance in Piccadilly they, in the regular discharge of their duty, went into that street, and their attention was at once drawn to the conduct of five men, who were proceeding westward arm-in-arm, all shouting, and who were followed by a disorderly crowd in Piccadilly. P.C. Isaacson cautioned them twice, but they did not desist. P.C. Isaacson thereupon arrested one of the five men, whom we now know to have been Timmings, and he was handed over to P.C. Divers, who arrived upon the scene at that moment. The handing over was made within a foot from the place where the arrest took place. P.C. Isaacson immediately arrested another of the five, who turned out to be Lavalette, and P.C. Wallington arrested Gerothwohl. P.C. Divers took Timmings across the road into Swallow Street, and so on into Vine Street, and the Police Station. P.C. Isaacson followed with his prisoner, and P.C. Wallington came third with his. Both P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington are positive that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were two of the five men who were cautioned, and that they were arm-in-arm at the time when Timmings was arrested. P C. Divers, when the prisoner was handed over to him, went off at once; he took the latter by himself and did not see anything of any other arrest.

Dropping out of consideration for a moment the personalities of the complainants, all that seems likely and reasonable enough. If the evidence is true, it fully explains the origin of the affair, and, in our view, justified the constables in their initial interference and subsequent action, because they had reasonably good ground for believing that persons persistently acting in the way described were drunk and disorderly. It is common knowledge that on such a night as Boat Race Night disorder often takes the form described by the police in this case; men join in ranks of four and five, and sometimes of larger number, and advance with a crowd of persons behind them, forming together an irregular procession which seriously incommodes other persons in the street.

The statements of P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington are emphatically denied by Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings, and the issue must depend on whether we believe the former or the latter on this point.

In answer to the case made by these constables, we have the denial by the complainants and Timmings of the conduct attributed to them. If Gerothwohl and Lavalette had not set up the circumstantial story which we have examined at such length and found to be untrue in all material particulars, we might have found difficulty in coming to a decision as to their complicity in disorder. As the case stands we cannot regard them as trustworthy witnesses, and therefore we cannot accept their testimony on this point. That Timmings was drunk and was guilty of the disorder alleged there can be no reasonable doubt, and though we do not allow his tacit admission at the police court any sensible weight against the complainants, his evidence certainly does not help their case.

We are quite aware that it may be said that the allegation that two men of Gerothwohl and Lavalette's status, attainments, and habits of life could while sober so far forget themselves as to walk arm-in-arm with a drunken groom and two other strangers at the head of a "booing" crowd in a London street is highly improbable. Stated thus it may seem unlikely. But experience shows that the improbability of men's actions cannot be measured by vague generalisations from their social positions or their occupations. Neither good breeding nor mental culture is a guarantee against misbehaviour, as the records of Vine Street Police Station too clearly show. The improbability must be estimated in each case by considering the temperament and character of the men concerned and the particular circumstances of the affair in question.

But however this may be, the argument from improbability has little value as against the positive testimony of two witnesses who had, as is admitted, the opportunity of seeing what was going on, and had no motive for singling out Gerothwohl and Lavalette for arrest unless in fact they were guilty of the disorderly conduct described. Our verdict is therefore against them on this issue also. We desire to add that in our opinion P.C. Isaacson and P.C. Wallington behaved with commendable promptitude in effecting the arrests and with regularity throughout the affair; and that as they had reasonable cause for believing from Gerothwohl's and Lavalette's conduct that they were drunk, no blame should be attached to them for charging them with being drunk and disorderly instead of with disorderly conduct only.

The Charges against Inspector Berry.

We have still to express our opinion as to the conduct of Inspector Berry in dealing with the charges made against these complainants. After what we have said above in the course of our observations on this case, and our findings on the principal questions, it is unnecessary to do more than state briefly our conclusions as to the accusations made against him. He did not impress us as a very satisfactory witness, and did not explain his treatment of the case in the charge-room with the clearness and ability we should have expected from so experienced an officer. We find that he maintained good order in the charge-room and took the charges against Gerothwohl, Lavalette and Timmings with formal regularity. We believe he came honestly to the mistaken conclusion that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were drunk. We think he ought not to be blamed for his error, since these prisoners by their excited behaviour contributed to its being made. But we cannot understand how he came to the conclusion that Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not denying the charge of drunkenness. It is true that while in the dock neither expressly denied being drunk, but the Inspector knew, as appears from his report, that they were protesting that they had been arrested while on the way to the station to speak on behalf of Timmings, and if instead of dismissing their protests as "wild allegations" he had Q. 2403 applied his mind with reasonable care and acuteness to the case he must have inferred that they were by implication denying the charge preferred, which included a charge of drunkenness. His mistake on this point led to his unfortunate omission to offer to send for the Divisional Surgeon in accordance with the usual practice when prisoners deny that they are drunk. We think that if the Inspector had proceeded less hastily he would have discovered that though the prisoners' excitement may possibly to some extent have been due to alcohol, they were not drunk.

It follows from our finding as to the place of arrest, that the charge made against him of aiding and abetting in or conniving at misconduct by other constables is entirely without foundation.

Finally, we desire to add that we have failed to discover any evidence to support the suggestion made by Gerothwohl in his letter to the Secretary of State that there existed a conspiracy among the police against members of the public in general or against him and Lavalette in particular, or to show that affairs at the Vine Street Police Station are not habitually carried on with strict propriety in accordance with the Orders and Regulations.

It only remains to summarise our conclusions, which are as follows :—

(i.) Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not assaulted and arrested at the entrance to Vine Street Police Station as alleged, but were arrested on the south side of Piccadilly.

(ii.) Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not drunk, but were disorderly. They were, therefore, not guilty of the offence of being drunk and disorderly on April 7, 1906. The police were honestly under the impression that they were drunk, and, under the circumstances, cannot be blamed for preferring a charge of "drunk and disorderly" conduct against them.

(iii.) The arrest of Timmings was justified, and his conviction right.

(iv.) P.C. Divers behaved regularly in taking over Timmings from P.C. Isaacson and bringing him to the police station.

With regard to the proceedings in the charge-room :—

(i.) P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington, and P.C. Divers were not guilty of any disorder or misconduct in the charge-room as alleged.

(ii.) Inspector Berry maintained good order in the charge-room, but was wrong in not paying more attention to the protests of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, and should have sent for the Divisional Surgeon in accordance with the usual practice.

II.—THE D'ANGELY CASE.

This case was brought to our notice by the Secretary of State for Home Affairs and not by reason of any complaint made by the persons immediately concerned, namely, René D'Angely and Eva D'Angely, of the action taken by the Police.

The following are the undisputed facts of the case :—

A woman who gave the name of Eva D'Angely was arrested by P.C. Page, 429 C, at the corner of Conduit Street and Regent Street at about 11.30 p.m. on the 24th April, 1906, and taken by him to Great Marlborough Street Police Station, where she was charged by the constable under section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as a "common prostitute behaving in a riotous and indecent manner at Regent Street, Parish of St. George's." The charge was accepted by Inspector Cooper, who was the Inspector on duty at the police station at the time the prisoner was brought in namely, 11.35 p.m. The prisoner made no protest as to being arrested, and did not deny the charge specifically. She appeared to be French, and she spoke in Q. 4318 broken English, but the language used by her was sufficient to enable the Inspector to understand what she said, and she understood what he said. She referred to her husband, one D'Angely, a dealer in bijouterie, and gave her address, on being asked for it, as 25, Twyford Mansions, Little Marylebone Street, and described herself as "Married French subject." The Inspector, for the purpose of giving her an opportunity to be bailed, telegraphed to the police station of the D Division, that being the division in which the house given as an address is situate. A little before 1.20 in the morning a man who gave his name as D'Angely came to the station, bailed the prisoner out, and signed the Bail Book as René D'Angely, 25, Twyford Mansions, New Cavendish Street. He spoke rapidly to the prisoner in French and appeared to be somewhat upset, and he and the woman left the station as quickly as possible, having made no protest against the arrest.

On the 25th April the case was called on before Mr. Denman at the Marlborough Street Police Court. Evidence was given for the prosecution by P.C. Page, 429 C, P.C. Sims, 440 C, and P.C. Lucas, 136 C. The prisoner addressed some questions by way of cross-examination to the witnesses for the prosecution. When the case for the prosecution ended the defendant made a statement to the effect that she was waiting about for her husband, and that if she nodded to anybody it was only to friends of hers, and she said that she wished to call her husband. She was not sworn, but René D'Angely was called and gave evidence. According to the notes of evidence taken at the Police Court he said, "She is my wife. I appointed to meet my wife at 11.30 p.m., 24th April, Regent Street. Waited for her. Found she was not there. Found her afterwards. Had last seen her before this at 10.30 p.m., when I left home to see a friend off." The defendant then said she wished to call her landlord, and asked that inquiry should be made of him. The Magistrate thereupon remanded the case on nominal bail for a week, directing Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay to let the landlord know his name had been referred to, and see whether further light could be thrown on the case. See Q 4398 and Mr. Denman's letter to the Home Office, see below.

Inspector Mackay thereupon invited René D'Angely and Eva D'Angely to come to the police station, which they willingly did. Inspector Mackay, in the presence of Inspector Cooper, then asked them some questions, and Inspector Cooper took down their answers. The following are the statements :—25th April, 1906. "Statement Q. 4339 of René D'Angely, 25, Twyford Mansions. My name is René D'Angely. I am 26 years of age, and am a dealer in jewellery and antique articles. I am not employed by any person. I usually deal with Foster's, 54, Pall Mall, who sells on commission things that are sent me. I receive the goods at my address. I have no other address. The rooms I occupy are furnished, and were taken by me through an advertisement from Mr. Gaze at 63, Twyford Mansions. I earn about £20 a month, and give nearly all to my wife. My rent is £12 a month. When in Paris I live in a boarding-house." "Statement of Eva D'Angely, of 25, Twyford Mansions, Little Marylebone Street. I am 25 years of age, and was married in Algiers about eighteen months ago. I have a certificate of marriage in Paris, but do not know the address. I came to England with my husband on the 20th February last. With the exception of three nights we have stayed at the present address since we have been in England. I have never previously been in England. I left home about 10.45 p.m. last night in company of my husband and Mr. Rubens, 17, Porchester Gardens, W. We came along Oxford Street to Regent Circus, where I left my husband and his friend. I then walked down Regent Street to the Café Royal, and came back on the other side to near Verrey's, where I was arrested. I have on several occasions been in Regent Street alone between ten and half-past. I have no lady friends in London. No policeman has ever spoken to me in the street." S.D.I. Mackay thereupon saw the Mr. Gaze referred to, who told him that the D'Angelys had taken the flat from him about the latter part of February, and that the D'Angelys came from Paris, but he did not know much about them.

A day or two afterwards René D'Angely brought to the police station a person whom he introduced as the Mr. Rubens referred to in Eva D'Angely's statement. Inspector Mackay had a conversation with Mr. Rubens, in which the latter said that he had known the D'Angelys for some considerable time abroad as very respectable people, and he knew nothing against them. He said he would come to the police court and tell the magistrate what he knew about them.

The case was called on again on May 1st, and in answer to the Magistrate, Inspector Mackay said that he had made inquiries and that the D'Angelys assured
Q. 4417. him that they had been living at this flat since about the end of February, and that he found that was correct. That Eva D'Angely also assured him that she was married, but she was unable to produce her marriage certificate, told him it was somewhere in Paris, but she did not know where. The Inspector added that Rubens had promised to come to the court and speak to their respectability prior to coming to England, but that, in fact, he had not come. Mr. Gaze did attend the court, but was not called. Mr. Rubens did not appear. The Magistrate, after asking the inspector whether the case could be carried further, dismissed the charge.

L. Denman, Esq.	Rem. 1/5. Discharged.

Reports in reference to the case were called for and were made on May 2nd, 1906, by P.C. Page, P.C. Sims, P.C. Lucas, Inspector Cooper and S.D.I. Mackay. These reports are printed in the Appendix to the evidence.

On the 4th May, 1906, René D'Angely came to the Marlborough Street Police Court, saw Inspector Mackay, and said to him, "I am very sorry for causing you so much trouble, but it is no fault of mine that all this trouble should arise. I did not intend to do anything further. A solicitor from Sir George Lewis has been calling on me with Mr. Gerothwohl to ask me to take up the case, but I do not wish, and hope the matter is ended."

Those are the relevant facts as to the police action in reference to the matter, and what we have to consider is whether there was any misconduct on the part of the police in regard to the affair. No accusers of the police appeared alleging any definite act of misconduct of the police, and, therefore, we have to deal with the case in our own way and to determine for ourselves what, if any, acts of misconduct have been committed by the police officers in regard to this matter. The question for us is not whether Mr. Denman was right or wrong in dismissing the case, for the mere fact that a Magistrate dismisses a case of the kind does not necessarily involve any misconduct on the part of the prosecutor or the other members of the Force.

It should be noticed that there was no denial on oath by Eva D'Angely of the specific acts alleged by the constable who arrested her to have been done by her on the 24th April, and the only defence put forward was one which attacked the inference which the constable drew, and which the Magistrate was asked to draw, that she was a common prostitute.

Mr. Denman did not deliver any lengthy statement of his reasons for dismissing the charge at the Police Court, but his view of the case appears in a letter which he wrote to the Secretary of State in compliance with a request from him. In that letter he says: "As it was quite clear that the husband knew of his wife's walking about Regent Street at that time of night I thought that in the absence of any evidence to suggest that he was one of the persons of the character which would be compatible with his consenting to her doing so for immoral purposes, and, of course, being careful not to let any anonymous communication interfere with my dealing with the matter fairly, there was just sufficient doubt both as to her being proved to be the class of person against whom the section of the Act is directed, and as to her conduct having amounted to be 'riotous or indecent' within the meaning of the Act, to make it a case in which I ought not to convict. I think no one will disagree with my view that for a married woman to leave her home at half-past ten at night and to wander unaccompanied backwards and forwards for nearly an hour in Regent Street was, to say the least, conduct which invited reasonable suspicion in the mind of anyone conversant with the neighbourhood and its condition at that time of night. As it was admitted she was waiting about in this way on the night in question, there is no improbability in her having been seen doing the same on previous occasions. It is, I conceive, the duty of a police officer to make a charge on observing such facts as lead him to suppose an offence has been committed, and he must always run the risk of failing to satisfy the Court that it is brought home. There must always be doubtful cases, and I was in this case of opinion that the defendant being a foreigner had, perhaps, not understood the constable when first spoken to, and had possibly from ignorance been led into behaviour which, having regard to the time and place, were very naturally attributed to other motives than merely waiting for her husband, and possibly erroneously so attributed. The same remarks also would apply to previous occasions, even if there was no mistake (which is quite possible) as to identity, for of course there is some similarity in the appearance of the great number of smartly dressed French women nightly in that neighbourhood. I have only to add that in this case there was nothing in the manner or demeanour of the witnesses which led me to form an opinion (as of course must sometimes be the case) that they were wanting in honesty or bona fides. It is, however, the class of case in which I am always especially careful to see that all the elements of the section are satisfactorily proved and brought home to my satisfaction; and where I feel the slightest doubt, or think there is the possibility of appearances having been misleading, to err, if at all, on the side of caution, and I felt there was, at any rate, this amount of doubt for the reasons I have pointed out."

It may be said that upon that there is really nothing in the case worth inquiring into, especially taking into account the interview of René D'Angely with Inspector Mackay on the 4th of May, when he said he had no desire to take any further step in the matter. As the case, however, attracted a great amount of attention, and the Chief Commissioner of Police had taken great pains to ascertain the true character of Eva D'Angely and all the important circumstances as to her career before she came to London and while residing in this city, we felt we had no other course open to us but to make the fullest inquiry into the matter, though in our judgment there was not even a prima facie case of misconduct against the constables who had taken part in the matter. We thought it important to secure, if possible, the attendance of Eva and René D'Angely, and having reason to believe, through statements made to us in answer to inquiries, that they had left London, we requested the Chief Commissioner to discover if possible the address at which a summons could be served on them. The officers of the Criminal Investigation Department, with the assistance of the Paris Police authorities, discovered that the D'Angelys were hen residing at No. 20 Rue Berlin, Paris. Seeing that these two persons were to the best of our information out of the jurisdiction, it seemed better not to send a formal summons issued under the Metropolitan Police Commission Act, 1906, but a letter couched in the form of a request for their attendance before us. Accordingly a letter was prepared, which read as follows:— "31, Great George Street, Westminster, London, 18th July.—Madame, — Q. 3864.
I am directed by the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into certain duties of the Metropolitan Police to inform you that the Royal Commission intend on Monday, the 23rd instant, at 12 o'clock noon, at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, London, S.W., to take evidence in respect to the circumstances under which you were arrested in London in April last, the hearing of the case against you at the police court, and other matters germane thereto. The Commission are, of course, desirous of hearing your evidence and also that of Monsieur D'Angely as regards these matters, and request that you will attend before them accordingly at the time and place above-mentioned, together with any witnesses whom you may wish to call. If you attend, you may, if you desire it, be represented by counsel or solicitor, or both. Lastly, I am to say that if you are not now residing in London, your reasonable expenses of attending before the Commissioners, and also those of any witnesses whom you may call, will be defrayed by His Majesty's Treasury." A French translation of this letter was prepared. A letter couched in precisely similar terms mutatis mutandis was prepared for delivery to René D'Angely, and a French version of that letter was also made. The two letters written in English were put in envelopes addressed respectively to Madame D'Angely, 25, Twyford Mansions, and to Monsieur René D'Angely, 25, Twyford Mansions. The two letters written in French were then placed in envelopes and addressed simply to Monsieur and Madame D'Angely by name. The two letters in English were handed to Mr. Booth, Clerk of the Commission, and were taken by him personally on the 18th July to Twyford Mansions, where, on making inquiries of the person in charge, he was told that Monsieur and Madame Q. 3870.
D'Angely had gone. Acting according to instructions Mr. Booth left the two letters there, so that in case Monsieur or Madame D'Angely should inquire for letters they might be forwarded if they had left any direction as to the forwarding of communications addressed to them. On the evening of the same day (18th July) Mr. Booth, accompanied by Inspector Cooper, C Division, who was able to identify the persons said to be residing at No. 20, Rue Berlin, as he had seen both several times, and Detective Inspector Sexton proceeded to Paris, where they arrived on the morning of the 19th. Having explained their errand to the police authorities of Paris, M. Beaube, the senior principal Inspector of the City of Paris Police, courteously placed his services at their disposal and accompanied them to No. 20, Rue Berlin, where they proceeded early in the day. Madame Hardie, the occupier of a flat or apartments at No. 20, Rue Berlin, who was in the habit of sub-letting furnished rooms in her flat, came to the door, and, on being asked, admitted the party, who were permitted to knock at the door and enter the room occupied by M. and Madame Dutiel, under which name the D'Angelys it appeared were then passing. An interview then took place between Mr. Booth and those who accompanied him with the two persons in the room, who were identified by Inspector Cooper as René and Eva D'Angely. Inspector Sexton, speaking in French, asked the man if he was Monsieur D'Angely. The man replied, "Yes, sir." Mr. Booth handed the letter addressed to M. René D'Angely to the man, who opened it. The other letter was handed by Mr. Booth to the woman, and D.I. Sexton said, "Open it, if you please, Madame." She also opened the letter addressed to her and read it. Monsieur D'Angely said the notice was absolutely

Q. 3920. too short, and that being the 19th he could not attend on Monday, the 23rd.

Mr. Booth then asked when it would be convenient for him to attend, and in answer (Inspector Sexton interpreted the question) Monsieur D'Angely said: "At the end of the month—about the 1st of next month, or by the following Monday." Inspector Sexton then said "You understand what it means," and he said "Yes, I understand all about it." Inspector Sexton then said "It is to try this thing in the regular way," when Monsieur D'Angely replied "I have no reason to hide myself." Inspector Sexton then suggested to him that if he was not financially ready to come he could advance him his fares, or if necessary he could accompany them to London, and he would pay his fares and the whole of the expenses. Monsieur D'Angely replied that he had plenty of money but he would expect it to be refunded after the hearing by the Commission. Inspector Sexton then said to Madame D'Angely in French: "And you, Madame," to which she replied: "I cannot come unless I am accompanied by this gentleman" (pointing to Monsieur D'Angely). Inspector Sexton answered: "Very well, Madame." The interview then terminated.

Being informed of what had taken place at this interview we decided not to commence the hearing of the evidence in the case on the 23rd, and we fixed the case for the 30th July. We then caused letters to be written to M. and Madame D'Angely
Q. 3965. asking them to attend on the 30th July. The letters were entrusted by us to Inspector Cooper for delivery on the 23rd July, and he, accompanied by Sergeant McIntyre, proceeded at once to Paris, and they, with M. Beaube, at 10 a.m. on the 24th July, visited the D'Angelys at No. 20, Rue Berlin once more. Inspector Cooper handed them the letters. D. S. McIntyre said in French "Here is a letter for you, Madame, and here is a letter for you, Monsieur."

The following is Sergeant McIntyre's account of the interview:—"I said, 'I understand you are Madame D'Angely.' She said 'Yes.' I said to the man 'I understand you are Monsieur D'Angely.' He said, 'Yes.' He said to Inspector Cooper 'What, have you come again?' I answered in French, 'Yes,' and told him, 'You had better open the letter. It is an invitation to you to attend the Royal Commission next Monday in London.' Monsieur D'Angely said, 'It is useless to have come a second time as we promised you last week we would attend on Monday.' The French Inspector who had been good enough to accompany Inspector Cooper and D. S. McIntyre interposed and said 'Pardon me, but you did not specify any certain day; you said the end of the month." There was some argument upon the point, Monsieur D'Angely repeating "No, I said Monday." D. S. McIntyre then said, "At any rate, you are invited to attend next Monday." Monsieur D'Angely replied, "Very good, we will be there," and Madame said, "Yes, sir."

There can be no doubt that the persons served with these letters under the circumstances just narrated were René and Eva D'Angely, who had been concerned in the police proceedings above mentioned.

We attach considerable importance to the fact that we brought our intention to inquire into the case to the notice of these persons, and gave them the opportunity of attending before us in order to disprove, if they could, any evidence which might be given on behalf of the Commissioner of Police in justification of the action of the officers concerned.

In accordance with the notice given in the letters served upon René and Eva D'Angely, we commenced hearing the case on the 30th July, and their names were called in the usual manner, but there was no reply. They did not appear before us on that or any subsequent occasion, nor has any communication been received from them by the Commission.

At the hearing the Metropolitan police force were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and by Mr. R. D. Muir. We heard the evidence of Mr. Booth, our clerk, D.I. Sexton, Inspector Cooper, D.S. McIntyre, M. Beaube, and Madame Hardie, as to the service of the letters addressed to René and Eva D'Angely and as to the conversation that those two persons had at their place of residence, 20, Rue Berlin, Paris. Madame Hardie also told us facts from which we infer that Eva D'Angely, since she took her room in her flat, carried on the business of a prostitute to the knowledge of René D'Angely. We also took the evidence of P.C. Page, 429 C, P.C. Nelson Sims, 440 C, and P.C. Lucas, 136 C, who spoke to the circumstances of the arrest of Eva D'Angely, and to facts from which it might be inferred that she was a common prostitute, Inspector Cooper, who was in charge of Marlborough Street Police Station on the night of the 24th April, and S.D.I. Mackay, who was in the Police Court during the hearing of the case and conducted the inquiry directed by the magistrate, the nature and result of which have been sufficiently explained above. In addition we also examined Miss Blackburn and Mr. Gaze, who deposed to facts showing the movements of the D'Angelys from about the time they arrived in London in January, 1906, down to the night of the arrest.

The following is a summary of the facts which were relied upon by the prosecution at the Police Court, and which were repeated in greater detail before us :—

On the 24th April, 1906, P.C. Page was on duty on Beat No. 1, Third Section, C Division (that is to say, Regent Street, Conduit Street, and George Street). He had been on duty on that beat for the month of April, and his hours were from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. Shortly before 11.30 p.m. he saw a woman passing him when he was standing at the corner of Maddox Street and Regent Street—about half way down his beat in Regent Street. The woman walked on about twelve yards and stopped a gentleman. She then walked on again down Regent Street (that is going south), and walked on about fifty yards, crossed to the opposite side (that is to the east side of Regent Street), and then turned and walked back. When she came to Foubert's Place (still on the east side) she stopped another gentleman; she was not then on his beat. She then walked on to Argyll Place and then stopped a third gentleman. She then crossed Regent Street (to the west side) and walked down to where he was standing near Maddox Street. The constable then asked her why she had stopped those gentlemen. She replied, "Me no speak English." He told her to behave herself and not to accost gentlemen. She replied "Oui, oui," smiled, and walked on in Regent Street as far as Conduit Street and there stopped another gentleman. The constable then went up to her and said, "I have already cautioned you and I shall take you into custody for accosting those gentlemen." She answered something in French which the constable could not understand. He then took her to the station in custody. The prisoner walked quietly and talked in French. P.C. Page then took her into the charge room at the Marlborough Street Police Station and charged her as a "common prostitute, behaving in a riotous and indecent manner at Regent Street, Parish of St. George's." Before taking the charge P.C. Page stated to the Inspector the facts we have just detailed. The woman did not appear to be distressed at all by her position. She spoke in broken English sufficiently well for the Inspector to understand what she said, and she understood him sufficiently well. She gave her name as Eva D'Angely, and her address as 25, Twyford Mansions, Little Marylebone Street. She also gave her husband's name. The constable then went back to his beat, a telegraphic message was sent to the division in which Twyford Mansions is situate, addressed to René D'Angely, and he came to the station at 1.20 a.m., and the prisoner was released upon his bail.

So much for the circumstances of the arrest.

As to the question whether Eva D'Angely was a common prostitute we received the following evidence :—

(1.) P.C. Page informed us that he had before the 24th April seen her walking alone accosting gentlemen. She first attracted his attention in February, when he was on the Oxford Circus fixed point (i.e., at the crossing of Regent Street and Oxford Street). He saw her several times during the month of March, during which he had been on the Conduit Street cab rank, which is a beat adjoining that on which he was on duty on the 24th April. He had seen her in Regent Street on several occasions during the month of April before the night of the arrest. He did not see her accost men on every occasion on which he observed her in the street. On several occasions, however, he saw actual accosting, but until the 24th April he never had an opportunity of getting near her, as, when he got anywhere near or walked towards her, she either got into a cab or an omnibus, or walked in the opposite direction right away from his beat. He had suspected her as being a prostitute as far back as February, but it was only later on that he became sufficiently certain to justify him in giving her a caution.

Q. 4117. Q. 4121. (2.) P.C. Nelson Sims gave evidence that he had known the woman arrested on the 24th April for about three months, though he did not know her name. During the month of March he was on night duty, his beat being the beat of the Second Section, close to the Circus. During the month of April he was on the Regent Circus fixed point. During the month of March he saw her almost nightly, and also during the month of April when he was on late duty he saw her nightly. She was in the habit of accosting gentlemen. He tried several times to caution her, but he never succeeded in getting near enough to do so until the night of the 24th April. About 11 o'clock on that evening he saw her crossing Oxford Street near where he was standing, and then observed her go up and accost a gentleman standing near the Circus and Regent Street. The constable then cautioned her, saying, "Behave yourself in a public thoroughfare, and do not molest gentlemen." She turned round and smiled, and went back down Regent Street in the direction of Piccadilly Circus without making any reply.

Q. 4124. Q. 4127. Q. 4128. Q. 4129.

Q. 4272. (3.) P.C. Frederick Lucas gave evidence to a similar effect. He said that he saw the woman Eva D'Angely on the night of the 24th April when she was at the police station. He recognised her as one whom he had seen before in Regent Street in the second week in April. He had been on duty at the south-east corner of Oxford Street (the fixed point) in that week, and he was on duty from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. He saw her accost gentlemen, but he could not get close enough to her to caution her.

Q. 4274. Q. 4277. Qs. 4278, 4279.

Though there was absolutely nothing in the demeanour of the constables to raise any doubt in our minds as to their veracity, we thought it right to make inquiries of their superior officers as to their characters, and to call for returns showing the duties of each of the constables during the months of February, March and April, 1906. We find that the three constables, P.C Page, P.C. Nelson Sims and P.C. Lucas are thoroughly trustworthy officers, that their defaulter's sheets are clean, and that the returns show conclusively that these three constables had consistently with the performance of their duties opportunities of observing the woman at the times referred to in their evidence.

Under these circumstances we have no hesitation in finding that Eva D'Angely was a common prostitute within the meaning of Section 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and of Section 54, Sub-section 11, of the Police Act, 1839.

That opinion is confirmed by information which we have received from certain sworn declarations from the Deputy Mayor of Algiers, from the Deputy Mayor of El-Biar in the Department of Algiers, and from certain other persons residing in Algiers, and in the neighbourhood, as to the career of the persons calling themselves René and Eva D'Angely before they came to London. We do not think it expedient to publish all the details which have been collected by Sergeant McIntyre with the courteous assistance of the authorities in Algiers and elsewhere, because such a course would involve the introduction of names of persons who have not been called before us who might possibly resent, with some reason, the publication of their names. We content ourselves with stating that it is proved to our satisfaction that (1) Eva D'Angely, under the name of Eva Clavell, for some time led an immoral life at Algiers before January, 1906. (2) René D'Angely also resided at Algiers in 1905; his real name is Soubiger, and he is a French subject; he was living in London during part of the years 1903 and 1904. (3) Soubiger and Eva Clavell were living together seemingly as man and wife during part of the year 1905 at El-Biar, near Algiers. (4) In December, 1905, Soubiger was in monetary difficulties, and about the 20th of that month left Algiers. (5) On the 4th January, 1906, Soubiger was convicted, in default of appearance, before a Court of competent jurisdiction at Algiers for carrying arms and sentenced to imprisonment for six days, and six months expulsion from Algiers and fined 16 francs. (6) Search has been duly made and it is found that Eva Clavell and Soubiger were never married in Algiers or in the Commune of El-Biar; nor have they been married in the United Kingdom.

During the latter part of December, 1905, Soubiger and Eva Clavell made their way to London, and on the 1st January, 1906, they went to live at a boarding house, No. 14, Fopstone Road, Earls Court Road. It appears that Soubiger had already in January, 1904, stayed for a month in the same house. On coming again in 1906 he introduced Eva Clavell as his wife and said that they had come from Algiers. They stayed at this boarding-house for four or five weeks, when they removed to No. 12, Providence Terrace, Earls Court Road. About the 3rd or 5th March, 1906, Soubiger applied for a furnished flat, No 25, Twyford Mansions, to Mr. Gaze, who is possessed of the lease. He gave as a reference Mrs. Lyons, of 12, Providence Terrace, Earls Court Road. Mr. Gaze agreed to accept them as tenants for one year at £2 12s. 6d. weekly, payable in advance. On the 12th March the D'Angelys took possession. In the contract Soubiger is described as R. D'Angely. The D'Angely's left the flat early on the morning of the 19th May without giving any notice to their landlord, being then four weeks in arrear with their rent. We have been unable to discover that Soubiger carried on any lawful business during the time he was in London in 1906. Q. 4601, &c.

Our conclusions are :—

(i.) Eva D'Angely was guilty of solicitation for the purpose of prostitution on the 24th April, 1906, and her arrest by P.C. Page was justified.

(ii.) The conduct of P.C. Page and of the other police officers and constables concerned in the matter was discreet and correct.

III.—CLINCH'S CASE.

In this case, James Clinch, who is in the service of the Postmaster-General, in the Letter Section at Mount Pleasant, and resides at 5, Benson Avenue, Upton Park, E., complained that on Monday, October 16th, 1905, at about 12.10 a.m., he was seriously assaulted by P.C. Gibbard, 215 G., in John's Mews, Rosebery Avenue, E.C.

The following are the material facts of the written statement of complaint sent in to us by Clinch:—"I have been 13 years in the service of the Post Office, and am now in the Letter Section at Mount Pleasant, earning 30s. a week. I am a married man. On October 16th, at 12.10 a.m., I was proceeding along Rosebery Avenue to my work at Mount Pleasant. I turned aside into John's Mews for a necessary purpose. As I went towards one of the carts in the mews, and was just stopping at the wheel, when I heard a shuffling of feet in between the carts which were on my left in the mews. I saw P.C. Gibbard turn from a woman—they were about the width of a cart from me, but there was no cart between me and them—and he asked me 'What I wanted here.' I replied 'Only to make water.' As the defendant moved from the woman I noticed her clothing fall, showing that she had had it disarranged in a disrespectful manner. I turned to go away, and he at once struck me on the back of the head a very severe blow. At the same time he walked on my heels, and whilst so doing he asked me 'Had I any property in there.' I replied 'No.' As I left the mews, with him still treading on my heels, he struck me a violent blow on the left side of the face, and with his other hand he prodded me in the back. The witnesses (two Italians) were about six yards from the entrance to the mews. One of them lives within a few doors. I asked these persons if they witnessed the assault upon me. One made a reply in Italian, and with his finger pointed out a sergeant of police crossing the road. I ran after the sergeant and told him what had taken place, and I asked him to come at once to the mews and see the policeman and the woman. The policeman after striking me the second time had returned into the mews. The sergeant said to me, 'Is the constable in the mews now?' I replied, 'Yes, and also the woman.' I asked him to go into the mews and see for himself the constable and the woman in the mews. He replied. 'Keep quiet, because they must come out this way.' So we all watched. In about four minutes the women came out crouching down and evidently trying to escape observation, and when she got out of the mews she turned to the left and ran up Rosebery Avenue. The sergeant called on her to stop twice, while she ran at full speed, and then he attempted to run after her, and when she saw that she came back. Then the constable came out of the mews. The constable did not make any complaint against me, and the sergeant said, 'You must all come to the station,' addressing particularly the constable and the woman."

Q. 4848. Clinch took out a summons returnable at the Clerkenwell Police Court on the 27th October, 1905, against P.C. Gibbard for assault, but, on the application of the defendant's solicitor, the hearing of the summons was adjourned to 7th

Qs. 4854, 4855. November, 1905. Clinch complained that he had no notice of the application to adjourn, and said it was made and complied with without consent on his part.

Q. 4856. Mr. Bros heard the case on the 7th November and dismissed the charge.

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken at the Police Court.

James Clinch, No. 5, Benson Avenue, Upton Park, E. I am a porter G.P.O. On 16th October, I was in Rosebery Avenue. I got as far as John's Mews, about 18 feet wide. I saw vehicles in John's Mews on left, two or three. I called in for necessary purpose against wheel of cart. I heard shuffling of feet. I saw a P.C. turn round from a woman, as he turned round he struck me on back of the head. I noticed the woman's clothes disarranged and the constable behaving in an improper manner. As I came away from wheel the P.C. struck me on the back of my head; he then walked on my heels. He said, "Have you any property up here?" I said, "No, I was only about to make water." He struck me another blow at the side of my face with left hand, at the same time he probed me in the back with his right arm. I saw three men standing near. I spoke to them. I saw the police sergeant. The defendant went back into the mews where the woman was. I spoke to the police sergeant, and he came with me and the two witnesses to the entrance of the mews. After about four minutes the woman came out of the mews in a crouching manner. She ran and turned to the left. The police sergeant called after her and commenced to run after her. She then returned. We all went to station. At station was police sergeant, inspector, defendant, and woman here to-day. Police sergeant told inspector, "I charge defendant with assault." Defendant said nothing. I made statement. Inspector read it to defendant, and asked if it was right. He said nothing. The female made a statement that was read to me. P.C. made a statement, and myself and the woman with two Italians left inspector and defendant together. Inspector left office. P.C. turned to me and said, "Look here, old chap, I will lock you up the first time I see you out. You put a bloke away." I said "I don't want any threat from you," and that I would tell the Inspector when he returned. The Inspector came back into the room, I told him what had occurred. Inspector said "Why don't you be quiet Gibbard. It is bad enough." Doctor examined me, I was in pain next day, my jaw pained me; back of my head seemed cold and stunned; blood flowed from the back of my head into my throat. I saw Surgeon of Post Office, he placed me under Rays, I was not on sick list. I had to go home at 5 15 a.m. The defendant is the constable I saw in Court at that time. He was in uniform.

Cross-examined.

A violent assault was committed on me. I did not apply to go sick. I came from Upton Park to Fenchurch Street and walked from there. It would take me five minutes to walk from John's Mews to Mount Pleasant, walking easily. At Post Office we have ample lavatory accommodation. I was pressed at the time and rather than strain myself I went down the mews. I saw no one about before going down the mews. I got about second cart down. No room for two carts to pass. No light in the mews. Archway at entrance. I attempted to relieve myself against the wheel of the cart about ten feet from entrance; I heard a shuffling of feet between the carts. P.C. was the width of the cart from me. He was between the first and second cart. I had reached to where he was. I was going to make water against outer wheel of cart. P.C. was between the first and second carts. I passed P.C. by about a foot. He was at other side of cart. I noticed no lantern. P.C. struck me without saying a word on back of my head. He struck me as I was leaving the cart. I was unbuttoning my trousers. P.C. turned and came face to face, I turned to walk away. P.C. struck me on the back of my head. P.C. made a mumbling noise like "Out of it." I don't remember exactly what he said. He then walked on my heels. I first saw woman when P.C. turned. He folded his overcoat, I never noticed a belt. P.C. asked me if I had any property there. I said "No I only came there to make water." I didn't say "I came there to look round." I had never seen the woman before or about the Post Office. I didn't see the woman go down the mews. I didn't follow the woman there. P.C. did not follow us down there. I did not then turn to walk out again. I didn't meet the P.C. He did not ask me what I was doing down the mews. I didn't say "I came here to make water and to look round." I didn't hesitate. The P.C. thumped me. I didn't walk to end of mews and return. I didn't say "I can play the game of Tommy Atkins." I was a soldier for three years. P.C. went back into the mews. The woman came out head and shoulders bent. She ran away from us. P.S. brought woman back. P.C. came out of mews. P.C. said nothing when I charged him with assault. I didn't make water till I left Police Station, two and a half hours. I pointed out to the surgeon where I had been struck. I told inspector where I had been struck. I didn't show him, inspector simply looked and said "I can see nothing." Divisional surgeon examined me, said he could find no trace. He examined exterior and interior of face. I worked same evening and since. I don't remember making a complaint against a City constable. There may have been reports against me at the Post Office. Other persons suggested a subscription.

Re-examined.

Woman made a statement at station to the effect that "I went up place to make water, and asked the policeman to cover me." The constable and woman were on opposite sides of cart. When constable struck me last time he knocked my cap off and said, "pick up your cap."

Angelo Delicates, 77, Rosebery Avenue, I was standing outside my door, near John's Mews. I saw complainant and defendant. I saw P.C. go to strike Mr. Clinch. His cap fell off. P.C. said, "Pick your hat up and go away." Clinch spoke to me. Police sergeant came up and took my name. I stood at entrance of mews. A woman came out and commenced to run on the footpath. P.S. called on her twice to stop. She wouldn't. P.S. ran after her and brought her back. P.C. came out. Prosecutor said, "I charge this man with assaulting me while I was making water." Mr. Clinch made a statement in writing. Inspector read it out. P.C. said nothing. Inspector said, "Did you strike this man," P.C. said, "No, I pushed him."

Cross-examined.

I went to Police Station. I interpreted my friend's evidence. I live about two doors away. I agreed with what my friend said. My friend said he saw P.C. push prosecutor. He said nothing about P.C. striking prosecutor. I said I didn't see anything; I didn't want to go against the Force.

Re-examined.

Clinch put his hands up to protect his head.

Richard Lawrence Caunter, Divisional Surgeon. At 1.40 a.m., 16th, I examined prosecutor. He said "I have had two violent blows struck me on the jaw." I examined his jaw inside and outside. I couldn't find any trace of any injury. He said he was in great pain. I told him I couldn't see that. I said there might possibly be a mark afterwards.

Cross-examined.

He did not tell me about the back of his head. He said two blows on left jaw. A tooth projected from jaw—jagged. After a blow I should have expected laceration, No severe blow had been struck. I should have expected to find swelling and redness from violent blow on jaw.

DEFENCE.

Walter Gibbard, King's Cross Road Police Station, 215 G. I was on duty on evening in question. My beat covers both sides of Rosebery Avenue, including John's Mews, which it is my duty to inspect John's Mews at right angles, and then turn sharp to the right, parallel to Rosebery Avenue. I was about thirty yards up road, I saw a man and a woman go down the mews. The woman first, and the man followed about ten yards away. I went after them. I met man coming up the mews, I asked what he was doing there, He said "I have come here to make water and have a look round." I asked if he had any property there. He said "No." I said "You had better get home." He went to top of the mews. He came back ten yards. He said "I can play the game of Tommy Atkins." He refused to go out. I pushed the man and his hat fell off. I picked it up and gave it to him, and he walked away. I did not strike him any blows on the head or face. I went back down the mews to examine locks. I saw the woman by the light of my lamp hiding behind one of the vans at the far end of the mews. I spoke to her and she went out. I followed her out and found complainant there with police sergeant. I told P.S. I had pushed the man out of the mews. He told me to come to the station. I was'nt down mews with the woman. I have seen her but not spoken to her. No impropriety between us.

Cross-examined.

I have seen her once or twice a week at night time. I have only seen her one week. Woman was at other end of the yard. I told P.S. and inspector that I had seen man and woman go down the mews. Man said he went there to make water. Woman said, "I went into the corner to make water." Man sparred up to me and said "I can play the game of Tommy Atkins." I was about a minute from time I saw man and woman enter the mews to when I met the man. I did speak about the squaring up and playing game of Tommy Atkins. I didn't make a statement to complainant at station as stated by him. Complainant said to Inspector "He has been saying something to me." I did say to complainant "You ought to be locked up."

Freya Lehmann, 23, Swinton Street, housemaid. I receive money from Germany. I remember being found in mews. I did'nt see P.C. before. It was early Monday morning. I belong to German Club at Hampstead. I walked down Rosebery Avenue to John's Mews. I went down mews to make water. Somebody followed me. I went into a corner. I heard someone talking. I saw a little lamp on stomach of one of the men. I heard one of them say "What are you doing here?" Someone else said "I am having a look round here." I was afraid to go out. P.C. came to me, showed his lamp in my face. He said "What you doing here?" I said "I just went in the corner." He said "You get outside." I went out. I ran. No impropriety between me and P.C.

Cross-examined.

The corner was at the top of the mews away from the street. I have been working in Piccadilly in Montreal Hotel. I was going home to Swinton Street. I had been to the "Angel" with a gentleman. I have spoken to men from Post Office. Never saw P.C. before or spoke to him before. I was between two carts at doorway or archway of the mews. I always go straight home by myself. I know the two Italians now in Court.

Walter Lane, 10 G. I am sergeant on defendant's beat. Complainant made a statement. Woman came out of mews and ran. I stopped her. Then P.C. came out. Accusation of assault made. P.C. said, "It's a lie, sergeant, I haven't assaulted him." I advised all to go to station.

Frederick Gadd, Inspector G. I received statement. P.C. gave explanation then that he has now.

Cross-examined.

I left room, when I returned Clinch said, "I wish P.C. would not speak to me." I said, "Please be quiet." I called that morning at Post Office about 3.30 a.m. I asked Clinch what he proposed to do. I didn't say "It's hard for one public servant to attack another." Clinch said "I don't like doing this." I said, "It is not for me to advise you."

For Prosecution.

Francesco De Angelis, 31, Warner Street. On 16th October I was outside Rosebery Avenue with two or three friends, one Delicates. I could see into John's Mews three or four yards away. Man came towards us and made complaint that P.C. had assaulted him. I saw P.C. give a push to the man. He pushed him close to the shoulders, it was a mere push. I know the difference between a blow and a push. I didn't see Clinch do anything with his hands. I saw police sergeant come up. Complaint was made; we all went to police station. I said there as I say here, I saw P.C. push the man.

Dismissed with £2 2s. 0d. costs.

We enquired into the complaint of Clinch on the 16th, 17th, and 18th October, 1906. Lord Russell appeared for Clinch, and Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir, appeared for the police concerned. In support of Clinch's complaint evidence was given by Clinch himself, Mr. R. D. Yelverton, Francesco de Angelis, Angelo Delicates, and Mr. J. S. Sandy. On the police side there were called P.C. Gibbard, Dr. Caunter, Freya Lehmann, Sergeant Lane, Inspector Gadd, and S.D.I. Briggs.

The evidence of the complainant and that of Gibbard is very conflicting, and serious discrepancies are disclosed on several material points between the statements of each of them and that of the other witnesses. The only misconduct on the part of the police which is alleged by Clinch, so far as he himself is personally concerned, is that he was assaulted by P.C. Gibbard, but the acceptance of the truth of the whole of his evidence involves the committing of acts of misconduct on the part of P.C. Gibbard and of Inspector Gadd.

The charges of misconduct may be thus formulated:—

(1) P.C. Gibbard assaulted James Clinch on the morning of October 16th, 1905, and caused him grievous bodily harm.

(2) P.C. Gibbard, while on duty was in a mews running out of Rosebery Avenue with a woman, Freya Lehmann, and was about to have, or was having, connection with her when interrupted by James Clinch.

(3) Inspector Gadd brought improper pressure to bear upon James Clinch in order to induce him not to take proceedings against P.C. Gibbard for the alleged assault.

The Complainant's Case as to Assault.

We will first summarise the evidence given on the side of the complainant, James Clinch, who described himself as residing at 5, Benson Avenue, Upton Park, E., and was in the service of the Post Office in the Letter Section at Mount Pleasant, stated that he was a married man, and that it was part of his duty to go to his work so as to be on duty at twenty minutes past 12 on the morning of the 16th October. As he was passing down Rosebery Avenue at ten minutes past 12 he came to a place called John's Mews, turning out of Rosebery Avenue, and, he went down to the mews for a necessary purpose. It seems well, seeing that his credibility is in question, and that, in addition to the account which he sent in to us which has been set out above, he gave
Q. 4769 to 4778 other accounts of the affair, to set out in his own words part of the evidence that he gave before us. He said, "Just as I pulled up at the second cart in John's Mews I was surprised to hear a shuffling of feet. I at once observed a constable with a female, which surprised me very much; the female's clothing was very much disarranged, and he was acting in an immoral manner." He was at a distance from them of "about the width of a cart, really that is, taking the circumference of the front wheel of one cart and the back wheel of the other cart, and the woodwork between the two carts, it would make about the width of a cart. I noticed the female's clothing fall; I observed the white clothing. It was a great surprise to the policeman I suppose to find me pull up against the wheel of the cart while he was acting in this immoral manner, and
Q. 4778. he pulled his overcoat over him in that way. (Illustrating). He turned round and
Q. 4780. asked me what did I want there. I said 'Nothing; I simply came here for a necessary purpose,' or 'to make water,' to explain myself more straightforwardly. 'Have you any property here?' I said 'None whatever; I only came for what I have told you.' With that he said, 'Out of it,' and he gave me a severe blow behind my head, at the same time walking on my heels. The first blow on my head which I
Q. 4782. received from him seemed to stun me somewhat. I went out of the mews in a dazed condition, and as I got to the entrance to the mews he also struck me another blow on the left side of the face, at the same time knocking my cap off my head. He at once kicked my cap, and told me to pick up my cap. I really did not know what to do at the time, as I was in rather a fixed position, having to be on duty at twenty minutes past 12, and this was at ten minutes past twelve. I shouted for the police. . . . . I was at
Q. 4784 the entrance of the mews. . . . . I had moved out. Three young men stood next
Q. 4875. door but one from the entrance to the mews. I should say, roughly speaking, it would be about seven or eight yards; they stood at the top of the steps of No. 77, Rosebery Avenue. I drew their attention to the matter, and asked them if they saw the policeman strike me. I found they were not Englishmen, but foreigners. Whilst I was asking them if they saw what had taken place, one of them directed me to a policeman who
Q. 4786 was crossing the road. . . . . They were at the top of their own steps, and whilst I was asking them if they saw what had taken place, one of them pointed out a
Q. 4787. sergeant crossing the road. . . . . I ran off to the sergeant, and told him I had been assaulted and struck twice by a policeman who was in the mews; and I said I wished him to come to the mews and see for himself the woman and the
Q 4788. policeman together. . . . . The policeman was still in the mews with the woman. When he knocked my cap off he returned back to the mews and was still in the
Q. 4789. mews with the woman when I reported the matter to the sergeant . . . . I said, 'Come with me to the mews; there is a constable and a woman in there; he struck me, and I wish to charge him with assault; he struck me on two occasions'. He said, 'Where is the policeman now?' I said, 'The policeman is still in the mews with the woman.' 'With the woman?' he said. 'Yes,' I said, 'Do come in and go up the mews for yourself and see that the policeman and woman are there.' He said, 'Keep quiet, if the policeman and woman are up there they must come out this way, because there is no other way out.' Whilst we were waiting at the entrance to the mews (I, the sergeant, and three witnesses)—we waited, I think, for about four minutes—the sergeant endeavoured to take the names of these witnesses. I said,

'Never mind the names; go in there and see for yourself.' He said, 'You keep quiet, they must come out this way.' After waiting for about four minutes the woman came out in a crouching manner, and she turned to the left of Rosebery Avenue to run towards the Angel. The sergeant called after her to stop, but she took no notice; but when the sergeant (I believe it was Sergeant Lane, No. 18) attempted to run after her, she stopped. As she came back to the sergeant, and just before she got up to the sergeant, out came the policeman. The sergeant told the policeman that I charged him with an assault, and he made no reply. The sergeant told the constable and the woman they would have to go down to the police station, and also the witnesses." The sergeant, P.C. Gibbard, Clinch, the woman, and the Q. 4790.
two witnesses went to the station and were taken into the charge room, and Clinch Q. 4795 charged the constable with the assault. He made the charge verbally to Inspector Gadd, who was in charge of the station. The inspector asked Clinch if he should write it down but he (Clinch) said he preferred to write it down himself, and being given a pen and paper, he wrote down a statement and handed it to the inspector.

The statement was put in, and is in the following terms:—

"I beg to state that whilst walking along Rosebery Avenue, I went up a mews behind a cart to make water. Whilst there I observed the policeman, 215 G., with this woman in the corner against a cart, the woman at the time having her clothes in an improper manner. She at once dropped her clothes, when the said policeman came up to me and struck me a severe blow, at the same time remarked to be off, and if I had any property up there, and he also walked on my heels until I got on the foot-path, when he struck me another severe blow on the left jaw, knocking off my cap. I at once reported the matter to the sergeant who was passing across the road, when he took the case up. I was on my way to the G.P.O., Mount Pleasant, due on duty at 12.20 a.m.—Yours sincerely, JAMES CLINCH."

Written statements were also made by Freya Lehmann and P.C. Gibbard.

Clinch also told us, and there seems no doubt about it, that the inspector read over the various written statements in the presence of the parties who had made them, and Clinch told the inspector that every word of P.C. Gibbard's statement was Q. 4818.
untrue. He heard the woman's statement also read, but when a written statement purporting to be the one written by Freya Lehmann at the police station and read there to Clinch was handed to him before us, he told us that "the statement of the lady during my presence varied very much from what has been read out now." Q. 4807.

The only other portions of the evidence as to what took place in the charge room to which attention need be called now are these: The inspector according to Clinch, went out of the room and left P.C. Gibbard, Freya Lehmann and Clinch together. The constable then said to Clinch, "Look here, old chap, the first time I see you out of Q. 4821.
doors I'll lock you up; you would put a bloke away." Clinch told him he did not want any threats from him or any accusation whatever, and that he would tell the inspector when he came from the next room. When the inspector did come from the next room Clinch told him what P.C. Gibbard had said. The inspector said, "Why don't you be quiet, Gibbard? The case is bad enough." This conversation is denied by P.C. Gibbard. Before leaving the station Clinch asked to see the divisional surgeon, and accordingly the doctor attended and examined Clinch. This was Dr. Q. 4824
Caunter, divisional surgeon of the G Division, whose evidence is very important and is dealt with later on.

Clinch gave his account of his examination by the doctor in the following words. Q. 4825
"I told him where I had been struck, at the back of the head, and on the left side of the jaw. He examined me. He said something to the effect 'You may have been struck but I cannot feel your pain. As far as I am concerned, I do not see a wound or any cut, or anything to indicate that you have been struck.' He said 'I see you have got a jagged tooth.' I said 'Yes.' None the more for that, I told him I felt the blow on my left jaw very much, and my face was a very tender part, and even if there was no wound to be seen, or any blood flowing, if you get a blow with any force whatever there, it will put you in very great pain, which I was suffering from." Clinch then left the police station and went to the Mount Pleasant Post Office.

Qs. 4131 4832. where he went on duty. He felt ill at 4 a.m., and went to the Book Inspector at the office, Mr. Sandy, the proper person to whom to appeal, and asked for leave Q. 4833 to go off duty. He had his handkerchief, which was covered with blood, he to d Q. 4836. us, in his hand at the time. "Whilst I was speaking to him I brought up a clot of blood. He said, 'Oh dear; that's nasty.' I said, 'I feel weak, and I feel I want to go home.' He said, 'You must see to that.'" This statement is confirmed in substance by Mr. Sandy, the book inspector referred to. Clinch went home at 6 a.m. Qs. 4841, 4842, 4843. Later on the same day (at 10 a.m.) Clinch saw Dr. Sinclair, the Post Office doctor, and told him how he had been struck, and how it came about, and he said that whilst he was speaking to the doctor blood came up from his throat, and he produced the same handkerchief to him.

Complainant's Case as against Inspector Gadd.

Evidence was given upon one other matter in Clinch's examination in chief, to Q. 4846. which he seemed to attach considerable importance. He said that the Inspector, Gadd, came to the Mount Pleasant Post Office on the Monday morning. "The inspector," he said, "came and asked the doorkeeper if he might be allowed to see me. I was sent Q. 4847. for, and when I came I saw the inspector in the passage. . . . . He said 'I just thought I would drop in and see you with reference to this case. Of course, it is not for me to persuade you either one way or the other what to do, but do you really intend to charge the constable, and to take it further?' I said, 'Under the circumstances, I feel that I must.' He said, 'Of course, it is rather hard that one servant Q. 4848. should go against another. . . . . I took it that he was a policeman, and that I was a Post Office official. I told him I felt I must under the circumstances. He said, 'You cannot say for certain then?' I said, 'I will not say for certain, but I will think it over.' He said, 'By what time?' I said, 'If I do not really intend to take the matter further I will call down at the police station when I leave off duty and tell you.' After the Inspector had gone I thought the matter over very, very seriously, and I felt that I must take up the charge against him—it did not matter what came or went, or where I got the few shillings from to take out the summons against him."

Clinch did, as stated above, proceed against P.C. Gibbard at the police court for Q. 4853. assault. He told us that he retained counsel (Mr. Yelverton) and that before the Q. 4854. hearing came on the case was adjourned for about eleven days. He said that the adjournment was notified to him in a letter which he received from the solicitors Q. 4856, 4857. for P.C. Gibbard, and he complained that he had no notice of any application to the Court. The case was ultimately heard at Clerkenwell on the 7th November by Mr. Bros and dismissed. In reference to the suggestion that he had known Freya Lehmann before, Clinch told us that he had never seen her in his life, and that there was no truth at all in the suggestion made by P.C. Gibbard that he (Clinch) had accompanied the woman down the mews.

That is, in substance, the evidence which Clinch gave in chief in support of his complaint, and it will be better to postpone any reference to the cross-examination of this witness until we come to discuss the issues of fact and the amount of credence to which he is entitled.

The two persons who, according to Clinch, were standing in Rosebery Avenue, near by, when he came out of the mews, and who went to the police station, were called before us.

Q. 5965. The first one, Francesco de Angelis, an Italian, living at 31, Warner Street, remembered being with Angelo Delicates outside 77, Rosebery Avenue on the night in Q. 5968. question. He saw Clinch, whom he did not however know by name at that time, Q. 5970. going into John's Mews, and the next he saw of him was about a minute or two Q. 5971. afterwards. He saw a constable come out and saw him pushing Mr. Clinch—pushing Q. 5973. a gentleman out of the mews. Clinch started shouting. He came forward twice. Qs. 5974, 5975, 5976, 5977. He asked him to be a witness that he saw the policeman strike him. The sergeant came afterwards out of another street. The sergeant came across the road and asked Mr. Clinch what was the matter. He saw a young lady coming out from the same Q. 5979, 5980, 5981. mews. "She started running on the footpath and the sergeant called upon her to stop, Q. 5982. but she would not stop." He recognised the woman (Freya Lehmann) in court as the Qs. 5983, 5984, 5987. young lady in question. "The sergeant ordered her and the constable to come to the station with him." He also went to give his evidence, and he gave his evidence to the inspector, but it does not appear that it was taken down in writing. In cross-examination by Mr. Eldon Bankes it was elicited that the witness had been standing talking to Angelo Delicates about ten minutes before Clinch went into the mews. He saw the woman go into the mews about five minutes before Clinch went in. He did not see the policeman go into the mews at all; he saw him go out. Asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes whether in the statement written at the police station he had said, "I saw the policeman push him" (Clinch) "and he said to him 'Pick your hat up,'" he answered "Yes." He repeated that the policeman was only pushing Clinch. Qs. 5990, 5991, 5992, 5993. Q. 5998.

Angelo Delicates, who spoke English reasonably well, and acted as interpreter during the examination of De Angelis, said that he was, in October, 1905, living at 77, Rosebery Avenue, and was talking to the last witness (De Angelis) on the occasion referred to. He was standing just near his door, and was unlocking it during the conversation. He had been talking to De Angelis about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, or something like that, when his attention was directed to what he saw happen in John's Mews. He saw a constable striking a gentleman, and he heard the constable say, "Pick up your cap and go," and this gentleman (Clinch) went back to the mews again. He did not know his name at the moment. He saw the constable punching him. He was striking him, and the gentleman was holding his hands up, and he illustrated it, but the impression made upon us was that the movement of his arm and the way in which he used his hand did not suggest a clenched fist and a direct use of the arm. It rather suggested a push than a blow. "There was no light in the mews." Clinch came forward at once and asked him and De Angelis if they saw the constable strike him. They answered "Yes." In the meantime he saw a sergeant crossing the road, and he said to Clinch, "Here is a sergeant crossing the road; call him, he will put everything right for you." Clinch did so, and the sergeant came across, and whilst the sergeant was taking the name of De Angelis and Delicates a young lady came out. He heard Clinch say to the sergeant that he had been assaulted by a policeman. The sergeant then started to take their names. Whilst that was taking place the young lady ran out on the footpath, but he did not know her in court as Freya Lehmann. The sergeant ordered her to stop, she still kept running, so the sergeant ran after her and stopped her, and brought her back to the mews. In the meantime the policeman came out of the mews. When the sergeant got to the mews the policeman was coming out. The sergeant said to the policeman, "This gentleman charges you with assault;" and the constable denied it. The sergeant then asked them to go to the station with him, and he (Delicates) went. The Inspector asked him, "Do you know anything about this?" and he said "No," because he thought as a foreigner he ought to mind his own business, and he did not like to be in an affair like that. He was in the charge room when the charge was made, and he saw Clinch and the Inspector in the room. He heard the Inspector say, "Gibbard, keep your place," or something like that. He heard the Inspector read the statement to the policeman. The Inspector said nothing when he read it except the words, "This gentleman is charging you with assaulting him, Gibbard. Is that right?" The policeman did not answer. But in cross-examination on this point the witness admitted that the constable had, in answer to a question by the Inspector, given the answer, "No, I only pushed him." But it is not clear whether that involves any inconsistency in his evidence, since it is quite possible that the constable may have said that to the Inspector, but not in answer to the Inspector's question, "Is that right?" The matter does not appear to be of any importance. He was also cross-examined as to whether he had said at the Police Court that he agreed with what his friend (De Angelis) had said, the suggestion being that De Angelis had simply said at the Police Court that he saw the policeman push Clinch, and if the witness agreed with him that the policeman only gave Clinch a push that would be inconsistent with the evidence which he had then just given before us. But as it then appeared that possibly the witness was not clear as to the distinction between a "pushing" and a "striking," the discrepancy, if discrepancy there be, is not one that seems to us damaging to the credit of the witness. The matter seems to be made fairly clear by a conversation that took place between Mr. Eldon Bankes and the Commissioners. Mr. Bankes said: "There are two quite distinct questions. One is whether the constable pushed the man or whether he struck him. These two men did not agree on that." The Chairman said: "I pointed out that this witness in his dramatic action made such an ambiguous action that as far as I am concerned I should have thought it was a push rather than a blow." Mr. Eldon Bankes then said: "I am obliged to you. Therefore we have got rid of that point. The other point was in his evidence he led you to think that the constable said nothing when he was charged Q. 6005, &c. Q. 6010. Q. 6011. Q. 6012. Q. 6015. Q. 6017. Q. 6019. Q. 6020. Q. 6021. Q. 6022. Q. 6024. Q. 6025. Q. 2026. Q. 2067. Q. 6028. Q. 6031. Q. 6332. Q. 6033. Q. 6034. Q. 6036. Q. 6067, &c. Q. 6121 with striking the man, and therefore in substance he admitted it, whereas when he gave evidence either in chief or in cross-examination, I do not care which, at the Police Court, he said, on the contrary, when the Inspector asked him whether he struck the man, his answer was: 'No, I pushed him.' Those are two quite distinct points." This latter question, however, does not appear to have been cleared up. In further

Q. 6149. cross-examination, it came out that Delicates and his friend were not in the same
Q. 6150. position during the whole ten minutes or so that the conversation lasted. When Clinch went in they were on the footpath, but afterwards Delicates changed his position because he went to unlock his door.

The evidence of these two witnesses strikes us as very important because it is the only independent testimony we have on the principal point in controversy. Both men gave us the impression that they were trying to give their account of what they observed quite fairly and honestly. Nothing seems to be known against their character, and one of them (Delicates) has lived in London since he was eight years old. Although Delicates acted as interpreter he did not seek in any way to colour the evidence of his friend, or to soften down such differences as exist between their statements.

The Interview with Mr. Sandy.

In reference to Clinch's statement as to his condition when he was at the Post
Q. 7056, &c. Office on the 16th October Mr. S. J. Sandy, who was the Inspector on duty there, saw Clinch at 4 a.m. According to his recollection, Clinch told him that he had been assaulted by the police, and he showed him his swollen face, and said he had a cracking of the jaw. "He also said that he had received two or three severe punches on the back of the head." The witness saw that his face was swollen, and he saw blood coming from his mouth and his nose. Clinch complained of feeling in a dazed condition. Thereupon the witness relieved him from duty, and suggested his attending the medical officer.

P.C. Gibbard's Account.

On the question of the assault the medical evidence is naturally very important,
Q. 7329, &c. but before dealing with it we think it better to give P.C. Gibbard's account of the
Q. 7331. matter. He told us that he was a constable attached to the King's Cross Road Police
Q. 7333. Station in October, 1905, and that on the evening in question he was on duty on
Qs. 7334, 7335. his beat. John's Mews was within his beat. He had often had occasion to go down
Q. 7337. that mews before after people and had turned people out. He was in Rosebery
Q. 7338. Avenue about thirty yards from the mews when he first noticed anybody going in
Qs. 7341, 7342. on that evening. He saw a woman going down the mews. About a minute after that
Q. 7363. he saw a man go down the mews. We now quote P.C. Gibbard's own language. "I went into the mews, and I met the man Clinch coming out of the mews about ten yards down. I asked him his business in the mews, and he said 'I have come down to make water and to have a look round.' I asked him if he had any property in the mews, and he said 'No.' Then I said 'You had better get home.' He said 'When I please.' He said 'I can play the game of Tommy Atkins as well as you can,' and
Q. 7364. then I pushed him and his hat came off. He went out at the end of the mews." He went on to say that he pushed him at about five yards from the point at which he had
Q. 7365. first met him. He had then got a little way in the direction of the entrance, and
Q. 7367. he went out of the mews. He only pushed the man once, and that was at a point
Q. 7368. inside the mews. He continued: "I went back down in the mews, and I saw a
Q. 7370. woman about three parts of the way down the mews, hiding behind a van. I asked her what she was doing there. She said, 'I have come in the corner to make water.' I said, 'You had better get out and go home,' and she went. I watched her out of
Q. 7371. the mews, and I went back and examined the padlocks on the doors, and then I went
Q. 7373. out." He had his lantern with him, and he used it when he was in the mews, and
Q. 7374. he discovered the woman by means of it. He could not have seen her without the
Q. 7375. lantern. When he met Clinch he had the lantern, which was then alight, on his belt.
Qs. 7376, 7377, 7378 After examining the padlocks he came out of the mews and saw the woman and
Q. 7380. the sergeant about twenty yards away from the corner. "The sergeant said, 'This
Q. 7381. man has complained of your assaulting him, striking him on the head.' I said, 'It
Q. 7382. is a lie, sergeant; I have not.' The sergeant said, 'He says so, and you will have
Q. 7383. to come to the police station,' and we went there." He denied that when he got to the station he looked into a room where some constables were waiting. He said that they went straight in to the Inspector's desk. The Inspector was there, and Clinch and he and the woman and the two Italians all went to the front of the Inspector's desk. The sergeant told the Inspector what Clinch had said, and then the Inspector asked for reports. He prepared his report in the charge room; Clinch prepared his statement on the desk in the Inspector's office. He denied that his report was read, but he said he heard what the woman said in hers. Her statement was read out, and on the statement produced by Mr. Eldon Bankes, which had been shown before us to Clinch, being handed to the witness (P.C. Gibbard) the latter said that that was what he heard read out. The witness as to what took place after he had made his report and taken it to the Inspector said that he was left in the room with Clinch and the woman, the Inspector having gone out. He then remarked to Clinch, "You are a beauty, making this false charge against me, and telling a lot of lies." Clinch replied, "I do not want to speak to you, I will speak to the Inspector." According to P.C. Gibbard, that was all that was said. When the Inspector came in again Clinch complained that P.C. Gibbard had been speaking to him. The Inspector then said to him (P.C. Gibbard), "Oh, that is enough," or something like that, "Do not speak to him." He absolutely denied that there was any foundation for the suggestion that he had been behaving improperly with the woman in any part of the mews. That completes what it seems necessary to extract from P.C. Gibbard's evidence. The statement or report he made at the police station reads as follows :—

Q. 7386 to 7393.
Q. 7395.
Q. 7403 to 7407.
Q. 7411.
Q. 7413.
Q. 7414.
Q. 7415.
Q. 7416.

"I beg to report that at 11.50 p.m. inst. I was on duty in Rosebery Avenue when I saw a man and woman go down Johns Mews. I went down to see what they were doing, and saw the man coming up from the mews. I asked him his business and if he had any property down there. He replied 'No.' I then told him to get away home and pushed him out of the mews. I went back and saw a woman and asked her business, she replied, 'I have come down to make water.' I turned her out and then looked round the mews, went out, saw her speaking to P.S. Lane, who stated that a man had complained of being assaulted by P.C., and we accompanied complainant to the station. Walter Gibbard, P C. 215 G. W. Hammond, Supt."

Freya Lehmann's Evidence.

In addition to Clinch and to P.C. Gibbard's evidence as to what took place in and about the mews we received that of the woman Freya Lehmann, who was undoubtedly in the mews on the night in question. She said that she was living at 31, Baker Street, Lloyd Square, and she remembered the evening in question, and going into the mews. She said she went into the mews by herself, and heard some footsteps coming after her. She went to the end of the mews—the furthest part from the street. Passing a number of vans or carts she then heard some talking—gentlemen's voices. She could not hear what was said. She stopped where she was. After that a policeman came up to her and said, "What are you doing here?" She answered, "I went in the corner." She had been in the corner. The policeman said, "Get outside." He had a lamp with him and he turned the light of the lamp on to her before he spoke. She went quickly out of the mews because she thought he would catch her. She then went down the Avenue on the left hand side. She saw somebody standing outside, but did not notice because she was running. She heard somebody call after her, she turned round and looked back, and found it was a sergeant. She went with the sergeant, the policeman, the Italians, and the complainant to the Police Station, and wrote down herself a statement. She wrote only one statement, and she identified the statement handed to her by Mr. Eldon Bankes (the one that had been handed to Clinch) as being in her own handwriting, and the only one she had ever made. She categorically denied that she had ever said that she went into the mews to make water and asked the policeman to stand and cover her. She would not ask a policeman to do that. She denied that she and the policeman were misconducting themselves close to the entrance to the mews. Lord Russell cross-examined the witness with a view to showing that she earned her living by prostitution, and on certain other points connected with her evidence.

Q. 7859, &c.

The Evidence of Sergeant Lane and Inspector Gadd.

It seems unnecessary to set out at any length the evidence of Sergeant Walter Lane, because in the main he only speaks to matters as to which there is no dispute.

But is important to observe that though in his first account of what Clinch said when they first met he did not mention that Clinch had referred to the fact that there was
Q. 8097. a woman in the mews, on his attention being called by Mr. Dickinson to his report he admitted that Clinch had after complaining of the assault added that he had seen the policeman at the back of a van with a woman.

The account given by Inspector Gadd of what took place in the charge room substantially confirms what P.C. Gibbard and Sergeant Lane had stated, but he thought that P.C. Gibbard was mistaken in saying that the statements of Clinch, of the woman, and of the Italians were not read over to him before he (P.C. Gibbard) had written his report. The Inspector admitted that he had called upon Clinch at the Post Office, and
Q. 8068. he explained that he did so because he had promised Clinch to do so. His evidence on this point was that before Clinch left, he (the Inspector) had said to him, "I
Q. 8037. should like to know whether you propose to leave this matter to be dealt with by the Commissioner, or whether you propose to apply for a summons." He said "I do not quite know what I shall do. My hours are"—the Inspector thought he said—"from 12.30 to 7.30." The Inspector said, "I should like to know what you intend to do, and I will call upon you." Accordingly, at about half-past three he called at the Inland Section at Mount Pleasant and asked to see Clinch, who came to him. The Inspector asked him whether he had made up his mind, and Clinch replied, "No, I have not." He said something about that it was not nice for one public servant to go against another. The Inspector told us that he replied, "I cannot advise you, but I want to know whether you have made up your mind what you propose to do?" Clinch said, "No, I think not. I will call at the station and let you know." Clinch, however, did not call at the station. As to this interview we need only say that we accept the Inspector's account.

The Medical Evidence.

Q. 7093, &c. It was Dr. Caunter, the divisional surgeon, who first examined Clinch after the alleged assault. He is a doctor of medicine and divisional surgeon of the G Division at the King's Cross Road Station. He was called there in the early morning of the 16th October to examine a man named James Clinch. He got to the station at 1.40 and examined Clinch. Clinch complained of having received two blows on the left side of the face on the lower jaw, and he pointed to the place. The doctor asked if he was injured in any other way, and he said "No." The doctor then examined the place
Q. 7301, &c. he pointed to. The doctor was asked what he found, and he said, "I found nothing whatever. I looked when I examined the inside of the mouth, and on the inside of the mouth opposite the place that he complained of there was a jagged pointed tooth pointing towards the near side of the cheek, and, in my opinion, if there had been any force used to the place he pointed out to me this jagged pointed tooth would have
Q. 7305. cut the inside of the cheek. There was no cut." He observed no blood at all. He made an entry in the Occurrence Book at the time. The entry in the Occurrence Book, which was put in, is as follows: "At 1.40 a.m. I examined James Clinch. This man complains of injury to his left jaw. On examination I cannot find any trace of injury either on the outside of the face or inside the mouth. In my opinion if there had been any severe blow on the spot pointed out to me by this man there would be as a result a cut on the inside of the cheek, as there is a jagged tooth in the upper jaw in this position." Though Clinch said nothing about a blow on the back of his head when first examined by Dr. Caunter, it appears that he did so during the
Q. 7308. magisterial proceedings. It also appears, however, that Dr. Caunter did not examine the back of his neck because when he enquired of Clinch whether there was any other injury he replied, "No." Further examined, the doctor told us that Clinch had mentioned that he had been struck twice by the policeman on the side of the jaw.

Q. 7027, &c. Dr. John Sinclair, one of the official doctors of the Post Office, who is a doctor of medicine, &c., told us that he recollected receiving a visit from Clinch on the morning of the 16th. He also saw Clinch on the following Wednesday, the 18th. The witness told us that the notice to attend had been rather sudden, so he had not had time to make out a full copy of his notes, but a copy of the report which he made for the information of the Postmaster-General on the 20th was read and put in. It was as follows:—"The Controller. Porter Clinch attended this department on Monday, October 16th, and
Q. 7038. gave an account of an assault which he said he had suffered at the hands of a policeman the night before. Asked to state his injuries in order that the parts might be examined, he complained that he had been hit on the left side of the face, and this comprised the whole of his statement of injury. I examined him. I noticed a slight localised swelling of the skin and subcutaneous tissue over the seat of the articulation of the lower jaw, but was unable to discover anything else. The skin of the face and the inside of the mouth were devoid of any signs indicative of an act of violence having been committed. I did not see any signs of drink. On October 18th he attended again, and said that he was suffering from 'stunned feelings,' and that he was 'bringing up blood,' and added that he had been hit on his head by the policeman, and thought that the policeman must have used his truncheon. I examined his scalp, and was unable to find any signs of the alleged blow. I examined his nose and throat, and was of opinion that the blood which I saw upon his handkerchief came from his nose. As regards his 'stunned feelings,' I told him that these symptoms were appearing too late, that they should have been present on the morning of the 16th immediately after the assault. In both my examinations I did not see any signs of shock or concussion. I did not consider it necessary to recommend any sick leave." Dr. Sinclair told us that he did not see any spitting of blood, and that there was no spitting of blood, but that there was blood on his handkerchief. The doctor examined his throat and nose, and he satisfied himself that the blood came from the nose. The only blood Q. 7041. was at the back of the nose. The only injury that he actually noticed was a little swelling over the lower jaw. There was no sign of abrasion. It might have been a little swelling from toothache. In answer to questions from the Commissioners, Dr. Sinclair would not accept the suggestion that if Clinch had been struck a severe blow on the early morning of the 16th it would have been possible for him to have developed "stunned feelings" on the 18th. He was of opinion that the "stunned feelings" would have followed immediately on receipt of the blow or the injury. On the first occasion Clinch only complained of a blow on the chin, and nothing Q. 7050. about a blow on the head; and Clinch suggested, as appears from his note, that he thought the policeman had hit him with a truncheon. The doctor could find no Q. 7052. evidence of any blow, though he examined the scalp carefully. Q. 7054, 7055.

That is, in substance, the whole of the medical evidence.

The principal questions of fact which we have to determine so far as P.C. Gibbard is concerned are (1) Did he assault Clinch by striking him as alleged by the complainant? and (2) Was he misbehaving himself with Freya Lehmann in the mews as alleged? If the constable did assault Clinch by striking him as alleged, Clinch makes out a case of personal grievance against the constable, and, whether the assault took place or not, if the constable was misbehaving himself as alleged, Clinch, apart from the assault, has no personal grievance against P.C. Gibbard, but his complaint must be treated as one made simply in the public interest.

The Alleged Assault by Striking.

It is clear upon P.C. Gibbard's own statement that he did technically assault and beat Clinch. He admits that when he met, as he says, "Clinch coming out of the mews about ten yards down" after a conversation which Clinch ended by saying, "I can play the game of Tommy Atkins as well as you can," he pushed him, and his hat came off. That was a push amounting to an assault, though one of a comparatively trivial kind. The constable appears to have thought that he was entirely justified in pushing Clinch under the circumstances which he described.

John's Mews is private property, and, if so, Clinch was a trespasser, and so also was the constable, unless he could justify his entry. He says it was part of his duty to go into the mews to see that certain doors at the end were duly locked, and that the premises in general were safe, but we are not sure whether that duty arises from the mere fact that he was the constable on the beat, or from some special instructions given, or request made by the occupier of John's Mews. Prima facie, we think the constable was entitled to enter the mews, in order to see that no people were misbehaving or loitering there, and in looking after the safety of the premises. Taking that to be the case, he would have been within his right in turning out any persons who were not there with the leave of the occupier. According to the conversation with Clinch as detailed by P.C. Gibbard, he proceeded about his business with great propriety, because when Clinch had said that he had gone down to make water and to have a look round (observe the somewhat singular reply as to the "look round"), he asked him whether he had any property in the mews, and, on Clinch replying in the negative, said, "You had better get home." If Clinch had at once gone out of the mews, the constable would not have been justified in pushing him, but if Clinch resisted, or gave the constable reasonable ground for thinking that he was not going to comply with an order which was quite proper under the circumstances P.C. Gibbard would have been justified in compelling him to leave, provided he used no more force than was reasonably necessary under the circumstances. If Clinch did reply that he would only go when he pleased, and that he "could play the game of Tommy Atkins," no one would quarrel with the constable's action in pushing him out of the mews into the street, and the mere fact that his hat fell off would certainly not indicate that any improper degree of violence was used. But whether the P.C. was there in company with the woman, or whether the police-constable's account is true when he says that he had seen Clinch follow the woman in, and then met him coming out, he had no right whatever to strike Clinch on the side of the jaw as alleged.

Let us ask ourselves, then, whether we can believe Clinch as to the character of the assault. His evidence on this point appeared to us to be very unsatisfactory, and, indeed, the impression left upon our minds was that he could not be trusted to give a very clear account of what he observed on any occasion. Mere incapacity to tell a story accurately or to tell it twice in substantially the same language or without omissions or additions does not necessarily show a man to be a dishonest witness; but the evidence of the medical gentleman called is conclusive that, even if he is speaking the truth as to the way in which he got into the mews, and as to finding the constable and the woman there, Clinch is speaking falsely in regard to his treatment by the constable. Seen within a very short time after the occurrence by Dr. Caunter, his condition as described by that gentleman, was absolutely inconsistent with his story of the assault. The diagnosis of Dr. Sinclair, who saw him at 10 o'clock on the same day, about ten hours after the alleged assault, is entirely consistent with the diagnosis of Dr. Caunter, and it is clear that Dr. Sinclair did not believe a word of the story. It is quite possible that Clinch was suffering pain from the jagged tooth of which we heard, and which might have caused the swelling which Dr. Sinclair noticed. Dr. Sinclair evidently thought was that Clinch was malingering, and making a great fuss about injuries alleged to have been received in the affair on Monday morning in order to get leave; but there is nothing in that which diminishes the value of his positive evidence to the effect that he was unable to detect "any sign indicative of an act of violence having been committed"; and Clinch's reference to the use of the truncheon at the second interview on the 20th certainly tends to show to us, who know that in the two statements which he had then made there had been no suggestion of the truncheon having been used, that Dr. Sinclair's suspicions that Clinch was exaggerating, and was not to be believed, were well founded.

Upon the medical evidence alone it would seem that Clinch was lying about the way in which he was turned out of the mews by P.C. Gibbard, and, as it happens, some confirmation of the untrustworthiness of Clinch is afforded by the evidence of the two Italian witnesses. De Angelis at the police court and before us said that he saw the constable "pushing the gentleman." Delicates said before us that he saw the constable strike Clinch, but when he was asked to describe what he saw the policeman doing with his arm, the motion that he went through did not suggest a blow with the fist at all, but rather a push delivered with considerable force. It may, however, be observed that what they say does not absolutely disprove Clinch's story of the assault, because it may be that the constable struck him in the mews as alleged, and that the pushing described took place after the blow.

On the whole, however, the evidence of those two witnesses does support the inference to be drawn from the medical evidence. We have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that Clinch's story of being struck on the jaw or in any way violently assaulted is without foundation. That being so, the charge of misconduct on that head against P.C. Gibbard falls to the ground.

Alleged Misbehaviour of P.C. Gibbard with Freya Lehmann.

In trying to determine the question whether P.C. Gibbard was misbehaving with Freya Lehmann we have to start with the undoubted fact that there was a time at which the three persons concerned, Clinch, the constable, and the woman, were in the mews together. Next, we ought to observe that the account given by each one of the three as to the manner in which he or she got into the mews is quite possible and by no means unbelievable.

Whether Freya Lehmann is a prostitute or not, it may be that she is speaking the truth when she tells us that she turned into the mews for a necessary purpose. and that she had nothing whatever to do with either Clinch on the one hand or the constable on the other, until the latter discovered her by turning the light of his lamp towards where she was standing. Whether Clinch is lying as to the assault or not, he may be speaking the truth when he says that when he got into the mews in order to make water he did find the constable and the woman there before him, but, even if that be the case, it does not necessarily follow that the constable was misbehaving himself with the woman, or had gone in for any purpose other than the discharge of his duty. Lastly, it is quite possible that the constable's story is true, and that having seen both going into the mews, he followed to see what they were doing and found both there.

There are three distinct accounts of how these persons came to be together in the mews, and it seems right to ask oneself which, apart from any evidence of a disinterested character, ought prima facie to be believed. In answering that question let us clear the ground by observing that if Freya Lehmann's account is true, that of Clinch must be false, but the constable's may be true; and if P.C. Gibbard's story is true that of Clinch must be false, and that of Freya Lehmann may be true. It follows, therefore, that the acceptance of either Freya Lehmann's story or of P.C. Gibbard's story involves the complete rejection of Clinch's story as to their misbehaviour, and, treating the credibility of the three witnesses as being absolutely equal, the weight of the testimony is against Clinch. But it would be obviously unfair to treat the evidence of these three persons as being equally trustworthy.

Take Freya Lehmann, and assume, as it is not unfair to assume from what we heard in the case, that she is a prostitute or at any rate a woman of easy virtue, her evidence in this particular case becomes of very little value, not simply because of her character, but because her being so makes it not improbable that she was there for the purpose of having connection with either one of these two men, and if the man she was with was indeed P.C. Gibbard, though nothing very dreadful could happen to her from discovery, still it would be natural to think that her relations with a constable were such as to give her some motive for shielding him from blame and at the same time, herself from shame. Having seen the young woman, we came to the conclusion that if, being out of a place, and in straitened circumstances, she was or had been a prostitute, she is one of those who are the victims of circumstances rather than one brought up in such surroundings from her childhood that she has become thoroughly vicious and depraved. That being so, we should certainly not reject her evidence as a matter of course. We were very favourably impressed with her demeanour in the witness-box. However, she herself by her action in going into the mews became mixed up in the transaction, and we cannot regard her evidence as so free from the suspicion of interested motive as to give it much weight, if it stood alone.

The second witness, Clinch, is an ex-soldier and a servant of the Postmaster-General. He belongs, therefore, to a very respectable and usually honest body of public servants, and one would naturally be ready to give him credit for giving his evidence sincerely. But we have found that in regard to the assault he was lying. and therefore he is a discredited witness; but at the same time it does not necessarily follow that we must reject his evidence as to what he observed in the mews. If there are any circumstances which afford corroboration of what he said, or if the explanation given by the police-constable should be deemed unsatisfactory, it would be a very crude method of proceeding to dismiss a witness's whole evidence simply because he is shown to have lied on one point; at any rate that is so in an inquiry like ours, where we are not concerned in securing redress for the complainant, but in trying to find out, in the public interest, the whole truth.

The third witness concerned came before us as a constable who had had a little over nine years' experience in his work when this affair occurred. He, a man of 21 when he joined, was therefore a little over 30 years old in October, 1905. Prima facie, and so far as anything that appears in connection with this case, he is entitled to credit, and upon the principle that a person employed in the public service, being constantly under the supervision of superior officers, ought to be presumed to have done his duty properly, unless the contrary is shown, he would be entitled to complete acquittal, if the matter stood simply upon the testimony of Clinch alone. But, unfortunately for him, his defaulter's sheet is not clean, though notwithstanding the entries his pay was advanced regularly down to the 25th June 1904. His defaulter's sheet is quite clean down to the 4th March, 1903, but on that date, and on the 8th December, 1903, there are entries against him. The offences disclosed are not in themselves serious, and, so far as the question of the assault is concerned, absolutely immaterial, as they do not relate to misconduct of a violent character, or anything of the kind, but to offences which have some bearing upon the probability of his having been guilty of misconduct with F. Lehmann in this case. They are as follows:—"4th March, 1903—Inattention to duty by idling and gossiping with two females at 8 p.m., and again at 8.45 3rd instant at Charterhouse Street while on fixed point duty. Fine 1s. 6d., reprimanded and cautioned. W. Hammond, Superintendent. 8th December, 1903—Inattention to duty, and fined 2s. 6d., and in idle conversation with a female in the doorway of the Victoria P.H., York Road at 4.40 p.m. 7th instant. Fined 2s. 6d., strictly cautioned and to forfeit one hour of leave. W. Hammond, Superintendent." Such entries are of course not conclusive about his character, but one cannot help feeling that there is a good deal of significance for us about them. Both are offences involving undue familiarity between the constable and women, and taking into account the repetition of the offence, and the probability that he may have been guilty of similar offences on occasions when he was not observed by his superior officers, it does look as though this constable was rather too much addicted to female society. It must be remembered that mere brief conversations with members of the opposite sex would not make him obnoxious to censure, and that the conversations referred to must have been of such duration and were carried on in such a way as to have involved neglect of duty. It does not of course follow because he indulged in such conversations when on duty that he positively misbehaved himself on the night in question, but still these entries afford some indication of his character and habits.

We have, however, some testimony from the two Italians which may be fairly described as independent, and which throws some light upon the order in which these three persons went into the mews, but before calling attention to it let us see clearly what the conflicting accounts of Clinch and the constable say upon the matter. If Clinch's story is true, the police-constable and the woman were in the mews when he went in. If the constable's story is true, Clinch and the woman were there before he went in. Each of these two men alleges that the woman was there before he went in. The question is, did Clinch go into the mews after the policeman, or the policeman after Clinch? If the question is to be answered simply by reference to whether one believes Clinch as against the constable, we should on the whole feel constrained to say we believe the constable. But both De Angelis and Delicates assist us on the point. The former, as will be seen by reference to the summary of his evidence given above, tells us that he saw both the woman and Clinch go in. They did not, according to him, go in together. The woman went in first, and about five minutes elapsed before Clinch went in. The witness at the time was in conversation with Angelo Delicates, and possibly a third Italian, who has not been called before us, and we know that the whole conversation lasted from ten to fifteen minutes. We also know that the witnesses did not remain during the whole of the conversation in the same place, and that at the time when Clinch came out, and was being pushed by the constable, Delicates had been in the act of unlocking his door. The Italians were engaged in conversation during which they very likely to some extent changed their position more than once, but it is likely that they were more or less looking each other in the face, since, as a rule, people do not converse with faces averted the one from the other for any length of time; and, if so, it cannot be supposed that they were keeping anything like a deliberate watch upon the mews, and it is quite possible that either might see one person enter, and not see another. Of course the five minutes spoken to were given simply as an estimate by the witness, and, when pressed by Mr.

Qs. 5990 to 5993.

Eldon Bankes, he assented to the suggestion that he did not pay any particular attention to the time at the moment; and also to the suggestion that the woman went into the mews "shortly" before Clinch went in. Still, the effect of this evidence goes to show that there was such an appreciable interval of time between the going in of the woman and the going in of Clinch as to negative the suggestion that they were going in one after the other in accordance with arrangement or preconceived plan. The evidence certainly tells against the suggestion made by the constable that Clinch was going after the woman, or that he followed very closely after her. De Angelis does not speak as to the time that elapsed between his seeing Clinch going in and his seeing him coming out, but, about ten minutes seem to have elapsed since the conversation had begun when Clinch went in. The longest duration of the whole conversation up to the time that Clinch came running out of the mews is put at a quarter of an hour, and Delicates told us very positively that between the time when Clinch went in and went out only two or three minutes had elapsed. The matter comes therefore to this :—De Angelis saw the woman go in; five minutes, or shortly afterwards, he saw Clinch go in; and then, when the conversation is about to end, Clinch is seen coming back from the mews, and the interval between his going in and his coming out was almost certainly shorter than the interval between the woman's going in and Clinch's going in.

Q. 5991. Q. 6109. See also Qs. 6153, 6154, 6155

Delicates' evidence is also important upon this point. It quite agrees with that of De Angelis as to where they were standing, as to the duration of the conversation, and so forth. Delicates, like De Angelis, saw Clinch go in and saw him come out, being pushed or, as he said, being "struck" by the constable. He was asked categorically whether he noticed the woman go into the mews, and he said no; and, though he was a good deal pressed upon the point, he adhered to that answer. He was equally certain that he did not see the police-constable go in. He was asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes whether he had changed his position after Clinch went in, and he answered "Yes, because I went up to open my door." Then Mr. Eldon Bankes put this question: "The constable says he went into the mews after Clinch." The witness said: "No, I only saw Clinch go in." Being pressed, he answered, "No, no one went in after him." In answer to a question from the chairman he said: "No, I did not see the constable go in." And in reply to a question by Mr. Dickinson whether he was able to say that between the time when Clinch went in and the time when he came out no policeman did go in, he said, "Yes, no one went in then. It is not very far. It is only about 10 yards." He also said there was no one in the street but themselves. The effect of Delicates' evidence is that he saw Clinch go in and come out. He did not see, though he was in a position to do so if he had been watching, either the woman or the police-constable go in at all. Both these witnesses appeared to be respectable men, they were absolutely unacquainted with Clinch, there was nothing at all to show that any improper inducement had been offered to them to give evidence in his favour, and, so far as they can be deemed to be interested at all, one would think they would be inclined, if possible, to give evidence on the police side rather than on the other side. Their evidence seems to tell in favour of Clinch's allegation that the constable was already in the mews when he (Clinch) entered. Of course that, again, is by no means conclusive as to the alleged misconduct. It is still quite possible, consistently with the fact of the constable being there before Clinch, that he, knowing that she was there, went in simply for the purpose of turning her out, or seeing what she was about, but it contradicts the police-constable's version of the affair in a very important particular. If it be true that he was in there before Clinch, and that when he met Clinch he knew the woman was there, as he says, and he (the constable) was not there for the purpose of having connection with her, but was simply there for the purpose of turning her out, one does not see why he should not frankly have said so in answering Clinch's charge of assault at the station or at the police court, or, for the matter of that, before us. In any case, as he knew that Clinch had got out of the mews before him, he must have known that he was in a compromising situation, and he might have thought that if Clinch was a malicious and lying person he might trump up a charge of misbehaviour on his (the constable's) part with the woman in the mews. Therefore in stating what is a false account—if our inference is right—and inventing the suggestion that he had gone into the mews because he thought Clinch had gone after the woman, he would be fabricating a story which would be entirely unnecessary for his defence against the charge of assault in order to misrepresent the actual circumstances which brought him into the mews. Why, it may be asked, should he do anything of the kind if, in fact, he had not gone into the mews either by arrangement with the woman or else for the purpose of taking advantage of his finding her in the mews and inducing her to have connection with him?

On the whole, the evidence of the Italian witnesses, when taken in conjunction with the other circumstances, tells rather heavily against P.C. Gibbard.

There is one other circumstance, as to which the conflict of evidence is not very great, which to some extent supports Clinch's allegation against the constable, and that is Clinch's behaviour when he got out. He saw three young men standing next door but one from the entrance to the mews. "I drew their attention to the matter and asked them if they saw the policeman strike me. I found they were not Englishmen but foreigners. Whilst I was asking if they saw what had taken place, one of them directed me to a policeman who was crossing the road . . . . . I ran off to the sergeant and told him I had been assaulted and struck twice by a policeman who was in the mews; and I said I wished him to come to the mews and see for himself the woman and the policeman together."

Q. 4785.

Q. 4787 & 4789.

Sergeant Lane admitted that Clinch did refer to the policeman. The fact that Clinch is shown by independent and trustworthy evidence to have at once, as part of his complaint, and before the woman came out, alleged that the policeman was with a woman, tells, in our opinion, heavily against the constable's version of the affair.

Q 8097. And see his report.

Of course we know nothing about Clinch's character except what we have gathered from seeing him in the witness-box in this case; and, as we have said, he did not make a favourable impression upon us. It may possibly be that he is a man quite likely if he met a young woman like Freya Lehmann to take her into the mews as suggested by the constable, but one must remember that Clinch was undoubtedly due at his Post Office at twenty minutes past twelve, and that when passing Rosebery Avenue it was at least ten minutes past twelve, and he had a considerable distance—fully five minutes' walk—to traverse in order to reach the office. It is unlikely that under such circumstances he should have gone into the mews to have connection with a woman even if it were shown he had been talking to her just before or that he was previously acquainted with her.

It appears probable that before Freya Lehmann went into the mews she and the constable were walking in the same direction. Having regard to the situation of the post office to which Clinch was going it is reasonable to suppose that he was walking in the other direction, and if so, he must have passed the Italians pretty closely, unless he crossed the road and made for the mews in a diagonal direction.

Having considered the evidence in all its bearings on the question whether P.C. Gibbard was misbehaving himself with Freya Lehmann, we find the following relevant facts to be proved:—

Qs 5969 & 6059. Q. 5991

(1) Clinch went in alone into the mews.

(2) Freya Lehmann had gone in about five minutes before Clinch entered.

Qs. 8022 & 5972.

(3) Clinch came out of the mews in a state of excitement and shouted out for the police.

Qs. 8097; 8100; 7608 to 7643.

(4) Clinch at once told the Italians and Sergeant Lane that a policeman and a woman were in the mews together.

(5) Clinch and Freya Lehmann before entering the mews were walking in opposite directions.

(6) When he entered the mews Clinch did not know Freya Lehmann was there.

(7) Clinch came out of the mews almost immediately.

(8) P.C. Gibbard did not enter the mews after Clinch did so.

The result of our Inquiry therefore is that :—

(i.) We accept the account given by Clinch as substantially true, except as to his description of the violent character of the assault made by P.C. Gibbard, and we do not believe the story told by the latter.

(ii.) We think Inspector Gadd did not bring any improper pressure to bear on Clinch in order to induce him not to take proceedings against P.C. Gibbard, but with regard to the interview at the Post Office, seeing that a charge had been made against the constable before him as Station Officer, it was improper on his part to seek and have that interview with Clinch.

IV.—ALTFULDISCH'S CASE

AND

MAURER'S CASE.

Q. 4889, &c Ferdinand Altfuldisch, a German subject, who described himself as a journeyman tailor, residing at 17, Great Marlborough Street, W., complained that he had been wrongfully arrested about midnight on Saturday, the 16th December, 1905, by Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay, and assaulted and badly treated by him on the way to Marlborough Street Police Station, and in a dark room at the station.

William Maurer, who described himself as a gardener, working for Mr. Clark, of Priory Lane, Putney, complained that at about the same time and at the same place he was wrongfully arrested and taken to Marlborough Street Police Station.

As both complaints arise out of the events which occurred on the same evening in Greek Street, Soho, at almost the same time, we think it expedient to deal with the two complaints together.

The case of Altfuldisch was first heard by us, and it appears that it was in consequence of Altfuldisch having made his complaint, and having been heard by us, that Maurer subsequently came forward to make a charge of misconduct on the part of the police against himself.

Both Altfuldisch and Maurer caused written statements to be sent in to the Secretary of the Commission, but as they assumed the form of proofs of the evidence which they proposed to give before us, it is not necessary to set them out here, since the allegations they contained appear from the summary of their evidence respectively which we give in discussing the cases.

The following is a copy of the Charge Sheet in each case :—

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken at the Police Court in Altfuldisch's case.

18th Dec. S.D. Inspector Mackay.—12.30 a.m., 17th. Greek Street in crowd of forty foreigners fighting, tried to disperse crowd, Defendant shouted, "We shan't go away for the f—— English police." I told him to go away. He said, "No, I shan't; don't think you've got a ponce to deal with." I took him. He called on his friends to assist him and struggled. On way to station he behaved like a wild beast.

Inspector Wm. Manning.—Was with last witness, saw Defendant in crowd. Requested him myself to go away, he refused. He was very violent and called on the crowd to assist him, in consequence of which I had to arrest another man.

26th Dec. Cross-examined. Inspector Mackay.—Someone had been previously arrested. There was a crowd when prisoner was arrested, and still disorder. Prisoner was in the crowd. I spoke to him there. I arrested him on pavement near door of restaurant. He was not waiting quietly. There were a number who claimed to be his friends. I knew prisoner. I used no nasty name to him. I did not say, "We want you, you bloody ponce." I know him well. I don't think he is a ponce and did not then. On way to station he struggled and tried to trip me, and called to crowd to release him. I don't know how he received injuries. I should not be surprised if he was injured. I used force, it was necessary. I did not ask him what he was doing for a living now. His cap fell off several times. I didn't put him into cell. I brought him into waiting room. There were several others there. He lives at 17, Great Marlborough Street. He has not been charged before. I was astonished at his behaviour. I think he is a hard-working man. I was not alone in the room with him. I did not assault him.

Ferdinand Altfuldisch, 17, Great Marlborough Street, German subject, tailor. —Been in England sixteen years. I employ four to six hands. I have never had any trouble of any sort. Lived at No. 17 six years. On 16th I went with Ruppert to a florists' meeting at Wede's Hotel. We left at 12 o'clock. I only had half a glass of lager beer. I came out with Mr. Reuscher. We stayed talking outside a few minutes, perhaps three or four. There were a lot of people in the street. I had nothing to do with any of them. I knew none of them. Reuscher went across to his shop, leaving me alone. I was then on pavement in front of door. There was disturbance higher up and lower down, but no one near me. I was pushed from behind half across the pavement and heard a voice, "What are you doing here, clear off." I said, "I am waiting for a friend in this house." It was Inspector Mackay. Then he hustled me about and said, "I know you very well, clear off you b—— ponce." I was indignant and said I would make him prove it. He did not address me by name. I made no remarks about the English police. What he says I said is not true. I said nothing of the sort. I saw Ruppert coming out and I told him to go and tell my wife. Inspector said, "Who is Ruppert? What do you want him for?" I said, "He is the man I was waiting for outside." In Soho Square he said, "I'll teach you b—— foreigners to walk about with big walking sticks." Ruppert followed. In Dean Street Inspector said to Ruppert, "What do you want?" He said, "I want nothing, I am going home." Inspector said, "Well, you go away." Ruppert said, "I am going my way." Then Inspector turned to Inspector Manning and said, "You had better bring him along too." Inspector Manning brought Ruppert. Inspector Mackay said, "What are you doing for a living now?" I refused to tell him. He shook me violently and my cap fell off; that was the first time my cap fell off. Then Inspector said, "I will shake your very entrails out, you thin gutted herring." At that time Ruppert passed me. At station I saw Ruppert left in a room. I was taken straight along and put into a nearly dark room. Inspector followed; we were alone in the room. There was a pair of steps there. The door was shut by Inspector Mackay. He then assaulted me.

Cross-examined by Mackay.—You first asked me to go away. You didn't give me time to go away. No other Inspector spoke to me. I did not fall against railings. I did not try to trip you.

Theodore Ruppert, Florist, 23, Blandford Street.—On 16th our Society had a "real evening" at Wede's Hotel. Prisoner came as my guest. He has been a friend of mine for one and a half years. I never heard him use foul language. At 12 the meeting broke up. Prisoner left me to settle the bill. Prisoner left with other friends. I asked him to wait outside for me. When I left I saw prisoner in the hands of two Inspectors about twenty yards from house. Prisoner called out, "Tell my wife." There was no crowd, no people about, no disturbance. The street was very quiet. I found some friends about 100 yards down street. Then I followed up prisoner and caught him up in Soho-square. I walked behind, prisoner did not behave like a wild beast but quietly. I saw the Inspector take him by neck and push him forward. I don't know why he did it. I was in Dean Street. Later on I saw Inspector push him again, at that time passed by him. I could see no reason why force was used. I was afterwards arrested by other Inspector. I was taken quietly. I was not roughly treated. He was going quietly like me.

Herman Reuscher, 50, Munster-square, Hairdresser.—I have known prisoner a year. A most peaceful man I ever saw. I don't believe he ever used bad language. I was at the florists' meeting. I came out with prisoner. We waited outside for Ruppert some minutes. Then I left him alone to fetch my bag. There was then no disturbance or fight while I was there.

Frederick Burton, 11, Bouverie street, W., Florist.—I was at the meeting. I know the prisoner. He is a very quiet man, never uses bad language. When I came out I saw prisoner. There were three parties in the streets of about thirty in all. I saw Ruppert come up and ask me why prisoner was taken. It was all quiet, there was no noise at all.

Henry Peckover, Tailor.—I know prisoner. He has worked eight years for me. I have never heard him use bad language. I was surprised at the charge. 20s. or 14 days.

Altfuldisch's case was heard at the Marlborough Street Police Court on the 18th and 26th December, 1905, by Mr. Denman, the magistrate, who convicted Altfuldisch and fined him 20s. or 14 days.

Maurer's case was also heard at the Marlborough Street Police Court, on Monday, the 18th December, 1905, by Mr. Denman, the magistrate, who convicted Maurer and fined him 10s. or seven days.

We heard the complaint of Altfuldisch on the 16th and 17th October, and the complaint of Maurer on the 20th November, 1906. The complainants were represented by Lord Russell, and the police concerned by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

The charges made by Altfuldisch against the police may be thus formulated :—

(1) Inspector Mackay wrongly arrested him in Greek Street.

(2) The same Inspector assaulted and treated him improperly and roughly on the way to the police station.

(3) The same Inspector assaulted and beat him in a room at the police station.

(4) A policeman in plain clothes (not identified) assaulted and beat him in the same room.

The charges made by Maurer may be thus formulated :—

(1) Inspector Mackay wrongly arrested him in Greek Street.

(2) The same Inspector searched him with unnecessary violence and threw some of his papers and cigars into the fire.

Ruppert complained only of being wrongly arrested.

These two cases are of considerable importance not only because of the serious character of the allegations made by Altfuldisch against Inspector Mackay and other members of the force, but because they afford us a good illustration of the conditions under which the police have to discharge their duty.

Shortly put, the arrest of Altfuldisch, Maurer, and of one Ruppert, who gave evidence but made no independent complaint before us, came about thus: There was a meeting of a Society called the Florists' Society, which has its headquarters at Wede's Hotel, Greek Street, Soho, on the evening of the 16th December, which was a Saturday, at that place. The Society appears to have been founded as far back as 1877, and is of an entirely legal and quite respectable character. Its principal object appears to be to afford a meeting place for German gardeners carrying on their work in and about London. The rules were put in, and there is nothing in them to indicate that the Society is other than a perfectly bonâ fide Union or Club. The practice of the Society appears to have been to hold meetings at stated intervals. The members had the privilege of introducing friends to the meetings of the club, which, after the business of the evening was transacted, developed into a social and convivial gathering. The Society is in the habit of holding these meetings at Wede's Hotel in Greek Street.

On the 16th December, 1905, such a meeting had taken place, and Altfuldisch and also Reuscher, one of the witnesses before us, attended the meeting of the Society on that evening as the guests of Ruppert. Altfuldisch arrived about 10 p.m. and remained there with Ruppert and other members of the club until closing time, when, on a reminder from the landlord of the hotel, the meeting broke up, and those who had remained until closing time went out into the street. Shortly afterwards Altfuldisch, Ruppert and Maurer were all three arrested, and taken to Marlborough Street Police Station; and it is as to what took place immediately after the meeting broke up, and these persons went into the street, that we have to inquire.

It seems essential to bear in mind in considering the very conflicting evidence which was given before us the character of the locality and the condition of Greek Street and the thoroughfares surrounding it at midnight on the Saturday. The part of the C Division in which Greek Street is situate has characteristics very different from those of the other parts of the West End, and is the scene of frequent disorder.

Inspector Mackay told us that his sub-division comprised the district from High Street, Bloomsbury, to Park Lane, along Park Lane to Mount Street, and from Mount Street through Regent Street, Compton Street, and the Seven Dials to High Street, Bloomsbury, again. With the western portion (that is the portion west of Regent Street) he has, as a rule, no trouble at all, but in the eastern portion there is continually trouble and need for the exercise of the utmost vigilance; and, according to his estimate, about 95 per cent. of the population of that part of the sub-division are foreigners.

The general characteristics of this area are too well known to make it necessary for us to give any details. There are within it a very large number of places of business and workshops of various kinds carried on by persons of the highest respectability, and in the animadversions made before us by Inspector Mackay and others there was no aspersion cast upon the character of the persons concerned in those businesses or residing in the locality for the purposes of their work. It was to the character of the street, looked at from the standpoint of those responsible for the maintenance of order, that the observations and criticisms made before us were directed. It must be remembered that the district is a very central one, and the great majority of the individuals living there are foreigners of all nationalities, and in many respects it may be termed a foreign quarter. Owing to these two circumstances, the hotels, restaurants, and public-houses of the district, and even the streets, attract foreigners of all kinds, including political refugees, criminals of all descriptions, and prostitutes, as well as a number of aliens permanently or temporarily residing in the Metropolis. Almost every evening, especially when the places of amusement are about to close, the streets are thronged with crowds of persons, the majority of whom are foreigners. Inspector Mackay described Greek Street (meaning by that the street as a public highway, and without reference to the character of the people carrying on business in the street) as "the worst street in the West End of London without exception. There is a crowd of people that gather there nightly, and they are nothing more or less than pests, and I go further than that, and I say this—there are some of the vilest reptiles in London living there and frequenting there." In considering the question how the police came to arrest these three men it is only fair to bear in mind these facts. Saturday night appears to be rather worse than others in these respects. Inspector Mackay being on patrol duty at midnight, in due course came into Greek Street with Inspector Manning between midnight and 12.30 a.m. on this Saturday night, and it was in consequence of what he saw and what he did that Altfuldisch and the others were arrested, and taken to Great Marlborough Street Police Station.

We propose first to summarise the evidence of Altfuldisch, Maurer, and Ruppert, and then to give the police account of the circumstances of the arrest.

Complainants' Case.

Ferdinand Altfuldisch said that he was a German subject who had lived in England for sixteen years, and that during that time he had carried on business as a journeyman tailor, working for firms whose names he gave, and which are no doubt of a high-class character. He has lived in several houses in Soho, and for six years he had occupied the upper part of No. 17, Great Marlborough Street, which is three doors from the police station. He does not seem to have been in any police trouble before, and he seemed a sober and very decent man. He had been acquainted with Ruppert, a florist, also a German, for about two years, and he was invited by him to come to a meeting of the Florists' Society at Wede's Hotel, Greek Street, on the 16th December, 1905.
Q. 4889, &c He went there about 10 o'clock, and he stopped till just before closing time at 12 o'clock. He did not have much to drink, not above half a glass of lager beer. He came out with a man called Reuscher and waited outside for Ruppert, who had to stop behind to settle the account of the people at the meeting and pay the bill. Ruppert had asked him to wait outside, and he did so just on the pavement three or four yards away from the door (i.e., of Wede's Hotel). When he came out he noticed that the street was very noisy and very full of people, and that the police were engaged in moving the crowd about. After a little while the crowd was cleared away, and there
Q. 4915. was no one around him within ten or fifteen yards. Reuscher then said to him, "While you wait for Ruppert here, I will go and get my bag," which it appeared he had left in Wardour Street. At that time there was no person near him within ten
Q. 4920. or fifteen yards, and while he was standing there alone he was "suddenly attacked from behind and pushed across the pavement. I looked round and saw a policeman behind me." He did not know then who he was, but he afterwards knew him as an
Q. 4922. Inspector. The Inspector said, "Clear off here; what are you standing about here
Q. 4924. for?" and Altfultdisch replied that he was waiting for a friend of his who was inside. The Inspector said, "Come off; what are you standing there for? We know you; you are very well known to us," and then used very insulting words to him. We now
Q. 4925. give the witnesses' own words. The witness said, "Excuse me, but he called me a 'b——— ponce.' Of course I was very much annoyed at that, because it was insulting to me, and I said to him, how dare he call me such a name? and I told him he would have to prove it to me; and he said, 'I know you very well, and I will prove it. You are very well known to us; you are Q 4926. just the very man we want.' He never let go of me, and I could not get
Q. 4927. away at all. . . . . He never let go of me . . . . He arrested me, and took me away, and at the same moment Mr. Ruppert came out from the
Q. 4928. place. . . . . When I turned round I saw another policeman, who I now know as an Inspector, come along, but he never touched me or spoke to me." The witness called out to Ruppert in German to tell his (witness's) wife what had
Q. 4933. happened to him. The Inspector then asked him what he wanted from Ruppert. The words he said to Ruppert were, "I told him to go home and tell my wife what had happened, and that I was locked up." Then the Inspector said to him, "Who is Ruppert, and what do you want from him?" and the witness told him, "He is the man I told you I was waiting for." The witness then proceeded with the Inspector to the station, but before getting there the Inspector turned round to Ruppert, who was following him, and asked him what he wanted. The witness heard Ruppert say he
Q. 4937. was going to tell his (witness's) wife what had happened. The Inspector said, "Well then, go your way," and Ruppert replied, "I am going my way." The Inspector then turned round to the other Inspector and told him quietly, "You had better take him too," and then Ruppert, who was standing perfectly still, was taken into custody by the other Inspector without any provocation. The Inspector who had witness then took hold of the collar of his coat and pushed him along violently. We now give his own words: "He pushed me to and fro until we got to Great Marlborough Street, just outside the De Dion Bouton Motor Garage, and asked me quietly, 'What are you doing for a living now?' I told him I was not going to answer him; there was a proper place and time for that. I was too disgusted with the treatment I had received and with everything altogether, so I was not going to answer him. Then he said, 'Won't you answer me?' and he said, 'I will teach you then,' and he pushed me down and shook me violently till my cap fell off. He asked me to pick the cap up, and I did not do that at once, so he pushed me right down on the pavement to pick the cap up. . . . . He said, 'I will shake your very entrails out, you thin-gutted herring.' And at that time my friend Mr. Ruppert was marched past by the other Inspector." He said that the Inspector in whose custody he was, "pushed him down violently" to pick up his cap, and that he had hold of him by the neck. On arrival at the station Altfultdisch was, according to his evidence, taken into a dark room in the back and not into the charge room. There he said that Inspector Mackay (i.e., the Inspector who had arrested him) shut the door and then began to strike him both on the head, and the shoulders, and all over his body. He said that he struck him with his fist, saying at the same time, "I will teach you dirty ponce not to answer me," and that he struck him so long that he shouted "Murder" and "Help" till he slid down on a seat quite exhausted. He described the striking as very violent. The Inspector then went outside, and a few moments afterwards a plain clothes man came in, and he began hitting witness in the same way. He knocked him about with his fist. The witness was then taken to the charge room and charged with disorderly conduct. Asked by Lord Russell whether he made any complaint to the Inspector, he answered: "No, not at all, I was too frightened to say anything, because I did not know what would have happened to me if I had complained. I was too frightened. I was determined to state my case, at any rate to the magistrate, and I thought I would get satisfaction there." After being charged he was taken to the cells. He said he asked if he could have bail, and the constable who took him to the cell said that he would see about that later on. Altfuldisch looked at his watch, and it was about 12.45 p.m. Altfuldisch said he was very ill in the cell, and did not know what to do with himself. When he sat down he thought he was going to die; he had to lie down and when he lay down he had to get up again, and he rang the bell dozens of times but no one answered it. Later on he heard a noise outside in the gangway, and he knocked, and a little hole in the centre of the door opened, and a constable asked him what he wanted. He said, "What about my bail? and I should like to have a doctor because I feel ill. I have been ill-treated down there in the station." The constable said, "Oh!" The witness said that he complained to the constable that he had been ill-treated and knocked about in the station, and that he should like to have his doctor. The constable then said, "You had better give me your bail and I will see about it." Altfuldisch was bailed out at 5.20 in the morning.

In cross-examination by Mr. Eldon Bankes, Altfuldisch admitted that on the 18th December, at the Police Court, he did not make any complaint to the Magistrate of ill-treatment by the police, but explained the omission by saying that he wanted more witnesses, and asked for a remand, that the case was remanded till the 26th December, when he was represented by Counsel and Solicitor, and that he then told his story to the Magistrate as he had done before us. He admitted to Mr. Eldon Bankes that when he got out of Wede's Hotel "there was a rare lot of noise and a rare lot of people about the road." Then he was asked, "Were those people fighting and quarrelling amongst themselves?" and he replied, "I did not take particular notice of that, because it had nothing to do with me." He afterwards denied that he saw any fighting whatever going on, nor did he see any arrests whatever made, though he saw the police moving people on. He repeated that he stood on the edge of the pavement waiting for his friends, and that he was attacked from behind from the roadside. He saw the Inspector, whom he afterwards knew as Inspector Manning, on that night after he was arrested, and he saw him at the station. Inspector Manning did not say a word to him before he was arrested. He did not tell him to move on. He denied using the words, "We

He said he did not catch hold of the railings in Soho Square, nor did he call his friend Ruppert to assist him.

Q. 5130, &c. Theodore Ruppert, who described himself as a florist in the employ of Messrs. Anthos & Co., of 72, Baker Street, and residing at 23, Blandford Street, Baker Street, said he had known Altfuldisch for about two years. He (Ruppert) was a member of the Florists' Society, and Altfuldisch and Reuscher accepted his invitation and came to the meeting which was held on the 16th December, 1905. When closing time came, and the meeting broke up, Altfuldisch and Reuscher went, and he said to them, "Just wait outside for me," because he had to settle the bill with the restaurant keeper. That took not quite ten minutes, and when he had finished the business, and got outside, the first thing he saw was Altfuldisch arrested, standing between two Inspectors about fifteen or twenty yards off. Altfuldisch called to him twice, and asked him, "Will you go home to my wife, and tell my wife what is the matter with me." The witness then said, "I said I would send some other friends who had been at the same meeting, and I turned down the street to find some of his friends; I found some about ten yards or further down the street, and I asked them, 'Do you know why Mr. Altfuldisch is taken by the police?' No one could tell me." The witness then, being unable to find out why he had been arrested, returned, and went behind the Inspectors on the way to the station, as Altfuldisch lives three doors from the station. The witness said he was about five yards behind at first, when suddenly one of the Inspectors (Inspector Mackay) told him to "Move along," and at the same time said to the other Inspector, "You had better take him (meaning witness) as well," and then he was taken. Being asked "Did you understand then that you were arrested?" he replied, "Certainly not. I had never been arrested in England. I thought I must go to the station and explain to the police what I knew." He said that he did not struggle at all, and went quite quietly. He said that he was behind Inspector Mackay and Altfuldisch, and he saw the Inspector push Altfuldisch along a few times, and push him very hard. He had him by the neck, and he pushed him like this (illustrating in the witness box). Altfuldisch did not struggle or cry out. The Inspector who took him had hold of his arm. When he got to the station he was placed in the charge room, and the Inspector (Manning) came in, pushed him in a chair, and said, "Sit down" (the witness told us that he stood up again), but the Inspector told him, "Sit down." He (Ruppert) made no complaint of his treatment. He was charged, so he told us, "with standing in a crowd of foreigners, fighting and using bad language, and with interfering with the police," but the formal charge, as appears from the charge sheet, was simply for "obstructing the police in the execution of their duty." In further examination by Lord Russell, he said he could not remember what they said the charge against him was at the police station. He admitted he did not take much notice, and alleged that he did not know he was arrested. A policeman took him to the cell. He saw nothing of Altfuldisch while he was at the station, but he said that when he (Ruppert) got to the cell he heard three or four times loud screams, and he knew Altfuldisch's voice. He heard Altfuldisch crying "Help," and said it was very near to his cell, but he could not say how far.

Ruppert was cross-examined as to what took place before the Magistrate on the Monday, and he admitted in substance that he heard Inspector Manning say that he had attempted to rescue his friend, Altfuldisch, from the custody of Inspector Mackay, and, being asked as to what he told the Magistrate, he said he explained to the Magistrate everything "the same as what I have said to-day." He was fined 20s. and costs. He explained to us that beyond what he told the Magistrate he had made no complaint, and that he would not take the case further because he thought he had better lose the 20s., and he did not wish to lose his time. His statements as to what took place when his case was tried were by no means clear, but, in the end, he told the Chairman that he was very busy in his shop and could not stop any longer (i.e., at the Court), and that he did not make any explanation about his case. That is probably correct, as no notes of evidence appear to have been taken by the Clerk at the Police Court.

Qs. 5328–5329.
Q. 5327.

Q. 13740, &c. William Maurer said that he was a gardener in the employ of Mr. Clark of Priory Lane, Putney, and had been so for sixteen months (i.e., when examined before us). He is a member of the Florists' Society, and he was present at the meeting at Wede's Hotel on the 16th December, 1905. He did not then know Altfuldisch. At midnight he and others went out and were waiting until some other friends came out. He could not say exactly how many were with him, but he should guess about ten or twelve were standing outside, and he was talking to two others. He said that there was no noise and no disturbance at all in the street. After wishing the two friends with whom he was talking good night he turned round and followed the President and several members of the Club. There were five or six of them; he could not tell exactly, because there were several more coming out of the hotel. It was after that he was arrested. He described the arrest in these words: "The first I knew was that I felt a push. I did not see any policeman before. I felt a push on my back, and I turned round and said, 'We are not obliged to run.' There was Ruppert and another gentleman in there—I do not know who was with Ruppert, but he was paying the bill of the Club, that is all I said, 'I am not obliged to run,' and I felt a push towards another police constable, and the Inspector said, 'Take this man.'" The Inspector was, as witness has since ascertained, Inspector Mackay. The other constable took him to the police station where he was taken before the Inspector. He (witness) did not say anything but stood there (in the charge room). The Inspector asked him to sit down, and he said, "Thank you." He thought he was coming out again. He thought that he would give his evidence there, and that then he could go out. Inspector Mackay came to the station afterwards and pushed him down on to the bench. So far as witness could recollect, Inspector Mackay told the Inspector in the charge room that they were fighting and using bad language, and were disorderly. He did not say anything to the Inspector about the charge then, but after the Inspector came upstairs and asked, the witness told him he did not know what he was arrested for, and thereupon he told him exactly what had happened, and he said that he complained of ill-treatment by Inspector Mackay in the charge room. We had better give his exact words. "I have to say something more about that. Then I was searched in the pockets, and Inspector Mackay behaved to me like a dog. He searched my pockets, and I thought he was going to pull my overcoat from me. I had several papers in my overcoat, but I do not recollect what they were—letter and postcards, and a couple of cigars. They went in the fire. I did not get them back. . . . I had several letters and postcards in my overcoat pocket, and I believe there was a programme of that evening there, and a few cigars I had in my pocket. He threw them in the fire in front of me." Asked whether, when he was bailed out, he did not get those back, he said, "No; my knife and pencil case and things like that I got back, but not the other things." He informed us that he was detained at the station for about thirteen hours, and was only bailed out at 1.20 on Sunday afternoon. He said that he thought that they sent for bail to Barnes, and, as far as he knew, the policeman was in Barnes early in the morning about 9 o'clock. He went to the Police Court on the Monday morning, and he heard the charge made against him. He said that he told the Magistrate the case as it was, and that what Inspector Mackay said was false. He did not think he was sworn, and he believed he made his statement in the dock. The Magistrate fined him 10s. or seven days, and he paid the fine.

In cross-examination by Mr. Eldon Bankes it came out that there were from twenty-five to thirty persons present at the meeting of the Florists' Society on the night in question, but he thought there were not so many as twenty there when closing time came, because most of them had to go away to catch the last train. . . . . He denied that any members of the Florists' Society were singing, or that there was any quarrelling in the street, and said that he did not hear the police telling the people to move on. Cross-examined as to whether there was any fighting going on close to him the witness said he did not see, and he denied that he himself fell to the ground. Asked whether Inspector Mackay caught hold of him he said, "Yes, with both hands under the arms from the back;" but only for a moment while pushing him to a constable. Asked whether he could identify P.C. 134 C, who stood forward, the witness failed to do so. He said that he spoke to the constable who took him to the station, and that he asked the constable what he was arrested for, and that the constable said, "I cannot help it, I have got to take you to the station." The witness did not see Altfuldisch at all at the station, but Ruppert was brought into the same charge room as he was. He also said that when the charge was read over to him he told the Inspector that he was not disorderly, that he was talking to his friends, and so forth. Upon Inspector Remfry standing forward the

Q. 13912.

We have now given in substance the allegation of each one of the three men who were thus arrested about the same time after coming out from this meeting of the Florists' Society. It is to be noticed that the complaints are not that the police in the course of actually quelling a disturbance or dispersing a crowd arrested the complainants wrongfully, because they themselves were not concerned in what was taking place, or that the police constables took them by mistake for the real disturbers of the police, nor is there any connection alleged between the arrest of Maurer and the arrest of Altfuldisch. Ruppert's arrest is indeed represented as having occurred on the way to the station when he was following his friend, and, therefore, as being to some extent connected with the apprehension of that prisoner; but the arrest of Altfuldisch and the arrest of Maurer are two quite independent transactions, and each of them is, if we are to believe the statements made, entirely without justification by reason of any misconduct on the part of the men arrested.

The Police Case.

The police answer to the case amounts to an entirely different story, and, as will be seen, the arrest of Maurer was first of all effected because he was actually engaged in fighting with another man, and on his being handed over to another constable (P.C. Fleet, 134 C) Inspector Mackay arrested Altfuldisch in the middle of a crowd that had gathered round Maurer, because the Inspector was trying to disperse the crowd which was becoming very hostile, and Altfuldisch in particular refused to go away and used abusive language towards the police.

Q. 5473.

Five members of the Force gave evidence before us in the course of the hearing, namely, S.D.I. Mackay, Inspector Manning, Sergeant Crayfourd, P.C. Miles, and Inspector Remfry, and besides the first two of these, P.C. Fleet was also called during the inquiry into Maurer's case.

We think it better to give Inspector Mackay's account of the arrest in his own words, especially as he was the first officer who actively took steps when the condition of things in Greek Street was observed. Inspector Mackay is the S.D. Inspector attached to the Marlborough Street Police Station. He was on duty with Inspector Manning patrolling his sub-division at midnight on the 16th December, and he told us that in the course of his duty he passed through Old Compton Street and then came to Greek Street. He then told us in his own words that this is what occurred: "When we were at the junction of Greek Street and Old Compton Street we saw a crowd in Greek Street; we hurried up there, and on arriving there we found two men rolling on the ground; they were fighting, and they were making use of obscene language to each other. We got them up and they started to renew the fight. I took one into custody. I then called a constable who was coming down the street, and handed this man over to him" (that was Maurer, who was accidentally called Mander during a portion of the inquiry before us), "and he took that man away to the station. We remained behind, trying to disperse the crowd, which became very hostile. It appeared to be some squabble between two gangs that had met there. One party had come out of Wede's Hotel or Restaurant, and the other out of the Café Turc. Both places are close together. I knew a large number of those who were present, including Mr. Altfuldisch. . . . . I knew what his occupation was, and where he lived. I first came in contact with him whilst attending those meetings at Wede's Hotel. It was a place that was under my observation for some time, and I visited it for that purpose." Going on from that point and continuing the story the Inspector said, "We were trying to get them away. I told them to go away myself several times, and Inspector Manning did likewise. They moved slightly down towards the Café Turc, where the crowd increased. Mr. Altfuldisch turned round and said, 'No, we shall not go away. Why should we care for the f——English police? You are not dealing with ponces.' Things began to become serious, and I took him into custody. He screamed and shouted to the crowd to assist him. I told Inspector Manning to keep the crowd back and I would manage him. We struggled along till we got to Soho Square, right opposite the hospital. He was shouting all the time to his friends, and said, 'I will show you what I will do with your bulldog English policeman,' and at that moment he threw his legs around me. We struggled and fell. He seized hold of the railings of Soho Square and had to be forcibly dragged away. . . . . Inspector Manning assisted me. We then went along to Carlisle Street, when Ruppert came in front. He was shouting and saying, 'You shall not take him,' and he got in front of Altfuldisch and myself. We could not get rid of him. Inspector Manning took him in custody, and we decided to send for more assistance. . . . We went on until we came to Portland Street—that is a few yards further, about twenty yards further. Mr. Manning passed me there and went on ahead with Ruppert. . . . When I got into Portland Street, at the junction of Marlborough Street, Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles came running to my assistance. Altfuldisch struggled all the way, and he threw his legs out to one side first and then to the other. He was taken to the police station." Sergeant Crayfourd helped the Inspector after he joined him and the prisoner. Inspector Mackay told us that when they got to the station Altfuldisch was put into the waiting room because the charge room was full of people and there were charges being taken. "It was utterly impossible for the officer to get on with his work with the disturbance Altfuldisch was making. . . . . I put him on the seat in the waiting room," and as soon as he (the Inspector) turned his back "he rushed after me. I pushed him back on the seat again and he struggled and screamed." The prisoner then sat down for a few moments, and Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles stood in the doorway, and Inspector Mackay stood by the prisoner till some of the charges were disposed of. The prisoner was screaming "About 'you b—— policemen,' and all sorts of things." The Inspector denied that there was any truth in the suggestion that the prisoner was ill-treated in the waiting room, though there certainly was a struggle there caused by his own conduct. In due course Altfuldisch was placed in the dock and the charge was repeated to him in front of the Inspector who took the charge. The charge was taken down in writing and put on the charge sheet. After it was put on the charge sheet it was read over to him. He was asked for his name and address in the usual way and his age. The prisoner was taken out of the dock and having been searched was taken down to the cells. The Inspector only stayed for a short time in the station after that. He said he did notice some ponces (i.e., bullies) among the people, but he said that he did not call Altfuldisch by that name. The Inspector attended the Police Court on the Monday morning when Maurer's case was taken first, and he did not contest the charge and was fined 10s. Ruppert's case was then taken, and Inspector Manning gave evidence before him, and Inspector Mackay corroborated his statement. Ruppert did not contest the charge, and he was fined 20s. Altfuldisch's case was then commenced and Inspector Mackay and his comrade Inspector Manning gave evidence and the case was remanded to the 26th. In the result Altfuldisch was convicted and fined 20s. or fourteen days.

In the course of cross-examination by Lord Russell, the Inspector said that he had nothing whatever to say against Altfuldisch's general character, and that he was of good behaviour as a rule, but that he kept company on occasions with undesirable persons. He said there were ponces among those who came out of Wede's Hotel, but the Inspector could not tell whether there were any at the Florists' Society, and that the last man he had had to deal with (i.e., before the date at which he was giving evidence before us) had a card of the Society upon him. Altfuldisch was excited when the Inspector first saw him. The man was not drunk but he had had quite sufficient. He was talking to someone in German, and was about ten yards from the hotel when the Inspector saw him. They were not themselves quarrelling, but they were certainly on the borders of it. He also said at the Police Court that on the way to the station Altfuldisch behaved like a wild beast. Lord Russell asked him what was the cause of his changing suddenly into behaving like a wild beast from the inoffensive behaviour that was described before, and the witness replied, "He was not behaving quietly when I saw him, because when I saw him first he was labouring under a very strong excitement over some matter, and that excitement only increased until it became what was nothing more than outrageous." Further examined on the point, the witness being asked: "Anyhow, you tell us to-day when you first saw Altfuldisch he was doing nothing that made it necessary to arrest him," answered, "If he had gone away." Then he added, "I saw he was not taking any notice of what I told him to do, and he was surrounded by a number of persons who were looking to him as their leader. The mob that he was surrounded by, as I have said before, was a very undesirable mob, and with a man like him acting in the way he did I could only see one ending to it. He was defying me to clear these people out of this street, and they were looking to him for their leadership, as it were. Q. 5673. They were following his advice." Then the Inspector told us that Greek Street was one of the very worst streets he had to deal with as mentioned above. The Inspector categorically denied that he addressed Altfuldisch by an offensive name. Qs. 5674–5675. He said, "I used no language of that kind. It was continually referred to, as I said yesterday, and the word was frequently used amongst the crowd. 'Why do not you clear away these dirty ponces?' some people were shouting from the windows in the street." In answer to a question from the Commissioners a further explanation was given by Inspector Mackay as to the origin of the affair, and from his answers it appears that what first attracted his attention on this evening was a fight going on between the man Maurer, who was arrested, and somebody else. He Q. 5790. did not see the fight commence; he saw them on the ground. They got up and he and the police tried to get them away, but they would not go and they Q. 5791. started again, so Maurer was taken into custody. The Inspector said: "There are two different gangs, undoubtedly, that meet at this very spot, because one Q. 5792. gang that goes there frequents a place called the Café Turc, which is a very low class place, and the second gang frequents the Wede's Hotel." Then we said, "Both houses are in the same category," and the Inspector replied, "Yes; Italians and Q. 5794. Frenchmen frequent one place, and Germans the other." The Inspector could give no suggestion as to what the quarrel was about, but there was considerable excitement on the part of the men who were around the people fighting. They were conversing Q. 5796. in foreign languages, and as they always do they were throwing their arms about and shouting wildly. He suggested that "undesirables" went to the Florists' Q. 5798 Society meetings in order to try to make themselves appear respectable by mixing with respectable men. Some of them were, undoubtedly, of the character Q. 5799. known as "ponces," and the Inspector said he knew them very well, because he had found cards of respectable societies on them when he had searched them, and Q. 5800. that they keep those cards on them in order to give them an air of respectability. The Inspector told us that they always keep as many men around that neighbourhood (i.e., Greek Street) as they possibly can, but as charges arise the constables have to go away, and for that reason every Saturday night he made it a standing rule to patrol that part of the district. We ought to mention here that it appeared that the Magistrate had declined to receive evidence of the alleged assault on Altfuldisch Q. 5816. at the police station as being irrelevant to the charge then being tried, so neither Sergeant Crayfourd nor P.C. Miles gave evidence in Altfuldisch's case at the Police Court, and no summons for assault had ever been taken out against Inspector Mackay. The Inspector told us that he had said to the solicitor for the defence Q. 5837. at the time that although he was a police officer he was entitled to a little fair play, and that he could not see why he (the solicitor for the defence) was adopting the back-door policy he did. If he had wanted to make out that these outrageous things had occurred why had he not applied for a summons? Speaking further Qs. 5841–5844. with regard to the difficulties under which the police labour in that part of the division he said the fact that these people gathered in a crowd talking in a foreign language, and behaving impetuously made it necessary for the police to act swiftly. He described the foreigners as "impetuous," and said they often stabbed each other or shot one another, and that several cases of that kind had occurred. They were undoubtedly dangerous persons, and especially when a prisoner is being taken to the station there is always a danger of someone coming behind and stabbing the constable, or something of that sort. During his time he had known of several cases of shooting and stabbing.

Inspector William Manning, C Division, who was stationed at Great Marl- Q. 5852. borough Street Police Station, said he was patrolling in Old Compton Street on the early morning of the 17th December, 1905, and when he got to the junction of Old Compton Street and Greek Street he met S.D.I. Mackay. He noticed a crowd some hundred yards up the street in the centre of the road, nearly opposite the Café Turc. He and the Inspector hurried up the street in the centre of the roadway. Inspector Manning then (we use his own words) said: "I saw two men on the ground, and I Q. 5860. saw the Inspector go to them. They got up. I was in the crowd trying to disperse it, and saying, 'Pass along.' I saw Altfuldisch there. He was not on the pavement then; he was in the crowd. He was excited. I spoke to him, and said, 'Pass along,' yards, and I saw a constable come from the top of Greek Street from Soho Square down into Greek Street, hurrying towards us. I let Inspector Mackay go on then, and went back and helped to keep this crowd from pressing forward. Inspector Mackay came back, and I suppose he had handed the prisoner over to the constable who came up, and he and I afterwards passed one another in this crowd, and I was calling out, 'Pass along' until I saw him arrest Altfuldisch. . . . . I heard him make use of the expression 'f———-g police.' . . . . I heard that word repeated in the Q. 5862.

that he and Inspector Mackay were saying, "Pass along, get away out of it," in the usual way with an excited crowd, while Altfuldisch was saying, "Do not get away," as he (witness) thought, to his friends in the crowd. They passed through into Carlisle Street, and there was a temporary halt where Carlisle Street crosses over Dean Street. At that time, he (Inspector Manning) was keeping the crowd back, and he saw a man who was in front of Inspector Mackay and the prisoner, almost between them; and he (Inspector Manning) got six or eight yards up to them again, and he (the man) got behind them, and caught hold of Inspector Mackay's arm, pulling him. He (Inspector Manning) then arrested the man. He gave the name of Ruppert. He took Ruppert Q. 5873.

job to keep up with him. They turned into Great Marlborough Street and into the station. When he (Inspector Manning) got to the door he saw two plain clothes officers and told them to hurry down to Inspector Mackay's assistance. At the door were Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles. He took his prisoner into the Q. 5875.

charged, and he (Altfuldisch) made no complaint at all of his treatment.

In cross-examination by Lord Russell the witness said that at the time of Ruppert's arrest a crowd of twenty or thirty people were following; they kept behind, but witness would not say it was not a dangerous crowd. He arrived at the station five or eight minutes before Inspector Mackay and Altfuldisch. Witness also told us he said to Ruppert when arresting him, "I shall take you to the station." Q. 5939.
Ruppert said, "What for?" The Inspector answered, "You have obstructed that officer" (i.e., Inspector Mackay), "and I shall arrest you."

That is the substance of the evidence which was given by Inspector Manning before us in Altfuldisch's case. He was also called in the course of our inquiry in Maurer's case, and, to some extent, his evidence of course covered the same ground. It is worth while noticing, however, that according to his recollection, when he Q. 15004.
first saw Maurer on the ground two men were on the ground; and he also gave us the additional information that Inspector Mackay entered the crowd prior to him Q. 15005.
"some eight or nine paces." Inspector Mackay immediately went to the two men who were down. He (witness) was then outside the crowd and attempting to make his way in when he saw Inspector Mackay with a prisoner whom he had got up. By the time he (witness) got to the centre of the crowd he had turned round, and witness saw another man by his left arm, and he got him away. He went away hurriedly through the crowd, and he took it that it was the second man that was on the ground. He saw Inspector Mackay raise Maurer from the ground. Q. 15006.

In cross-examination it was pointed out to him that there was no suggestion in his evidence in Altfuldisch's case that he tried to get the two men. The witness, however, insisted that he tried to keep with Inspector Mackay, but could not, owing to the crowd. When witness got to the centre of the crowd and said Q. 15032, &c. 'Pass along," the man (that is to say, the second man) hurriedly put his head down and went away; otherwise, he would have arrested him. Witness did not hear what passed between Inspector Mackay and Maurer, and did not hear Q. 15050. Maurer say, "We are not bound to run." He did not hear obscene language from Maurer in particular, but he heard a lot of it in the crowd. In answer to the Chairman he said that when he came to within a few yards of the edge of the crowd, Q. 15065. he could see they were all looking down, and there was a movement as if persons Q. 15067. were on the ground. Inspector Mackay got into the crowd first; he had to force Q. 15068. his way. He also saw Inspector Mackay go down and come up again.

P.C. George Fleet, 134 C, was not called in Altfuldisch's case, but gave evidence during our inquiry into Maurer's complaint, and told us what he saw of the affair. He was on beat duty round Greek Street and Soho Square and Charing Cross Road. Q. 15109, &c. As he came round Soho Square towards Greek Street he saw the crowd and Inspector Mackay there. He rushed up to the crowd, and Inspector Mackay gave him a man (Maurer), and said, "Take this man to the station and wait till I come." He did so. On the way Maurer said nothing to him about having been improperly arrested, though he muttered something in a foreign language. He was taken into the charge room where he sat down. The witness stayed there, however, until Inspector Q. 15117. Mackay came in, when he (witness) said, "Your charge," and walked out. In Q. 15177, &c examination by Mr. Dickinson, P.C. Fleet said he could not say whether the prisoner had any dirt on him, or what was the condition of his hat. He noticed nothing amiss with him. He had been in Greek Street before that night about an hour Q. 15141. previously, and he had seen nothing unusual.

Besides these members of the Force, we examined Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles, 79 C, to whose evidence, in our opinion, considerable importance ought to be attached, though it only bears upon a part of the events that occurred.

Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles were in plain clothes and standing outside the station when Inspector Manning came up with Ruppert, who, as we know, was the first of the three prisoners to arrive at the station. Sergeant Crayfourd was just Q. 6173, &c. going off duty, when Inspector Manning arrived with his prisoner, and told him something to the effect that Inspector Mackay had a violent prisoner, and asked him to go to his assistance. He, together with P.C. Miles, ran along to the end of Marlborough Street where they met Inspector Mackay with a man whom they afterwards learned to be Altfuldisch. They were struggling and appeared to have come to a standstill. The Sergeant took hold of Altfuldisch's arm and assisted him to the station. On the way to the station the prisoner behaved violently, kicking, Q 6185, struggling, and shouting all the way. When they arrived at the station they took him to the charge room door, and, from there, straight through to the waiting room. Prisoner continued his violence for about three minutes, and the Sergeant assisted Inspector Mackay to restrain him. After that he got somewhat quieter and sat down by himself. A bright incandescent gaslight was burning in the waiting room, and Inspector Mackay was at no time in the room with the man alone. No violence Q. 6190. was used towards him, although restraint was put upon him. Being asked to describe what sort of restraint was put upon him, the Sergeant replied, "After we Q. 6190. took him into the charge room he was asked to sit down. He sat down at first, and then he jumped up and rushed towards the door as if he was going out of the Police Station. He was then restrained by Inspector Mackay and myself, and he sat down Q. 6193, &c again." He told us it was false that the Inspector had struck him continuously whilst in the room, and the door was not shut at all. He (the Sergeant) and P.C. Miles were there the whole time. The Sergeant also denied that either he or P.C. Miles assaulted the prisoner.

Sergeant Crayfourd's evidence was confirmed by P.C. Miles.

Character of the Case.

It is not denied by the complainants that when they with ten or eleven others left Wede's Hotel, Greek Street was noisy and crowded. A large number of persons were also leaving other restaurants or places of entertainment at the same time; and whether Maurer was concerned in it or not, there can be no doubt some disturbance did suddenly commence a few minutes after the Wede's Hotel party broke up, and some members of the party, including the complainants, were then in the street. The story of each complainant is the same up to the point at which they all three got into Greek Street, but from that point the story in each case is different. Altfuldisch did not see Maurer arrested, nor did Maurer see what happened to Altfuldisch. Both, however, were arrested quite near Wede's Hotel, from which they had come out almost at the same moment. As to Ruppert, it is common ground that he was arrested after Altfuldisch, and while following him to the station. Altfuldisch's story is that he was wantonly arrested while quietly walking alone at a place where the street was quite clear, and there was no person near him, within ten or fifteen yards. Maurer, according to his account, after leaving Wede's Hotel, talked for a moment to two friends, and then wished them good night, and then, after turning round and following the president and several members of the club, felt a push on his back, and was thereupon arrested without any provocation on his part. Ruppert, finding Altfuldisch was arrested, followed with a view of going to Altfuldisch's house to tell his wife in order that he might be bailed out, and he says that he was arrested after a conversation with Inspector Mackay, who had Altfuldisch in custody, in which he told the Inspector that he must go the same way to see the prisoner's wife.

Each one of these separate arrests is, if we are to believe these gentlemen, entirely unwarranted by anything that anyone of them said or did. That would, of course, under any circumstances, be primâ facie a very strange thing, whoever the constables concerned might have been, but it is still stranger when one takes into account the fact that two of the three constables actually concerned in the arrests were officers of such long experience and tried capacity and integrity as Inspector Mackay and Inspector Manning; and if there were any reason to believe that the men, who undoubtedly came from a kind of convivial entertainment, were drunk, or were to any considerable extent under the influence of liquor, one would be inclined to dismiss the case at once. But these three men were sober. It ought to be noticed that these two Inspectors did not allege that any one of these three men was drunk, though the former thought that Altfuldisch, whom he knew as a respectable journeyman tailor, had had quite as much as was good for him on this occasion.

The case that the complainants make against Inspector Mackay and Inspector Manning is of a very serious character, amounting to a wholly improper and arbitrary exercise of the powers vested in them.

Corroborative Evidence.

We know that at the time when the meeting of the Florists' Society came to an end a good many of those who had been present earlier in the evening (seemingly about twenty five) had gone to catch their trains, and so forth, and it appears from a statement made by one of the witnesses called in Altfuldisch's case that there were fourteen or fifteen men left at the end when the landlord told them they must leave, and that all except Ruppert then left. If so, then about fourteen members and guests at the meeting went out into Greek Street at midnight or a minute or two before. Of these three were subsequently arrested. Of the other ten or eleven left, who, as it is certain they were in Greek Street when the arrests were made, may have seen something of the affair, four were called before us—Henry Reuscher, Gabriel Schumann, Frederick Burton and Alfred Brant. Q. 5432, &c.

It seems unnecessary to go over their evidence in detail.

When the evidence of these persons is compared with that on the other side, it seems to us to be clear that the arrests were not effected until about ten minutes past 12; and one cannot help asking the question, why should they have waited in the street? Altfuldisch's explanation is that he was waiting for Ruppert, and that seems a good one enough. The accounts of Schumann, Burton, and Maurer, suggest no explanation at all except what primâ facie was a quite adequate one that they were conversing together; but when we take into account the fact that Altfuldisch himself admitted that the street was very noisy and very full of people, and that Reuscher, who, as we know, can only have been there a few minutes before he went off for his bag, and was therefore talking of the condition of things when they first came out, also said that some of their own party were "a bit jolly," and showed it by "speaking and larking together," that one of them was singing and only left off when the Inspector told him to, and that there was also loud speaking by others, it is perfectly clear that there was between midnight and ten minutes past 12 ample opportunity for conversation to develope into quarrelling, and for quarrelling to develope into fighting. So that when we closely look at the evidence of these witnesses in the light of what we know about Greek Street, and the sort of scene that takes place there when it is crowded just after the public-houses are closed, there is nothing very improbable in the fact that parties of men of different nationalities hanging about and talking after various convivial meetings should come to loggerheads. One is, of course, reluctant to come to the conclusion that these witnesses came before us with a deliberate intention of misleading us, and, so far as Reuscher and Brant are concerned, we see nothing in their evidence which may not be true quite consistently with the substance of the case made by the police. With regard to Schumann, that is not the case, because, as he alleges that he was standing quite near to Maurer when he was arrested, it hardly seems possible that he would not have observed that he was on the ground, as alleged by Inspector Mackay, if indeed that was the case. The question whether Ruppert is speaking falsely or not depends very much upon the question whether Altfuldisch was going to the station quietly. Ruppert saw nothing of the arrest, as we know, and he made anxious inquiries as to what had taken place when he saw Altfuldisch in custody; and it is common ground that something was said either at once or on the way to the station about Ruppert going to see Altfuldisch's wife with a view to getting him bailed out. If we are to believe Ruppert, he was quietly following, although his friend was being pushed along roughly by the constable. His evidence as to the way in which Altfuldisch was going to the station is in direct conflict with that of the Inspectors, and the question whether he is right upon that point may be taken as a touchstone of his his veracity. Of four witnesses called to corroborate the complainants, not one except Schumann alleges that he saw the actual arrest of Maurer or Aldfuldisch. Schumann's evidence amounts to a denial of the Inspector's statement that he found Maurer fighting and lifted him from the ground.

Looking therefore at the matter upon the whole, the direct conflict of evidence is between Altfuldisch, Maurer, Schumann, and Ruppert on the one side, and Inspector Mackay and Inspector Manning on the other. Here, as in several of the other cases, we have men who may be described as of good character telling us a story which is directly at variance with the evidence given by police officers equally entitled to credit; and here, therefore, as in other cases, we can only solve the problems raised by reference to the probabilities of the case and by inferences from facts either proved or admitted.

Time and General Circumstances of the Arrest.

Let us now see what are the chief relevant facts as to which there is no doubt. An entertainment of a perfectly harmless kind had taken place on the night in question at Wede's Hotel. The party broke up at closing time, when the advent of midnight was signified to them by the landlord of the hotel. Some fourteen or fifteen members of the party still remained, and all of those, with the exception of Ruppert, who remained to pay the bill, went out at a minute or two before midnight. Altfuldisch and Reuscher went out together, and were a little apart from any other members of the party who remained behind. Reuscher two or three minutes afterwards left Altfuldisch standing at a short distance from the hotel entrance to go to Wardour Street to fetch his bag. Three other members of the party (Pingel, Schumann and Burton), waited somewhere near the entrance in conversation and were joined some time afterwards by Maurer. As to these facts there seems to be no doubt, and they are not in the least inconsistent with what was told us by the police witnesses. Shortly afterwards (we shall call attention to the time in a moment) two members of the party (Altfuldisch and Maurer) are in the custody of the police. Maurer is taken to the Police Station by P.C. Fleet and Inspector Mackay, accompanied by Inspector Manning, is taking Altfuldisch to the same Police Station. He is followed, after an interval, by Ruppert, and on the way to the station Ruppert himself is arrested by Inspector Manning and himself taken to the station, proceeding with such alacrity that they arrived there before Inspector Mackay and Altfuldisch. On arrival at the station Inspector Manning gave instructions to Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles to go to the assistance of Inspector Mackay, because he had a violent prisoner in custody. Those facts also seem to be beyond dispute.

There is no indication in the evidence of any one of these witnesses that they were surprised that the police were intervening and ordering people to move along, although, of course, there is the suggestion from one or two of them that there was no necessity for interfering with themselves, and the whole case rests upon the allegation that the police action, so far as Maurer and Altfuldisch in particular were concerned, was entirely unjustifiable. There is nothing in their evidence, or in that of Altfuldisch and Maurer themselves, when it comes to be examined, which shows that Inspector Mackay and Inspector Manning were in the least degree exceeding their duty in ordering persons loitering and talking in Greek Street, and a fortiori persons noisily talking or quarrelling to move along with a view to keeping order; and even if it were shown that Maurer had not fallen, and was not fighting, we should have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that if he and Altfuldisch did not move on but persisted in remaining under the prevailing conditions, their behaviour would have been so disorderly as to have justified their arrest by the Inspector. But it is clear that the case against these prisoners was much stronger than that, if the Inspectors are right. Not only was Maurer fighting, but after he had been arrested, and the Inspector and the crowd moved down towards the Café Turc, Altfuldisch, in response to further commands to move along, turned round and said, "No, we shall not,' and cried out, "Why should we care for the f—— English police; you are not dealing with ponces," and when he was arrested he screamed and shouted to the crowd to assist him. If the allegations of the police are true there can be no doubt whatever that both arrests were thoroughly justifiable, and indeed, necessary, in the interest of order. If the matter stood there, we should conclude as a result of our observation of the witnesses and our considerations of the circumstances that we must accept the police account.

There are also two incidents clearly proved which confirm Inspector Mackay's evidence. First, according to Maurer's first account of his arrest it came about in this way. He felt a push on his back; he then turned round and said, "We are not obliged to run," then he felt a push towards another police constable, and the Inspector said, "Take this man," and P.C. Fleet did then take him to the Police Station. One gathers from that that he was standing face to face with Inspector Mackay when Inspector Mackay pushed him to the constable, and, if so, the actual apprehension took place by Inspector Mackay taking him by the arm and pushing him towards P.C. Fleet, who also took him by the arm in the usual way; at any rate it would appear that the arrest was made when Maurer was looking at the Inspector, and saying, "I am not obliged to run," or something of that kind. But when he was cross-examined, after denying that he had fallen on the ground, he gave two answers which we may quote in full. "(Q.) Did Inspector Mackay catch hold of you at all? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did he hold you? (A.) Yes, with both hands under the arms from the back. (Q.) How long did he hold you? (A.) Only for a moment while pushing me to a constable." Q. 13878 Q. 13879. Q. 13880 Now that is exactly the way in which Inspector Mackay would be compelled to effect the arrest if in fact Maurer was on the ground as alleged. Inspector Manning saw Inspector Mackay bend down and rise up again, and that action was, he would have us believe, the action which the latter made in arresting Maurer who was then down; and, in fact, if Maurer was down, the proper and the ordinary way of effecting the arrest would be to bend down and catch hold of him with both the hands under the arms from the back exactly as Maurer said, and then, having got him upon his legs, to push him towards the constable who would then continue the arrest by taking hold of the prisoner's arms.

Secondly, there is the incident that took place when Inspector Manning arrived at the station with Ruppert and met Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles in plain clothes on the steps of the station. Now, that is not one which can have been fabricated for the purposes of the complaint before us. It is something that took place when neither Inspector Manning nor his comrades could have been certain that there would be any dispute at all about the propriety of the arrests. Inspector Manning arriving quite quickly with Ruppert, seeing the Sergeant and others in plain clothes, shouted out in passing into the station an order to them to go to Inspector Mackay because he had got a violent prisoner. If Altfuldisch was not violent, there was absolutely no reason for his asking or ordering these men to go to the Inspector's assistance, and one cannot help asking, why he should have done anything of the sort, if in fact the Inspector did not need help? We have there something actually done which is only capable of reasonable explanation upon the supposition that Altfuldisch was violent. Now we attach very great importance to this, because the question whether Altfuldisch was or was not resisting, whether he did or did not take hold of the railings, whether or not he had been screaming and shouting either continuously or at intervals, are all matters which are at issue between Altfuldisch and Inspector Mackay; and if the former is speaking untruly upon that point, it is obviously quite possible that he may be speaking falsely, or, at any rate, inaccurately in regard both to the earlier circumstances of his arrest and as to his treatment when he arrived in the waiting room at Marlborough Street Police Station. Quite apart from the actual corroboration afforded by the evidence of Sergeant Crayfourd and P. C. Miles, who promptly ran as directed to the assistance of the Inspector, the fact that Inspector Manning asked those officers to run off is one that seems to us to make it as nearly certain as anything can well be that Altfuldisch was behaving just as the Inspector informed us. The first of these points touches Maurer's and the second Altfuldisch's credibility. Both seem to us to damage their evidence very greatly.

We have come to the conclusion that both Altfuldisch and Maurer spoke falsely as to the circumstances of their arrest. We accept the evidence of Inspector Mackay and Inspector Manning as in substance true. That being so, it follows that they were, under the circumstances, justified in arresting Altfuldisch, Maurer, and Ruppert.

Altfuldisch complained not only that he had been wrongfully arrested but that he had been treated with unnecessary violence on the way to the station, and also assaulted and beaten without provocation after his arrival at the station. As to his alleged treatment on the way to the station nothing need be added to what we have said above. We are convinced that Altfuldisch resisted after he had been taken into custody, and accept in substance Inspector Mackay's and Inspector Manning's accounts of his conduct. That being so, we are all of opinion that Inspector Mackay did not use more force than was reasonably necessary under the circumstances to get so refractory a prisoner to the station.

Altfuldisch further, however, complains that upon arrival at the police station he was taken into a dark room at the back; that Inspector Mackay shut the door and then began to strike him both on the head and the shoulders, and all over his body; that he struck him with his fist, saying at the same time "I will teach you dirty ponce not to answer me"; and that he struck him so long that he shouted "Murder" and "Help" until he slid down on a seat quite exhausted. He also complained that afterwards, when the Inspector had gone outside, a plain clothes man came into the room and began hitting him in the same way, and knocked him about with his fist. It is common ground that the prisoner Altfuldisch was not taken straight into the charge room, partly because it is alleged that the room was already unusually full, and partly because Altfuldisch's behaviour was so noisy that his being brought into the charge room would hamper the proper conduct of the proceedings. It does not appear to us that in taking his prisoner into the waiting room Inspector Mackay was guilty of any breach of the regulations, and one can hardly say that under the circumstances it was imprudent on the Inspector's part. He told us that the door was not shut, and that Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles in plain clothes were standing where they could see all that went on in the room. The Inspector admitted that he used force, but says that he did so in consequence of Altfuldisch continuing his disorderly behaviour. If we were persuaded that Altfuldisch had come to the station quietly, we should hardly feel ourselves satisfied with the account that the Inspector gave of his treatment of the prisoner in this waiting room. The Inspector said that he put him on the seat in the waiting room, that as soon as he (the Inspector) turned his back he (Altfuldisch) rushed after him, and that he (the Inspector) then pushed him (Altfuldisch) back on the seat again, and that he struggled and screamed. Putting aside the question of the "rush," we think it would be quite unnecessary for the Inspector to compel the prisoner to sit on the seat. We make this observation, because in several cases into which we have inquired we have observed that complaints have been made by prisoners that they were forcibly made to sit down. We see no reason why compulsion should be used in regard to the matter at all, or why, if a prisoner is perfectly quiet, he should not be allowed to stand if he prefers doing so to sitting on a not very comfortable bench. Here, however, the point is merely of secondary importance, since we cannot believe Altfuldisch's account of what took place in the waiting room. We have seen that he behaved in a most improper and excited way when brought to the station, and we think it extremely likely that his excitement continued or was renewed from time to time when he was in the waiting room. We cannot forget that the Inspector knew Altfuldisch personally before the night in question, and however angry he may have felt with him he would be disposed to be, as he says he was, quite considerate towards him notwithstanding his unmanly and silly conduct. We have upon the point the evidence of Sergeant Crayfourd and P.C. Miles, who were looking on, which confirms in substance what the Inspector told us about this part of the case. We therefore reject Altfuldisch's evidence upon this point, and find that Inspector Mackay was not guilty of the misconduct alleged, and that the allegation that a plain clothes man "struck the prisoner" is quite devoid of foundation.

Maurer's Complaint as to Loss of Cigars.

There is only one other matter in this case on which it is necessary to express an opinion. Maurer complained of the manner in which he was searched in the charge room. Maurer said: "Then I was searched in the pockets, and Inspector Mackay behaved to me like a dog. He searched my pockets, and I thought he was going to pull my overcoat from me. I had several papers in my overcoat, but I do not recollect what they were—letters and postcards and a couple of cigars. They went in the fire. I did not get them back. . . . I had several letters and postcards in my overcoat pocket and I believe there was a programme of that evening there, and a few cigars I had in my pocket. He threw them in the fire in front of me." He said he did not get these back when he was bailed out, but that his knife, pencil case, and things like that, he did get back. There is clearly gross exaggeration here. That Inspector Mackay may have searched him in a summary and not particularly gentle manner may perhaps be the case but we do not say it is so. Inspector Mackay's temper had been very seriously tried, if our views about what had taken place are correct, but that he treated Maurer as he would have treated a dog is a highly coloured metaphorical description of his action which we feel certain is not applicable to the true manner in which the search was really made. The question whether the cigars and papers were thrown into the fire is not corroborated by anyone, and rests, therefore, simply and solely upon Maurer's own statement. Seeing that he was at the mercy of the police and not in a position, therefore, to bring forward any direct corroboration, we should not dismiss an allegation of the kind without very careful examination if Maurer's credibility on other points in the case had been established to our satisfaction. That is clearly not the case here, and as between Maurer, who gave a totally inaccurate account of the circumstances of the arrest, and an Inspector, who seems to us to have discharged very difficult duties with great promptitude and accuracy, we cannot believe that the latter was guilty of a wholly unnecessary destruction of a prisoner's property. We reject Maurer's statement on this head.

Qs. 13796–13797.

Q. 13798.

Our conclusions are:—

(i.) Altfuldisch, Maurer, and Ruppert were lawfully arrested by Inspector Mackay.

(ii.) Neither Inspector Mackay nor any of the officers or constables concerned in these cases was guilty of any misconduct whatsoever, but on the contrary behaved with commendable promptitude and discretion under difficult circumstances.

V.—DUBERY'S CASE.

The facts in regard to this complaint are not in dispute, and the only importance which attaches to the case, which arises out of the misconduct of P.C. Murray, 216 E., in December, 1902, is the fact that it is the only one of all those that we have inquired into in which an allegation of drunkenness is made against a constable.

Albert Joseph Dubery, in December, 1902, was living at 50, Albion Street, King's Cross, and was then employed at Mr. Line's private cab-yard in Sandwich Street, of which he had charge. On the 5th of December, 1902, at about 11.45 p.m., he saw a Constable come to the gate where he was standing, and the Constable asked
Q. 8135–8140 him to have a drink out of a bottle. Dubery replied that he did not want anything. The Constable said "Very well," and walked away. Presently, Albert Jones, the last man out, drove up with his cab and horse, and Dubery went to assist him with his horse. As Dubery passed a hansom cab which had been placed in the gateway, he
Q. 8149, &c. looked towards the window and saw the Constable who had spoken to him with a woman inside. Dubery said "You had better get out of this." The Constable made no answer, and Dubery went to the cab that had just come in and got the horse out.
Q. 8151 He went to the stable, about 25 yards away from the hansom cab, and then the constable and the woman got out; the woman made off, but the Police Constable came down to the stable door. Dubery's account of what took place is as follows:—"I said, 'Old man, you had better not come down here—your Sergeant might see you.' He said, 'B—— my Sergeant and you too.' I said 'You cannot b—— me,' and he said, 'I will show you something—how they kill men in South Africa.' With that he made fight after me, and I ran up the side of the horse away from him. The Constable put up
Q. 8152. his hands to fight me, and I went away from him and and went up to the side of one of the horses. He followed me." This was inside the stable. The Constable then
Q. 8153, &c assaulted Dubery, striking him on the face with his fist, and then on the arm with his
Q. 8519, &c. truncheon. First Jones and then Mr. Line came to his assistance. Finally two other
Q. 8168, &c. policemen came up and the Constable appears to have charged Dubery and Jones with assaulting him, and they were taken to Hunter Street Police Station by these
Q. 8176. two policemen, and by the first Constable too. Mr. Line went with them. Dubery told us that when they got to the station 'the Constable could not give proper satisfaction to the Inspector, and the Inspector ordered him downstairs, and another Constable took him downstairs.' It seems, however, that Dubery and Jones had been
Q. 8182, &c. placed in the dock and charged by P.C. 216 E with assaulting him before the Inspector saw that he was drunk and refused the charge. The Inspector then took down all the particulars of what they had to say, and came back with them to the yard after-
Q. 8194. wards and saw the scene of the assault. Dubery found that his arm was very bad; he had to go to the Royal Free Hospital to have it dressed, and he was unable
Q. 8203. to work for a time. Dubery wrote a letter, as he thought, to the Commissioner of Police asking for a little compensation for his loss of time, and Dubery afterwards consulted a solicitor, Mr. Nicholson, who went into the case with them, but subsequently they informed him that "they did not wish to proceed on account as he (Mr. Nicholson) understood of a cab proprietor being concerned in it."

Q. 8130. Mr. Edward Henry Line was called before us and confirmed the account which Dubery had given. It appeared that Jones (the man referred to in Dubery's evidence) was dead.

The constable implicated (216 E) was a man named John Murray, who had only been at that time about seven weeks in the Force.

Reports were called for by the Chief Commissioner, and were duly made by Q. 8265. Inspector Austin, Police Sergeant Seymour, P.C. McKay, P.C. Johnston, P.C. Miller and P.C. Murray, the Constable whose conduct was in question. These Reports were sent by the Superintendent of the E Division, with his observations to the Chief Commissioner; and on the 8th December an inquiry into the matter was held before Assistant Commissioner Major Wodehouse, and P. C. Murray was duly heard. Being asked whether he had anything to say in his defence, he replied: "Nothing, only that I am very sorry. I had not been drunk until this thing happened." The Assistant-Commissioner, Major Wodehouse, thereupon delivered judgment to the following effect: "I have read the Reports in the case, and it appears to me to be perfectly clear that you took this woman into the yard, and the employees there objected to it. You assaulted them and drew your truncheon. Then you wanted to charge them. Worse conduct than that a police officer can hardly be guilty of. You had every consideration shown you. You were accepted as a special case, and this is the return you make for it. You are quite useless for the police, but in consequence of your being a very young man I will permit you to resign." It appears that the practice is to avoid, if possible, actually dismissing a man, and rather to permit him to resign, because dismissal practically prevents him from getting employment elsewhere.

We agree with the decision of Assistant Commissioner Wodehouse.

VI.—MRS. BRAHAM'S CASE.

In this case Mrs. Louise Braham, wife of Philip Braham, a clerk residing at No. 7, Culverden Road, Balham, complained that she had been wrongfully arrested on the evening of the 6th June, 1903, in South Lambeth Road. She also complained of the manner in which she was arrested and taken to the station, as well as of the conduct of the proceedings in the charge room. Philip Braham had complained to the Home Office and to the Chief Commissioner, and we found that an inquiry into the matter had in fact taken place, as a result of which both the station officer and the arresting constable were punished by being strictly cautioned. That being so, and the Magistrate having dismissed the case, it is not necessary for us to go minutely into the facts.

The Complainant's Case.

Mrs. Braham told us that she had been out on a visit to some friends in South Lambeth Road on the evening of the 6th June, 1903, and had left them about
Q. 9021– 12 o'clock midnight, and that she was walking along by the side of the tramline in tending to catch a car at Stockwell in order to get home, when a police constable (P.C. Atkinson, 800 W.) came out of a gateway and took hold of her in a most offensive manner. She asked him how he dare do that, and the police constable said, "I will show you what I dare do." The police constable took her into custody and up some back streets, and before getting to the station called another constable (P.C. Allen, 749 W.) from the other side of the road. The constable held her arm in an indecent manner; the other constable also took hold of her arm, but she made no complaint of him. She asked the first police constable to let go her arm, but that was all she said while proceeding from the place of arrest to the station. On arriving in the charge room, P.C. Atkinson called the inspector out to go into another room, and she having been placed in the dock, which she described as a cage, the inspector (Billson) went and remained out some minutes. When they came back she asked them to communicate with her husband. She did not hear any charge read over to her and was not asked to give any explanation. She told the inspector that she had been to see friends and was hurrying to catch her car, which would take her to
Q. 9041– Balham Station, where her husband was waiting for her. She did not see the 9064. inspector take any note of it. She asked to see a doctor, but no doctor was sent for. She was allowed to sit in a chair in the charge room and then was taken into another room and placed in the care of a woman (obviously the matron). She was fully two hours waiting for her husband, and when he arrived about three o'clock she was allowed to go with him on bail. She attended the Westminster Police Court with her husband on the following day and told the Magistrate (Mr. Shiel) exactly what had happened. The case was adjourned until the afternoon for the attendance of the inspector, who was not present because it appeared that he had gone away for his
Q. 9091. holiday. When the case was called on again at 3 p.m. on the same day, the Magistrate immediately said, "The case is dismissed. There is nothing against you."

Philip Braham said that he knew where his wife had gone to on the night of the
Q. 9229– 6th June, and he was awaiting her arrival at Balham Station in a tramcar, that when 9233. the last car had come he went to Cavendish Road police station to get telegraphic inquiries made, and that this application was refused, but that just as he was leaving, a message came, and the inspector in charge of that station said, "Your wife is detained at Larkhall Lane police station for disorderly conduct." He said he then
Q. 9237. went there and bailed her out. He attended with his wife at the Police Court, and after the Magistrate had dismissed the case he asked for a summons against P.C. Atkinson for perjury and assault. He was told to complain to the Chief 9247. Commissioner. He wrote to the Home Office and to the Chief Commissioner, and a correspondence took place. He attended the inquiry ordered by the Chief Commissioner at Brixton station, and himself gave evidence.

The Police Case.

In answer to the complaint P.C. Atkinson, P.C. Allen and Inspector Billson were called and examined before us. P.C. Atkinson's evidence was to the following effect: He was on duty in the South Lambeth Road about a quarter past twelve on the morning of the 7th June, 1903. He saw a lady coming along on the opposite side of the road. When within forty yards of where he was standing he noticed her stop in front of a man. The man passed along. He (the constable) crossed the road opposite the Presbyterian church. When he got to the kerb the lady came up to him and stopped in front of him saying, "What are you interfering with me for?" Q 9297.
I said, "I have not interfered with you. You had better get along home." I walked to the church gate, and she said, "How dare you assault me?" At the same time a man whom he did not know came up to them. He (the constable) said, "Have you seen me interfere or assault this lady in any manner?" The man said, "No." The lady then appealed to the man herself and he gave her the same answer. The lady then became very excited and started shouting, "and said she would take my number and go to the station to report me." He told her "to get along home and keep herself quiet, otherwise he should take her to the station." She still Q. 9298.
persisted in shouting, was greatly excited, and smelt strongly of drink. "I took her into custody, she was struggling all the way, and whilst going down Lansdowne Road she asked me to let her go, as she was sorry. I said, 'I cannot do that.' When in Larkhall Lane we met P.C. 749 (Allen) and she appealed to him to let her go, and struggled to get away from me. I called him to my assistance. With his assistance we got her to the station." He then preferred a charge of drunk and disorderly against her to Inspector Billson, who was the officer in charge of the station. "The inspector went to the dock rail, had a look at the lady, and walked Q. 9301.
back into the office, and called me into the office. . . . He said to me, 'The lady is Q. 9303.
not drunk, but she has been drinking, and I will put her on for disorderly conduct alone!'" They then went back to the charge room and the inspector entered the charge on the charge sheet. The lady asked to see a doctor. The inspector said, Q. 9307.
"There is no occasion to see a doctor, as you are not charged with drunkenness." He then read the charge to the prisoner and she said nothing. The constable then went back on duty, leaving his prisoner at the station.

P.C. Allen informed us that he was on duty in Larkhall Lane, and he saw P.C. Atkinson and a female prisoner coming towards the station. At that time he was standing on the footway close by them. The woman spoke first and asked Q. 9749.
him to let her go. He said, "I cannot let you go, madam; you are in custody. You must go to the station." She stopped and tried to get away. He (P.C. Allen) then just took hold of her arm and they walked to the station quietly. He heard P.C. Atkinson charge her at the station before Inspector Billson, and he said she made no reply. When P.C. Atkinson and the inspector went into the office she said, "I have been to see some sick people in South Lambeth, and was late in leaving there." He heard prisoner ask Inspector Billson for a doctor and believed she was satisfied with his answer. He left the station as soon as she was taken out of the dock, and up to then she did not make any complaint against P.C. Atkinson himself.

Inspector Billson stated that he was in charge of the station at Clapham when Mrs. Braham was brought in by two constables. P.C. Atkinson preferred the charge of being drunk and behaving in a disorderly manner. The inspector asked what was the disorder. P.C. Atkinson said that he had seen her stop a man or men in the Q. 9974.
South Lambeth Road, that he crossed the road to speak to her or caution her, but as apparently she was a respectable woman he did not speak, but stood on one side to allow her to pass. It seems better to give the inspector's exact words: "Atkinson said that he had seen her stop a man or men in the South Lambeth Road, that he crossed the road to speak to her or caution her, but as she was apparently a respectable woman he did not speak, but allowed her to pass, and stood on one side to allow her to pass. I forget the exact words, but I believe at that time she said something about 'Why' or 'What are you interfering with me for?'—some such words. The lady at that time said to him, 'Why are you interfering with me?'" P.C. Atkinson Q. 9975. had replied that he was not interfering with her, and "requested her to go home quietly; that she had then raised her voice and commenced shouting, and at that time a gentleman was passing and the lady at that time accused him of assaulting her. The police constable again requested her to proceed home quietly, but she continued shouting about taking his number and about being interfered with by him, and by her shouting, as she was disturbing the public, the police constable took her into custody. At the station I considered the woman was not drunk, and told the police constable

Q. 9976. so." . . . . "I went into the office to fetch the charge sheet I had in the office, and called Atkinson to me. I said, 'I consider the lady or woman is not drunk, and I shall not take the drunkenness, but I shall simply charge her with being disorderly.' Nothing was said. When the charge was read over to Mrs. Braham, she said, 'I want to see a doctor.' I said 'Do you complain of illness?' She said, 'No; I am not ill or drunk.' I said, 'You are not charged with being drunk, so I consider a doctor is unnecessary,' and no doctor was fetched. The police constable at that time said, before he had met the second witness, P.C. Allen, she had asked him to let her go, saying she was sorry, and also she repeated that when they met P.C. Allen. I asked P.C. Allen if that was so, whether he witnessed any disorderly behaviour, and he said, 'No,' but it was so that she had said that at the time. A document was then sent to the husband residing at Balham, and she was then fetched out between one and two."

The following is a copy of the charge :—

The charge was called on at the Police Court in the morning, and the following is a copy of the notes of evidence :—"Walter Atkinson, P.C. 800 W, on oath saith as follows :—At 12.15 p.m., at South Lambeth Road, prisoner stopped opposite me. I moved off one side. She said, 'Why do you interfere with me?' I said, 'You'd better go along.' She said I'd assaulted her, became excited, shouted, and refused to go. I took her. On the way she said she was very sorry, and asked me to let her go.

"Albert Allen, 749 W, on oath saith :—At 12 15 p.m. saw P.C. 800 W. bringing prisoner along Larkhall Lane. When she saw me she stopped and asked if I would let her go. I said she was in custody."

The case was adjourned until 3 p.m., for the attendance of Inspector Billson, and it being called on again at that hour and the inspector not being in attendance the Magistrate dismissed the case.

Acts of Misconduct Alleged against the Police.

In this, as in most of the cases that we have examined, the charges against the police as far as we are concerned are not formulated with any precision, and we have to consider by examining the statement of the complainant what are the exact breaches of duty alleged to have been committed by the police officers.

Here we think the lady stated as follows :—

1. As to the arrest and its circumstances.
   (a). That P.C. Atkinson came out of a gateway and assaulted the complainant by taking hold of her arm in a most offensive manner.
   (b). That P.C. Atkinson then arrested her without justification.
2. As to the method of conducting the prisoner to the station.
   (a). P.C. Atkinson held the complainant in an indecent manner.
3. As to the proceedings in the charge room.
   (a). P.C. Atkinson falsely preferred a charge of being drunk and disorderly against the complainant.
   (b). Upon that charge being refused he falsely preferred a charge of disorderly conduct against the complainant.
   (c). Inspector Billson wrongfully conferred with P.C. Atkinson in private.
   (d). Inspector Billson wrongfully accepted the charge of behaving in a disorderly manner at South Lambeth Road.

With regard to the treatment of this case by the Chief Commissioner we make some remarks below.

The Arrest and its Circumstances.

There is a conflict of evidence between Mrs. Braham and P.C. Atkinson as to the circumstances under which the arrest came to be made, and it is only as to these that there is, as far as the facts are concerned, any serious dispute. Mrs. Braham says that she was walking hurriedly to catch a tramcar at Stockwell on the right hand side of the tramline, but whether on the pavement or not she does not say. While she was walking a policeman came out of a large gateway and took hold of her. She asked him how he dared do that, and he said, "I will show you what I dare do." She also added that he took hold of her arm in a very offensive manner. As we understood her she meant to suggest that the constable assaulted her indecently, and, at any rate, she asserts that he took hold of her before any conversation had taken place between them.

Q. 9023–9025.

In the letter written by Philip Braham to the Chief Commissioner on the 9th June, the allegation he makes on behalf of his wife is substantially the same, though there are slight variations. He says, "A constable suddenly stepped in front of her and Q. 9224. placed his arm on her neck in a most offensive manner. She was naturally indignant and demanded his number. He replied that she had evidently been drinking and he should lock her up, to which my wife replied, 'You dare not!' 'Oh, daren't I', said the constable, and he took her by the arm and into the road to the Larkhall Road Station at Clapham, calling the assistance of another constable on the way, although my wife accompanied him quietly." According to this view of what took place, P.C. Atkinson did assault the complainant without any cause whatsoever.

P.C. Atkinson's version of the matter contradicts this account. His story is that he "saw the lady coming along in the opposite direction to me on the opposite side Q. 9297. of the road. When within about forty yards I noticed her stop in front of a man. The man passed along. I crossed the road opposite the Presbyterian Church. When I got to the kerb the lady came up to me and stopped in front of me, saying: 'What are you interfering with me for?' and so on. If this account be true, not only did the affair not commence with an assault but the constable had done nothing to justify the remark of the lady, "What are you interfering with me for?"

We do not believe that P.C. Atkinson assaulted the complainant as she alleges, though we think that she honestly imagines that her statement is true. On the other hand, we think that P.C. Atkinson gave us a false account of the way in which he came to arrest Mrs. Braham. It came out incidentally that at that time (the summer of 1903) "the road was infested with prostitutes" (to use Q. 9336. P.C. Atkinson's own words), and the constable admitted that he thought that Mrs. Braham was one. On his own showing the constable's opinion was one which he arrived at without any justification whatever. He says he saw the lady "stop in front of a man," but that "the man passed along." P.C. Atkinson does not pretend that he Q. 9297. had ever seen Mrs. Braham before. That being so, even if she did stop in front of a man, such an action afforded no substantial ground for suspicion as to her character, for such an action might be due to nervousness on the part of an unprotected lady at that hour of the night, or to some other innocent cause. But however unjustifiable P.C. Atkinson's suspicion may have been, we think that he did entertain a suspicion, and the whole of what took place according to his own account confirms that view. It is the kind of conversation that might take place if a constable crossed the road just after a prostitute had been accosting a man. P.C. Atkinson admits he crossed the road, and his purpose clearly was either to get a good look at the woman or perhaps to caution her. We do not believe that Mrs. Braham commenced the conversation without some cause, and though we cannot accept literally her statement that the constable at once took hold of her, still it is perfectly clear that he did or said something which startled the complainant, gave rise to conversation and caused her to become very excited, and, it may be, to talk very loudly. Our view is that the lady became thoroughly frightened and lost her self control, and she probably talked and behaved in a much more excited way than she imagined. We also think it is very likely that she struggled a good deal to get rid of the constable's grip after he had arrested her and was taking her to the station. Mrs. Braham herself described the manner of his holding her as being "indecent," in the sense that it somehow suggested to her that the constable was behaving suggestively and improperly to her. That being so, one can readily imagine that without any intention to evade going to the station she may have tried to get away from a man who was offending her senses of modesty and dignity in that way; and of course the very fact that P.C. Allen thought it a case for giving his assistance tends to confirm this impression. The conclusion that we have come to is that P.C. Atkinson's account is not true. He formed an entirely wrong judgment as to the character of Mrs. Braham. Even if he had been right and she had been a woman of the class suggested, the constable was entirely wrong in interfering in any way by speech or by following her. He had never seen her before, he had seen nothing that amounted to unequivocal accosting, and he was not warranted in giving her any caution whatsoever. By his action he undoubtedly frightened Mrs. Braham, and finding that he had been entirely mistaken as to her position in life, he took advantage of her naturally indignant behaviour to take her into custody on the charge of being drunk and disorderly.

Proceedings in the Charge Room.

There is little or no dispute on any material point as to what took place in the charge room. For the reasons just given we think the arrest of Mrs. Braham was unlawful, and that in preferring the charge before the inspector of being drunk and disorderly, P.C. Atkinson was knowingly guilty of misconduct. Taking his own account, the evidence of drunkenness was of the flimsiest kind. There was not the slightest suggestion that before he had approached her she had exhibited any indication of drunkenness. That her breath smelt of drink may be true, but that of itself was unimportant, and the constable knew that the excitement of the prisoner had been provoked by his own conduct, and that he had made a mistake in interfering with the lady at all. Not daring to make a charge of solicitation to save himself he preferred a charge of drunk and disorderly conduct; and when the inspector properly refused to take that charge, he persevered in the wrongful charge of behaving in a disorderly manner.

Inspector Billson's account of what took place in the charge room is not seriously challenged on any part, and we accept his version.

We have considered the proceedings in the light of the reports, the correspondence with the Chief Commissioner, and the proceedings at the Inquiry, and we have come to the conclusion (1) Inspector Billson was right in refusing the charge of being "drunk and disorderly," and (2) We think he was indiscreet in holding a private conversation in his office while the prisoner was in the dock. We have explained above our views as to the duty of the inspector, and as to the manner in which the proceedings in regard to the acceptance or refusal of the charge ought to be conducted. We are not prepared to say that under no circumstances may private colloquy take place between an inspector and a constable or other persons preferring a charge against a prisoner, but having regard to the regulations made in the White Book, we think that in reference to this class of case, unless there are some very exceptional circumstances making another course expedient, the inspector ought to listen to the constable making the charge, to the witnesses, if any, desirous of speaking either in support of or against the charge, and to the prisoner in the charge room itself.

(3) We think Inspector Billson was guilty of an error of judgment in accepting the charge in its amended form.

Q. 9974. According to the inspector, P.C. Atkinson said "that he had seen her stop a man or men in the South Lambeth Road, that he crossed the road to speak to her or caution her, but as she was apparently a respectable woman he did not speak but allowed her to pass and stood on one side to allow her to pass," and so on. "That
Q. 9975 she had then raised her voice and commenced shouting, and at that time a gentleman was passing, and the lady at that time accused him of assaulting her. The police constable again requested her to proceed home quietly, but she continued shouting about taking his number and being interfered with by him, and by her shouting, as she was disturbing the public, the police constable took her into custody." We think that an experienced inspector ought to have inferred from that that the police constable had made a mistake, and that the conduct of the prisoner was quite consistent with her having been frightened; and even taking as true the constable's statement that she was shouting and accused him of assaulting her, the disorder was not of such a character as to come within any of the sections which justify apprehension by a constable. The charge as entered in the charge sheet was "Behaving in a disorderly manner at South Lambeth Road, Parish of Lambeth," and as we construe them these words constituted a charge under the Police Act, 1839, s. 54, s.s. 13.

The inspector does not suggest that he thought Mrs. Braham was "a loose, idle and disorderly person" within the meaning of section 64 of the Police Act, 1839, or "an idle and disorderly person" within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act, 1824. We are doubtful whether there is any evidence at all even if the account which P.C. Atkinson gave to the inspector, and upon which the inspector acted be literally accurate, that any offence under the sub-section just referred to had been committed. However, even if there be some slight evidence, Inspector Billson ought in the exercise of his discretion to have refused the charge.

Our Conclusions.

Our conclusions are therefore these :—

1. As to P.C. Atkinson.
   (a) We find he was guilty of misconduct in arresting Mrs. Louise Braham.
   (b) We find that he did not assault her offensively as she asserted.
   (c) We think that he, under a mistaken impression as to her character, unnecessarily approached her, and by speech or conduct so frightened her as to make her lose her self control.
   (d) Having arrested her he wrongly charged her with being "drunk and disorderly," and when that charge was refused by the inspector he wrongly charged her with disorderly conduct, knowing that if she had been guilty of any disorder, such disorder was due to his own provocation.
   (e) At the police court, where he appeared and gave evidence as prosecutor even if he did not make any positive false statement, still he did not give the Magistrate a full and complete disclosure of all the relevant facts.
2. We have no comment to make upon the conduct of P.C. Allen, whose behaviour was correct throughout.
3. As to Inspector Billson.
   (a) We think he was guilty of an error of judgment in having a private conversation with P.C. Atkinson.
   (b) We think he was guilty of an error of judgment in accepting the charge of "behaving in a disorderly manner."

We have only to add that in this case an Inquiry was held, and Assistant-Commissioner Wodehouse found as to P.C. Atkinson—"The police-constable may in the first instance have been guilty of an error of judgment only, but his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger. He will also be strictly cautioned." The Chief Commissioner approved of this punishment, but in our opinion the action of P.C. Atkinson was of a more reprehensible kind than it appeared to the Chief Commissioner. Even upon the facts as found by Major Wodehouse, mere "caution" was an inadequate punishment. But we think it right to say that the Chief Commissioner, on the grounds he stated to us, arrived at a conclusion as to the gravity of the constable's conduct somewhat different from ours and from that embodied in Major Wodehouse's Report. VII.—ANDREWS' CASE.

The complaint of William Henry Andrews, who described himself as a French polisher, residing at 37, Granville Buildings, Luke Street, Finsbury, is one of a group of three complaints arising out of proceedings in the Finsbury district, in which officers and constables of the G Division are alleged to have been guilty of misconduct chiefly in using unnecessary violence in dealing with prisoners or persons with whom they came in contact in the execution of their duty.

Andrews in the statement which was laid before us on his behalf alleged (1) That he had been wrongfully arrested and falsely charged with being drunk and disorderly in Luke Street late on the night of the 29th July, 1906; and (2) That after being taken to the charge room at the Old Street Police Station he was removed in custody to the basement of the police station and there brutally assaulted and wounded by divers constables.

Q. 10750. Andrews' story as told before us was as follows :—"On the night of the 29th of July, 1906, I was having a drink in the 'Antelope,' at Phipp Street, Finsbury. I came
Q. 10752. out of there and was proceeding up Luke Street towards home. That would be about five minutes past 12—it was on a Saturday night, and the public houses closed at 12 o'clock—and I got part of the way up Luke Street, and I passed some people who were a bit noisy. I think they had had a little drop to drink, and one of them made an offensive remark to me. I walked on and took no notice, and then one of them came forward and attempted to strike me. I baulked the blow and struck at him, but he neither struck me nor did I strike him. Then his missus, who was with him, came forward and threw the contents of the can they were taking some beer home in for supper, and threw the beer in my face, but she never lost hold of the can, and the
Q. 10754. can never left her hand. . . . One constable came up first, and then another constable came up. The first constable who came on the scene, there is no doubt, would not have arrested me at all if the second one had not come up, but the second one happened to have a bit of a grudge against me, and he arrested me. There was no
Q. 10757. necessity to arrest me whatever, because I had done nothing wrong . . . . My hat was knocked off, and I asked them to pick my hat up off the ground, and then I would go to the station, and I also asked them what they had arrested me for, and why they should wish to charge me. My hat was not found, so they took me to the station, and on the way to the station they twisted my arms up my back very much as high as they could get them, and caused me a great deal of pain, and eventually
Q. 10758. they got me to the station. . . . They took me in the station, and when I was taken into the charge room there were two young fellows standing in the dock being

There were several constables in the station at the time; twelve to fourteen constables were in the charge room at the time, on account of the charges being taken before me, and I should think quite a dozen closed around me, and I was taken through a door down a flight of steps into a basement. All the way down the steps the two constables who had taken me in charge were holding my arms behind me, and the other constables who were following behind me downstairs were kicking and punching me from behind, and as soon as I reached the bottom of the stairs the constables holding my arms let me go, and as soon as they did the constable on the right hand side of me, who was holding my right arm, struck me with his right fist, and caught me on the jaw, and he kicked me. I should think there were five or six who were left below with me in this base-

He had finished the charge he was taking when they took me in and the young men had been taken to the cells, and he called out, 'Bring him

He said, 'Nonsense; you had that when you came in.' . . . I had no marks whatever on me when I went into the station. . . . I left the station with the people who came and bailed me out. . . . The Proceedings.

The formal facts and proceedings are as follows:—P.C. Frank Dawson, 371 G, arrested the complainant in Luke Street about 12.15 a.m. on the 30th July, 1906, and with the assistance first of P.C. Stevenson. 337 G, and afterwards of P.C. Peck, 245 G, took him in custody to the station and there charged him before Station Sergeant William Hollands, who was in charge of the station when the complainant was brought in, with "Disorderly conduct by fighting and using obscene language at Luke Street" and "Further with assaulting P.C. 371 G Dawson by striking him in the mouth with his fist whilst in the execution of his duty at Luke Street, Parish of Shoreditch." The Station Sergeant accepted the charge, and the prisoner was detained in the cells until 2.30 a.m., when he was bailed out (Sergeant William Roberts being then in charge), and allowed to depart.

The two charges were heard together on Monday, the 30th July, at the Old Street Police Court, by Mr. Cluer, who bound the defendant over to keep the peace in his own recognisances under the Statute of Edward III.

It does not appear that at the trial before Mr. Cluer Andrews gave evidence on his own behalf, but he made a statement to the Magistrate in which he gave his version of what had taken place in the street at the time of the arrest, and also stated what had taken place at the police station. Andrews asked Mr. Cluer what steps he should take about his treatment at the station, and the Magistrate replied, "If you take out a summons at the proper time I shall be only too pleased to hear it. Q. 10802. I have heard of similar things occurring at this station before." The Magistrate also appears to have said that the assault alleged to have been committed by Andrews was a very trifling one.

The following is a copy of the charge sheet:—

The complainant afterwards took out a summons for assault against P.C. Manning, 226 G., returnable at the Old Street Police Court, and subsequently he took out a summons for assault against P.C. Dawson, 371 G., and P.C. Peck, 245 G., returnable at the same Court. The case against Manning was heard by Mr. H. C. Biron on the 13th and 28th August, and the 12th September 1906, and after a lengthy hearing the charge was dismissed. The case against P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck was heard on the 29th September and the 6th October 1906, before the same Magistrate, and in the end that charge also was dismissed.

As it is clear that Mr. Cluer thought that there was prima facie ground for thinking that there had been misconduct on the part of some constable or constables, and that the wound which he observed when Andrews was before him was caused by that misconduct, we have thought it right to investigate the matter for ourselves, and we heard the case on the 24th and 25th days of October, 1906. Mr. Schultess Young appeared as counsel for Andrews, and the police were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

Acts of Misconduct Alleged.

The charges of misconduct in this case may be thus formulated :—

1. That P.C. Dawson wrongfully arrested Andrews at Luke Street at the time and under the circumstances mentioned above in the account given by the complainant.

2. That P.C. Dawson, P.C. Stevenson and P.C. Peck were guilty of using unnecessary violence towards and causing unnecessary pain to the prisoner while taking him from the place of arrest to the police station.

3. That P.C. Dawson wrongfully preferred a charge of disorderly conduct by fighting and using obscene language in Luke Street; and further with assaulting P.C. Dawson by striking him on the mouth with his fist in the execution of his duty at Old Street.

4. That P.C. Manning, P.C. Dawson, P.C. Peck, and other constables not identified, assaulted and wounded him at the police station in the basement.

5. That Station Sergeant Hollands wrongfully accepted the charge made by P.C. Dawson.

6. That Station Sergeant Hollands behaved improperly or negligently in directing P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck, who had him in charge, to take him to a part of the station which was not under the immediate control either of himself or the gaoler in attendance.

The Charge of Wrongful Arrest by P.C. Dawson.

Neither this charge nor the second one is of an important character. We have considered the whole of the evidence bearing upon these charges, and have come to the conclusion that we cannot believe in every detail the evidence of the complainant. We agree with the Magistrate that Andrews did assault P.C. Dawson, but that the assault was of a trifling nature. The arrest by P.C. Dawson was justifiable, and P.C. Stevenson acted quite regularly in assisting in taking the prisoner to the station until relieved by P.C. Peck.

The Charge of Unnecessary Violence on the way to the Station.

We have considered the evidence bearing upon this point, and have come to the conclusion that no unnecessary violence was used by either of the constables concerned. Andrews statement is that the constables twisted his arms up his back as high as they could get them, and thereby caused him a great deal of pain. There is no confirmation by any of the numerous witnesses, called before us for the purpose of proving that the prisoner was unwounded while on his way to the station, of the alleged twisting of the prisoner's arms. We are of opinion that what the constables said is in substance true, and that Andrews did occasionally Q. 10757. Qs. 12034-12035. Q. 12336.

Q.12402. resist in various ways while on his way to the station. That being so the constables were quite justified in keeping a very tight grip on the prisoner's arms, though, of course, it was their duty to avoid the giving of any unnecessary pain.

We think that whatever may have taken place at the station there is no ground for thinking that any unnecessary violence was used on the way to the station by any one of the three constables.

The Complaint of Misconduct at the Police Station.

Andrews complained, of course, that the charge upon which he was arrested was unfounded, and therefore one that ought not to have been made by P.C. Dawson, or accepted by Station Sergeant Hollands. In substance this charge has been got rid of by our finding that the arrest was justified, but some comment ought to be made on the wording of the first charge as it appears in the charge sheet. There the offence alleged is described as "Disorderly conduct by fighting and using obscene language at Luke Street." According to the story as told by P.C. Dawson both at the Police Court and before us, not a word was said as to the use by the prisoner while he was fighting, before his arrest or afterwards, of any obscene language. The point is of little importance in this case, but the total absence of any evidence of the use of obscene language at the police station suggests that there was looseness in preferring the charge. All that P.C. Dawson told us about the
Q. 12037. charge was "He" (the prisoner) "was placed in the dock and the charge preferred against him. In answer to the charge he said, 'I am sorry,' and asked if he could have bail." Station Sergeant Hollands said that P.C. Dawson told him (the Sergeant) the circumstances of the arrest, and that he then entered the charge in the ordinary way. It does not seem likely that the sergeant of his own motion entered the words "obscene language" in the charge sheet, and therefore one may infer that P.C. Dawson made statements in the charge room as to the language used by the prisoner which he did not repeat in the police court or before us. We think it right to call pointed attention to this mistake, because although, as far as this particular case is concerned, the mistake is trivial, still in our judgment it is of the utmost importance that constables preferring a charge against a prisoner whom they have brought in should be scrupulously accurate in describing the circumstances of the arrest, and in alleging the offence which justifies the apprehension.

The principal charge of misconduct by the police at the station is that Station Sergeant Hollands ordered the constables Dawson and Peck to take their prisoner downstairs, that he was taken to the basement, and there assaulted violently and in such a way as to cause him grievous bodily harm, namely a cut of a serious kind upon the forehead, as well as bruises, and so forth on other parts of the body. The allegation made by Andrews is that the Station Sergeant intentionally gave the order that he should be taken downstairs, well knowing that the consequence would be that the two constables in whose custody he was, and probably other constables, would take the opportunity of giving him a thrashing; and the motive suggested for the order and his ill-treatment was the desire to punish him for having made certain reports adverse to divers police constables belonging to the G Division, as well as the fact that Andrews belonged to a class of young men who come into frequent contact with the police.

Andrews, according to his own admission, worked only occasionally at his trade, and had an extremely bad record. When he was quite young, on December 24th, 1891, he had been sent for two years to an industrial school for larceny. There were several previous convictions against him, including one as a result of which he had been sentenced to penal servitude for five years. After serving that sentence there were other convictions for various offences, and as late as May 8th, 1906, he had been fined for an act of indecency with a female in the street. The convictions were under various names, and it is perfectly clear that he is a young man who may be properly described as an habitual criminal. That does not, in our opinion, justify the slightest irregularity in his treatment by the police, nor does it necessarily deprive his evidence of all claim to credibility, but it makes it impossible for us to accept his testimony on any point upon which he is contradicted by witnesses of good character, unless there is strong corroboration of his statements.

That Andrews when he came before Mr. Cluer on July 30th had sustained a wound or cut on the forehead, and that his face was swollen in a manner to suggest that he had had what one of the witnesses called "a good knocking about," is an undoubted fact; and the problem which we have to solve is whether his injuries were sustained at the station under the circumstances he alleged. According to Andrews the cut and other injuries were caused by the constables during the time that he was detained as he alleged in the basement at the station. The answer made by the police is that the wound on the forehead had been received before he was arrested. Q. 11993. Qs. 12070 to 12083.

Character of the Wound.

Apart from Andrews' own description, the only evidence as to the extent and character of the wound we have is that of Mr. Roland Dobson, a dresser, who was on duty in the place of the house surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital on the morning of July 30th. This gentleman attended to Andrews in the early morning somewhere about 3 a.m. He remembered Andrews, and he told us that he had observed a wound on the forehead an inch and a half long and about one-eighth of an inch deep. He put a few stitches in the wound, and the ordinary bandage proper in such a case. It was a wound that would leave a scar, and he had observed, on the morning when he gave evidence before us, the scar left by this wound on Andrews' forehead. He remembered no other injuries to him, and adhered to a statement that he had made at the Police Court, that he should have noticed if Andrews had a swollen or put out jaw—he had not a black eye—not a bad one any way. So far as he could recollect the only complaint made by Andrews was with reference to the cut over the eye. Qs. 11133 to 11135. Qs. 11125 to 11167. Qs. 11163 to 11165. Qs. 11128 to 11129. Q. 11151.

The Complainant's Case as to Wound.

If the cut was received at the station it must have been either when Andrews was on the steps of the station on his way in or during the time that he was outside the charge room waiting until the Station Sergeant was disengaged, and could attend to his case, a period, as we know, of from eight to ten minutes. Andrews' account of what took place has already been stated ante, p. 270. It should be noticed that he makes no allegation whatever that any instrument or weapon of a kind likely to cause a cut was used, and the only blow specifically mentioned with the fist was one that took effect not on the forehead but on the jaw. Andrews, however, said later that one of the constables (P.C. Manning), wore a ring, and that the ring may have produced the cut. This suggestion had been made before at the Police Court in the proceedings against P.C. Manning. Andrews, after the proceedings in his own case was over, had an interview with Inspector Allison at which he asked that there might be an inspection of the men in plain clothes, as he said he could identify the man whom he knew as "Charley Wood," who had struck him in the face and, having a ring on his finger, had cut his eye. At the parade of a large number of constables —some eighty or ninety in private clothes were assembled—Andrews identified "Charley Wood" as being P.C. Manning; and in cross-examination before us he said that when he got to the bottom of the stairs he received the injury to his face—in the eye—though he did not specifically state that it was P.C. Manning who gave the blow which produced the cut. Still that is what we gather he intended to say. The only other constables concerned in the alleged assault in the basement who were identified by Andrews were P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck who had brought him to the station. Q. 10761. Qs. 10926, 10927.

It is clear that Andrews quite recognised the difficulty in which he was placed by having to ask us to believe that the cut was inflicted by a blow from a fist alone, and the statement which he made at the Police Court and before us shows that he was not in a position to explain the cut except upon the hypothesis that one of the constables who struck him had a ring on his finger. We agree that it is practically impossible that such a cut as was described here could have been caused simply by a blow from a man's naked fist; and we see the difficulty of proving that any one of the constables had a ring on. Even if that were the fact, the case is, as to this part of it, one of a class upon which we have already made some observations in our discussion of another complaint. Once we accept Andrews' story that he was taken down to the basement to a place at a considerable distance from the charge room and surrounded by constables intent upon giving him punishment for his real or supposed wrongs against members of the division, we must treat him as a person completely at the mercy of the police, intentionally placed by them in a situation in which it was absolutely impossible for him to obtain any direct evidence of an independent character as to what took place. He says in effect: "There I was absolutely overpowered by numbers. They did what they liked with me. When I was taken down I was unwounded, when I came back to the charge room I had a cut upon my forehead. I cannot give a better account of what took place than what I have told you. There is the fact, and it is for the police, if they can, to show that I did not receive the cut while I was in their hands. I suggest it was done by a ring. There is nothing to prevent a constable wearing such an ornament. I suggest that the cut was caused by a ring, and, from its very nature, it is a thing that after the mischief was done might easily be removed and concealed." That is not at all an unreasonable way of putting his case. It seems right for us to treat it as sufficient to make a prima facie case against the constables whom Andrews identified. Of course, if the fact that he was taken out of the charge room before the charge was taken against him were in dispute we should probably look at the case differently, but it is admitted that he was taken outside the charge room by the Station Sergeant's order, and so an opportunity was afforded for his being taken to the basement, and he was certainly at the mercy of constables not under the immediate eye of any superior officer.

Testimony of Witnesses who Observed Andrews on the way to the Station.

The first allegation which is advanced in support of Andrews' story is that on the way to the station his face bore no sign of a wound, and the allegation is supported by a very considerable body of evidence. The wound was clearly one of such a character that a person possessed of fairly good eyesight looking closely at Andrews after it had been received could have hardly failed to notice it if there was a reasonably good opportunity of seeing his face in sufficient light. The value of the statement made even by an honest witness that he did not notice any mark of a wound on the face largely depends on whether his attention had been called to the fact that it was alleged that such a mark existed. No one suggests that Andrews' face was covered with blood when taken into custody, or that the wound was one which at that time, before such blood as flowed had coagulated and the symptoms of swelling and bruising had developed, was of such a gaping kind as to command attention; and on the other hand there is no doubt that the contents of the beer-can had been thrown over him. It must, therefore, be remembered that an honest witness looking at him quite near might not notice the sign of a wound though in fact he had been wounded in the affray from which he emerged a prisoner. Bearing these considerations in mind let us see what the witnesses called upon this point have to say.

Qs. 11011 to 11394, and Q. 11603, &c.

In support of the complaint we took the evidence of the following witnesses who may be described as disinterested, namely, Mrs. Chapman, Mrs. Lowis, Mrs. Gibbs, C. Sparkes, Mrs. Withy, F. J. Lang and Reuben Hughes. All these witnesses stated that they observed no wound or cut on Andrews' face when he was being taken to the station.

Q. 11740, &c., Q. 11475. Q. 11227, Q. 11367.

Evidence was given also by several others to which, for various reasons, the same weight cannot be attached; by Offord and Bletcher, who stated Andrews was not wounded when on the way to the station, and Obeney and Bassett, who said there was no cut on his forehead when he arrived in the charge-room.

Q. 12034. Q. 12286. &c. Q. 12396, &c. Q. 12494. Q. 12497. Q. 12449

On the other side we have the evidence of P.C. Dawson, who arrested Andrews; P.C. Stevenson, who accompanied P.C. Dawson and his prisoner part of the way to the station; P.C. Peck, who relieved and took the place of P.C. Stevenson; and P.C. Alfred Payne, who was on the landing at the top of the station steps when Andrews was brought up by P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck, all of whom positively affirm they noticed that Andrews had a cut over his eye.

Sergeant Hollands was then in charge of the station, and when Andrews was brought in was actually engaged in taking a charge against Obeney and Bassett. He told us that he saw Andrews when he first came in with a constable struggling, and he had a cut over the right eye, and that he asked P.C. Dawson how the prisoner came by that, and P.C. Dawson told him. In cross-examination the sergeant said that when he came to the station he noticed the cut on the prisoner's forehead bleeding slightly. His face was slightly swollen where the cut was, otherwise it was all right. He described where the cut was, and, according to his description, the cut was on the right side above the eye. He also said that he saw it again when Andrews was in the dock. He wiped his eye then, and it was not bleeding then. There was dry blood slightly round the edges. That was the only mark the sergeant noticed on his face, and he did not think fit to call for a doctor. Qs. 12561, 12562, 12563. Q. 12614 Q. 12620. Q. 12625 to 12627.

That is, in substance, all the police evidence as to the existence of a cut before Andrews was taken out of the charge room by direction of the sergeant.

Having considered this evidence, we think that those of the witnesses who are described above as quite disinterested were honestly representing what they believed to have been the case, but that they were mistaken in thinking that Andrews' face was free from marks; and, of course, the fact that he had an undoubted scar on one side of the forehead, of which they saw nothing, shows that their observation was not so close as they believed. We regret to have to say that we do not believe that the other witnesses (Obeney, Bassett, Bletcher and Offord) are to be trusted. We thought that the demeanour of the constables was entirely satisfactory. It is not, therefore, proved to our satisfaction that Andrews was unwounded when he was brought into the charge-room.

The Affray.

Let us now consider the evidence as to the original affray, with the view of determining whether the wound may have been then inflicted.

The account of Andrews as to what passed before P.C. Dawson came and took him into custody is given ante, p. 270. With that we may compare the account given by the woman referred to. The man was not called before us, but his wife, Mrs. Webster, who seems to be the person Andrews had in mind, told us: "Me and my husband were coming from market. I had a market bag in this hand, and a can in this hand. When I got to the lamp-post, which is about a quarter of the length of the street, and I live nearly at the bottom of the street, there were a few people in the road. It appears that two old men were having a few words. My husband was really singing, or saying something, and as we crossed like to go across the road, there was a policeman standing, on duty like, at the corner, only a few yards from this lamp-post. As I crossed the road with my husband Andrews was standing by the lamp-post talking to these two old gentlemen. Me and my husband crossed the road, and my husband seemed like a few steps behind me. I turned round to see where he was, and as I did I saw Andrews strike my husband a blow." He did not actually hit him. "He went to make a blow at him. I had the can in this hand, and the bag in this hand, and I put the can up like that (illustrating) as Andrews made the blow, and he upset all my beer." The witness was quite sure that the man did not hit Andrews. In cross-examination it came out that Webster, the husband, was in liquor, and that is probably the reason why he was not called. Mrs. Webster would not admit that Andrews ran against the can or even touched it. She admitted that the beer or part of the beer was spilt, but she was not able to give any clear account of how this happened. She took her husband home at once, and she saw nothing more of Andrews. It will be noticed that there is a plain contradiction between her account and that of Andrews. According to him, she threw the contents of the can in his face. This she in effect contradicts. Q. 10752. Q. 11066. Q. 11067.

The witnesses, Mrs. Chapman and Sparkes, gave us accounts of the fracas, or rather of such incidents as they observed, which materially differ from those of the complainant and Mrs. Webster. It is sufficient to say as to them that neither of them was able to present to us a clear picture of the scene which occurred. Q. 11010, &c. Q. 11385, &c.

We have no complete account of the origin of the disturbance in which the Websters and Andrews found themselves the central figures, and which resulted in P.C. Dawson taking Andrews. None of the police witnesses affect to be able to say how the thing began, and when P.C. Dawson's attention was first called to the matter a large crowd had already collected, and the first thing that he saw when he
Q. 12034. went up was Andrews "fighting with a man and a woman." It is impossible for us to determine how the quarrel, whatever it was about, really commenced. It is an ascertained fact that a fight or scrimmage in which blows were exchanged did in fact commence and was proceeding when the constable intervened. The best and clearest testimony as to what actually took place when the fight had commenced is that given by Sparkes, and his account, though he himself thinks that the can did not hit Andrews, is entirely consistent with the fact that when Mrs. Webster raised the can in the air and tried to hit Andrews she did in fact succeed, and caused the wound on his forehead.

It does not seem to us that the evidence we have as to the commencement of the affray and as to its incidents affords any real corroboration of the main complaint of Andrews as to his ill-treatment in the basement. The object with which the witnesses who observed any part of the disturbance before the arrest were called was to show that it was not possible that the cut could have been inflicted during the fight. The construction of that evidence most favourable to Andrews only comes to this, that a certain number of observers at a time when the disturbance was going on honestly believed that the can did not touch Andrews' forehead.

Alleged Groans and Cries heard in the Charge Room.

It was suggested that corroboration of Andrews' story as to his ill-treatment in the basement is to be found in the fact that the sounds of moaning and groaning, or cries of a man in pain, were heard in the charge room during the eight or ten minutes that it is admitted Andrews was out of the room in charge of P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck.

It is common ground that before the charge against him was taken Andrews and the two constables in whose custody he was were ordered out of the charge room by Station Sergeant Hollands. It is not disputed that thereupon he was made to leave the room by a door on the left hand side of the desk situate nearly in the middle of the room at which the Station Officer takes the charges. This door opens on to a landing. From this landing a flight of stone steps leads on the left to an enclosed place in the basement from which the Section House, which is part of the main station building, is entered. On the right similar steps descend to a short passage in the basement from which the parade room is reached. According to Andrews he was forced by P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck down the latter steps to the basement and it was there he was assaulted and wounded. According to the constables he and they remained on the landing just outside the door until they were all three recalled into the charge room. We have had the advantage of viewing the premises, and are able to consider the likelihood of Andrews' story with full knowledge of the place in which its principal incidents are said to have occurred. The accounts given by Andrews before Mr. Biron and before us differ in some respects. Before us he said the concerted assault during which he was wounded took place in the basement. Before that magistrate he said he received the wound while sitting on a "wooden seat—I think it was—in the basement," and he described the place as "about 50 yards long." The passage to the parade room is only a few feet long and we saw no wooden seat there. The parade room itself though large is nothing like so long as 50 yards, but there is a wooden seat against the wall in which the door by which one enters from the passage to which the steps just mentioned lead is placed. Andrews' statement at the Police Court seems to mean that the final ill-treatment during which he was wounded took place in the parade room. The door between the charge room and the landing was (it seems agreed) closed while Andrews was out. Having regard to the distance and the other circumstances, if the assault took place in the parade room, we doubt whether his cries could have been heard in the charge room when people were talking there. If the assault took place in the basement we think such cries (if any) might have reached the charge room sufficiently clearly to attract attention. Both Obeney and Bassett speak to hearing exclamations and sounds from outside.

According to the former Andrews was "groaning like a dog being knocked about"; the latter said he heard him "hollowing and shouting like a man being knocked about," saying "Oh," and words like that. Sergeant Hollands did hear noise from outside. It was noise from "the shuffling of feet and Oh! oh! and that kind of thing," but denied hearing any groans. He thought the constables were simply restraining the prisoner and trying to keep him quiet and added "some of them (i.e., prisoners) are not quite like nightingales." These pieces of evidence make it certain that Andrews was not taken further than the basement at the foot of the stairs and probable that he was kept, as the constable says, on the landing. The allegation that the groans and so forth heard in the charge room, proceeding from outside after Andrews had left it, rests simply on the statements of Obeney and Bassett whom, as we have stated above, cannot be looked on as reliable witnesses, and is in our opinion not sustained by the evidence. It should be observed that though we cannot accept their description of the sounds they heard as accurate, yet as Sergeant Hollands agrees that some sounds could be heard, their evidence, for what it may be worth, tends to discredit Andrews' statements as to the place where his alleged ill-treatment occurred.

Q. 11869–11871.
Q. 12609–12611.

Alleged Complaint of Andrews at the time of being Bailed Out.

Another circumstance, which, if true, would tend to corroborate Andrews' account of being assaulted when outside the charge room is the fact that he complained to the sergeant who bailed him out that he had been assaulted in the basement. Andrews says that when he was brought from the cells to be bailed out and taken into the charge room again, he said to the sergeant who ordered him to be taken outside (Station Sergeant Hollands), "You coward, what did you tell them to do this for?" (pointing to the cut upon his forehead), and that the sergeant replied, "Nonsense, you had that when you came in." Two of the witnesses called to support Andrews, Miss Mary Barrett and Mrs. Bassett, give evidence which, to some extent, differs from Andrews' statement on this point. Miss Barrett accompanied Mrs. Bassett to the station in the early morning for the purpose of bailing out Francis Bassett, and they told us that they saw Andrews in the charge room after he had been brought from the cells, and that they overheard a conversation there and saw Andrews as he left the station after his release. Miss Barrett said: "I saw Andrews, who I did not know, brought along" (seemingly from the cells). "I noticed he had a cut over his eye and also a bloodstained handkerchief which he held up to me and he said 'This is what they do in here.' He said that to me. That is what he said to me as I was standing at the charge room door. He held up the handkerchief like this (describing), and said, 'This is how they serve you in here.' Then I saw him show it to a sergeant, and the sergeant said 'Do not blame me for it. I was not here when you were charged.'" She did not give the name of the sergeant. "He said to Andrews 'I know nothing of it; I was not here when you were charged.'" Later she added: "The sergeant was in charge of the station, and I heard him say to Andrews 'I know nothing about it,' and another sergeant came out and said to Andrews 'You had that before you came here from those who you were fighting with outside.' I took no notice at all; I never spoke at all. It did not concern me at all."

Mrs. Bassett also told us that she saw Andrews in the charge room, and that she heard him complain to a sergeant, and he said, "You brute, you had this done to me." Being asked, "What did the sergeant say?" she replied, "He came out of the room, and one sergeant said, 'No, I don't know anything about it,' and another sergeant came out and said, 'No, you had that before you came here.'" "He had a swollen face." She did not notice his forehead. She said, "My sister called my attention to it, and she said 'That man has had a good knocking about.'" She said, "There were two sergeants in there. It was 3 o'clock."

Q. 11972.
Q. 11973.
Q. 11979.

If this evidence were true it would tell in Andrews' favour, but we are of opinion that it is false. That Andrews had a conversation with Sergeant Roberts is the case, for he was the Station Officer who took bail for his release, but it is proved to our satisfaction that Sergeant Hollands was not then present. The books and documents at the station confirm the statement made by Sergeant Hollands and Sergeant Roberts that the former was in due course relieved by the latter at 2 a.m., and there is no reason to doubt that he, as he told us, left the station a few minutes after 2 a.m. Both Mrs. Bassett and Miss Barrett state positively that it was at 3 a.m., or quite 3 a.m., when they arrived at the station, and it was (as appears from the charge sheets) at 3 a.m. that Obeney and Bassett were released—i.e., half-an-hour after Andrews had been bailed out. We regret to have to conclude that the story told by these two witnesses of their having heard a conversation between Andrews and the Sergeant in charge is untrue. Mrs. Bassett is the mother of the prisoner Bassett and Miss Barrett is her sister. Obeney and Bassett were obviously hostile to the police, and it looks to us as if they had conspired with Andrews to induce these two women to come and corroborate Andrews as to this conversation in order to strengthen the case against the incriminated constables. We have no hesitation in dismissing the alleged conversation between Andrews and Sergeant Hollands as a mere invention, and accept Sergeant Roberts' version of the short conversation with Andrews which took place when the latter was bailed out.

Allegation that Station Sergeant Hollands Intentionally Placed Andrews at the Mercy of the Police.

It is common ground between the parties that upon the prisoners being brought into the charge room Sergeant Hollands gave an order which resulted in Andrews being taken outside the charge room and being absent therefrom for a period of eight or ten minutes. There is an acute conflict of evidence as to the exact words used by the sergeant in ordering the two constables to take Andrews out of the charge room; and according to the allegations to be inferred from the evidence before us given by him and his witnesses, Sergeant Hollands did not order him out of the room because he was violent and noisy, but with the deliberate intention of giving the constables, who had a grudge against Andrews, the opportunity of assaulting and beating him. Sergeant Hollands and the police witnesses contradict in every material particular the statements of Andrews and of his witnesses. The motive suggested by Andrews for his ill-treatment all along, and for the ill-will of the constables in this division against him, is that he had on several occasions made reports at the station complaining against constables. The only evidence that any such reports were ever made is that given by Andrews himself, and assuming that he had made complaints about some of the constables in the division that does not seem to afford any reason for hostility against him on the part of the Station Sergeant or other superior officer.

Q. 11209 et seq. Qs. 11869.

Obeney and Bassett confirmed Andrews' statement that the Sergeant said "Downstairs with him," or "take him below," and added that they heard a constable say "I am not answerable" or words to that effect. It is not necessary to examine the evidence on this point in detail, having regard to what we have said above as to these witnesses. We do not believe their statements as to the Sergeant's words, and we have no doubt that the alleged utterance by a constable of the very meaning words "I am not answerable" is deliberately invented to give a greater plausibility to the suggestion that the Sergeant ordered Andrews downstairs to give the police an opportunity of revenge, though the constable's reproachful remark does not appear to be quite consistent with the alleged animus of the police against the complainant. The invention of this incident, like that of the conversation which Mrs. Bassett and Miss Barrett say they overheard, affords strong indication that in this case there was a conspiracy to give false evidence against the police. However this may be, we are satisfied that there is no truth at all in the allegation that Sergeant Hollands improperly ordered Andrews to be taken outside in order that the constables might punish him.

The result of our consideration of the evidence up to this point is that there is no satisfactory corroboration of Andrews' story of his being assaulted in the basement. Before coming to the substantive answer of the police, we ought to say that reflection upon that story in the light of what we have ascertained by analysis and learnt by a visit to the police station, convinces us that it is one of a very improbable kind. If the case set up had been that P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck had pushed him down the steps to the basement and given him a thrashing, assuming adequate motive, one could not assert that the occurrence was absolutely unlikely. But that is not the kind of affair which Andrews describes. He would have us believe that there were twelve or fourteen constables in the charge-room, that on the sergeant's ordering him to be taken "downstairs" several constables closed round him, that he was taken Q 10761 outside, and pushed downstairs, not only by P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck, but by other constables who had followed him out of the charge room, and that when he got to the basement they were joined by at least one other constable (i.e. P.C. Manning or "Charlie Wood"), and so forth. None of the constables in the charge room could have left it to go on the landing without being noticed by Sergeant Hollands. Such an affair as is described could in fact, hardly have taken place without the Sergeant's acquiescence and connivance. The number of constables in the charge room was, almost certainly, not so high as twelve or fourteen. The section house had been closed as usual at midnight. The parade room was deserted and shut for the night. There was no time or opportunity for the bringing together of a number of constables for the purpose of thrashing their common enemy. These and other things strike us as showing that Andrews' story is extremely improbable, and one therefore, which even if he had been of a man of good character we could not accept without strong corroboration.

The Police Case.

It is unnecessary to set out in detail the evidence given by the police officers and constables who were called upon to answer Andrew's complaint. It is sufficient to say that every allegation made by Andrews which amounted to a charge of misconduct is positively denied. The witnesses were cross-examined by Mr. Schultess Young as to all points, and as to all the phases of the affair which seemed important, or tended to discredit either the statements or the action of the constables, by the Commissioners themselves. It did not appear to us that their testimony was shaken. The evidence for the police did not, however, rest simply upon a flat contradiction of Andrews' allegations. Evidence was given to us to prove (1) that the complaint which Andrews made (after the police case had been tried at the Police Court and he had made his complaint before Mr. Cluer) to Inspector Allison was that the assault which inflicted the cut on his forehead took place on the steps of the station; and (2) that P.C. Manning, who was the constable identified by Andrews as the one who hit him on the forehead and caused the wound, was in the section house at the time when the alleged assault took place.

Andrews' Statement to Inspector Allison.

As to the first of these points Inspector Allison gave evidence as to an interview he had with Andrews on Tuesday, the 31st July. The purpose with which he came was to get information which might enable him to identify the constable whom he knew as "Charley Wood." The inspector's account of the interview was as Q. 13193. follows: "Andrews came into the station, standing in the waiting room just outside the door. I called him into the office. I said, 'What do you want, Andrews?' He said, 'I want the name of the man who was in plain clothes, standing on the station steps when I was brought in.' I asked him if he knew him. He said 'No, but I know him by the name of Charley Wood.' I said 'We have not got a man by that name in the station.' He said, 'That is the man that was standing on the station steps when I was brought in. They struck me in the face. He had a ring on his finger, and he cut my eye. He hit me at the back of the neck, and that led up to the disturbance in the charge room.' The inspector further said that Andrews represented that he had been struck 'At the station steps.' "I asked him what steps Q. 13194. he meant. I said 'Do you mean those steps out there?' I pointed through the little window from the inspector's office looking down on to the steps. He said 'Yes, those steps out there.' At that time he did not say anything about the assault or Q. 13195 any other constable." The inspector asked him if he could identify the man who had assaulted him and he said 'Yes.' The inspector then told him he could have a parade of the men in plain clothes if he wished it. Andrews said he would like it, and then added, 'I should not know the others that struck me, as there were twelve or fourteen of them.' An arrangement was then come to for a meeting at the station, and in due course a parade of the men who were off duty in plain clothes was held on the Saturday night following. While that arrangement was being come to, the inspector asked Andrews whether he knew the man by any other name than Charley Wood. Andrews replied, "I think he is on Tabernacle Square point." The inspector told him that that was not the name of the man on Tabernacle Square point. It may be said here it is agreed that at this parade Andrews did pick out as Charley Wood, P.C. Manning.

Q. 10937, &c. Mr. Eldon Bankes in his cross-examination of Andrews called his attention to the interview which he had had with Inspector Allison, and Andrews directly contradicted the Inspector's accounnt of what was said as to the place of assault. Having regard to the fact that Inspector Allison is an officer of long experience and of very high character, and that Andrews is a man with a thoroughly bad record, we cannot help accepting the inspector's version of the conversation. He made a report on the very same day, in which he wrote : "William Andrews, of 37, Granville Buildings, Luke Street, came to this station and stated that while being brought into the station in custody on the 29th instant and when on the station steps he was assaulted by a constable in plain clothes, who struck him on the face with his fist and kicked him on the leg. He said he did not know the P.C.'s name and number, but he knew him as Charlie Wood, and that he was wearing a ring at the time, which caused the injury to his eye and led up to the disturbance in the charge room. He further stated he would not know the other constables who assaulted him, as there were quite twelve or fourteen of them, and would take no action as regards them, but he would apply for a summons against the constable who was in plain clothes and struck him on the station steps." It seems difficult to believe that the inspector could possibly, even if he were, as we gather is suggested, acting in collusion with all the other officers and constables at Old Street Police Station to defeat any proceedings that Andrews might take, have invented this particular story. Assuming that he had the newspaper reports of the case, or had heard from others what Andrews had been saying about an assault in the basement, and that he was unscrupulous enough to be willing to fabricate evidence, that might tell against Andrews, it does not seem likely that it would have occurred to him to put the words "The man was standing on the station steps when I was brought in" into Andrews' mouth.

Still the matter is certainly puzzling, because one cannot help asking what on earth was the object of Andrews' making such an important variation in the story which only the day before he had told the Magistrate with such circumstance and impressiveness. Of course, there is no absolute inconsistency between his having seen a man (Charley Wood) on the station steps and afterwards seeing him in the basement. Seeing Charley Wood on the station steps might be a circumstance which could be pressed into his favour as supporting his precise account of the assault in the basement ; it brought on the scene a constable with whom Andrews had already been in collision ; but it seems impossible to explain away his statement that "he hit me at the back of the neck and that led up to the disturbance in the charge room" without the complainant being committed to the allegation that there was an assault on the steps of the station as well as in the basement. It may be urged in Andrews' favour that when the words which he is alleged to have used to the inspector are looked at altogether they are somewhat confused and not inconsistent with the suggestion that there were two assaults, and that the story which Andrews meant to give was that he saw Charley Wood on the station steps, and that while he was going in there, he (Charley Wood) hit him at the back of the neck, and that that led up to the disturbance in the charge room, and that the words which he used, "They struck me in the face ; he had a ring on his finger, and he cut my eye," referred to what took place in the basement Still, there is the fact, that he did not, as we believe, say one single word to Inspector Allison which led that officer to believe that the assault of which he was really complaining took place anywhere except upon the steps leading into the station. We think that the conversation tells heavily against the complainant, and it shows that he was not very sure as to what precise accusation he would ultimately make, upon oath, against the police constables, and that he was not at all particular in the use of language even on occasions which he knew were important.

Alibi Set Up by P.C. Manning.

The case for Andrews so far as it affected P.C. Manning as given before us was that the constable whom the complainant knew under the name of "Charley Wood" was one of the constables in addition to P.C. Dawson and P.C. Peck who were in the basement, and that he had picked out this man among others who were paraded at his request as being the one who had struck him on the forehead while in the basement, and who wore a ring. It appears that this constable was called "Charley Wood" as a nickname because he had a habit of referring to his truncheon at every opportunity he had, and that he had been known on two or three occasions to pull it out, telling people that if they did not clear out they would get some of "Charley Wood." So far as his presence in the basement is concerned there is, of course, no corroborative evidence that P.C. Manning was concerned in that matter at all, but evidence was called before us for the purpose of showing that he had been seen standing in plain clothes on the steps of the station when Andrews was taken in.

The witness A. Offord told us that he saw Andrews brought to the station, and that he saw there the constable known as "Charley Wood" standing on the steps. Qs. 11699 to 11702.

George Reynolds also said that he knew P.C. Manning, and that P.C. Manning knew him, and that on the evening when Andrews was being taken into the Police Station he saw P.C. Manning standing on the steps. Being pressed on that point he said that he was "almost sure that it was him" and "I think it was him," but that he was not prepared to say positively that he was the man. Qs. 11821 to 11828.

That is all the evidence as to P.C. Manning being on the steps.

Now it is certain that Andrews was brought into the charge room at 12.35 a.m., and if the evidence which has been given is true, P.C. Manning was then dressed and was about the station at from, say, 12.30 to 12.45.

P.C. Manning himself was called before us, and not only denied being concerned in any assault upon the complainant, but stated that he went to bed about five minutes before midnight in the section house. Of course if that evidence is true it absolutely disposes of the allegation that he assaulted Andrews on the station steps or in the basement. According to his recollection he had gone off duty at 9 p.m. and went out for a walk, and when he came back he went into the section house through a side gate in Old Street apart from the Police Station—a private gate. He came in about half-past-eleven and went to the station mess, had a drink there, and after a short time went up to bed. P.C. Percival and P.C. Lane went upstairs with him at the same time. He went into the brushing room (a room used for brushing uniforms and boots) changed his boots and then went straight to bed. The constables sleep in cubicles. P.C. 340 G occupied the cubicle on one side of him and P.C. Lynch, 91 G, occupied that on the other side of him. P.C. Lane was in the station mess when P.C. Manning was there on that evening. P.C. Lane accompanied him to the brushing room and they went up to the dormitory together, P.C. Lane turned into the lavatory while P.C. Manning went into the dormitory, and P.C. Lane afterwards passed his cubicle to get to his own. P.C. Manning called out to him as he passed, "Don't forget to call me in the morning ; I am on leave and I want to go out early." He never left the dormitory till he got up the next day, later than he intended. He also added that he had never worn a ring in his life. Qs. 12944 to 12946. Qs. 12946 to 12970. Q. 12982.

In order to prove this alibi, Sergeant Robinson was called and deposed that he called the roll at the section house at midnight on the Saturday in question in the dormitory where the men slept. He said that he reached Manning's name about 12.10, and, on refreshing his memory by the roll, he found that Manning was in his bed. He said that there was no communication directly from the section house into the station, the entrance being in Old Street fifty feet from the entrance to the station, but that there was a back door by which a man might enter the station if he came down from the dormitory.

P.C. Fraser remembered being in the brushing room at the same time as P.C. Manning that night, and saw him go upstairs.

P.C. Lane confirmed what P.C. Manning had told us and saw that he was undressing when he passed to get to his own cubicle.

P.C. Percival, who had been out with P.C. Manning, said that he saw P.C. Manning go upstairs with P.C. Lane, and that he himself went to bed about midnight and did not see Manning again that night.

P.C. Lynch said that he went to bed about ten minutes past twelve, his bunk being the next one to P.C. Manning, and he remembered P.C. Manning saying, " Put the light out, marquis " ; " marquis " was the witness's nickname.

It is obvious that if these witnesses speak truly the alibi is clearly proved, and we see no reason whatever to doubt the fact.

The result of our inquiry is that it is proved to our satisfaction that Andrews was not wounded by any constable at Old Street Station, and that we believe the cut on his forehead was sustained by him in the course of the affray which led to his arrest.

Our findings are :—

(i.) P.C. Dawson was justified in arresting Andrews.

(ii.) Neither he nor P.C. Stevenson was guilty of ill-treating Andrews on the way to the station.

(iii.) P.C. Dawson rightly preferred the charge against Andrews.

(iv.) Neither P.C. Manning, P.C. Dawson, P.C. Peck, nor any other constable was guilty of assaulting and wounding Andrews at the police station as alleged.

(v.) Sergeant Hollands rightly accepted the charge against Andrews.

VIII.—WILSON'S CASE.

George Wilson, who described himself as a labourer residing at 271, Kensal Road, Westbourne Park, complained that he had been grievously assaulted by P.C. Worsley, 300 of the X Division, on the 3rd August, 1904, near the "Jack of Newbury" public-house in the Kensal Road, and that he was also at the same time and place wrongfully arrested and charged with attempting to rescue one Frederick Mallows, then in lawful custody, and further with violently resisting his own lawful apprehension.

Wilson's complaint sufficiently appears in the evidence that he gave before us, which is in substance as follows :—

George Wilson stated that between 4 and 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 3rd August, 1904, he had been in the "Jack of Newbury" public-house, and on leaving he saw two constables having a few words with two other men, one of whom (Mallows) he knew. He walked over to Mallows and told him "to hold up, as I did not want to see him get into any trouble." The constable then left Mallows alone and came for him (complainant). The police-constable was P.C. Worsley. He knocked him (complainant) about on the arm that he was protecting his head with as well as he could, but he went down after he received one blow on the head. He heard afterwards that he had several blows on the head. He became unconscious, and while on the ground the constable beat him about. He (complainant) was arrested, and taken to the Harrow Road Police Station, and there charged with attempting to rescue Mallows, and also with violently resisting the police. He was detained, but was bailed out the same evening, and found it necessary to go to St. Mary's Hospital. He and Mallows (who was charged with being drunk and disorderly and with assaulting P.C. Worsley) appeared before the Magistrate at the Marylebone Street Police Court on the following day, when the charge against him (complainant) was dismissed. Q. 15193, &c. Q. 15200. Q. 15201. Q. 15204.

The following is a copy of the Charge Sheet in the cases of Frederick R. Mallows and George Wilson :—

JNO. EVANS,
Acting Superintendent.

We heard the complaint on the 21st November and the 4th December, 1906. The complainant was represented by Mr. Schultess Young, and the police were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

On the complainant's side we heard his evidence, and, in addition, the evidence of Emily Hicks, Charles Harry Capp, Charles Hopkins and James Cooper, and on the police side, that of Detective Sergeant William Burrell.

The importance of this case lies in the fact that P.C. Worsley undoubtedly used his truncheon on this occasion in a very violent manner and that very serious injury, though fortunately of a temporary character, was done to the complainant.

It appeared in the course of the complainant's examination that he had brought an action in the Marylebone County Court against P.C. Worsley for assault, and that the action was tried on the 9th December, 1904, before his Honour Judge Stonor without a jury. The learned Judge reserved his decision, and subsequently gave judgment for the complainant, and awarded him £20 damages. Having regard to that judgment, the learned counsel for the police said they did not propose to call P.C. Worsley, and they left it to the Commission to determine whether it was necessary to take his evidence. The judgment of the learned Judge was put in and read. The witnesses called before us on behalf of the complainant were all of them persons who had given evidence at the County Court, and they appeared to us to be giving honest evidence, though there are considerable discrepancies in the various versions of the affair. It undoubtedly is the fact that the constable did use his truncheon with very considerable violence, and that he did so not only in the course of a struggle which took place after Wilson came up and interfered, but also after he was lying on the ground. We do not think it necessary to summarise the evidence. We have read the very careful judgment of the learned Judge, and not only think that he arrived at a right conclusion, but that the findings of fact upon which that conclusion was based are entirely sound. We cannot do better than set forth his judgment as in effect our own Report :—

"In this case the plaintiff, a labourer, sues the defendant, a police constable, for £25 as damages in respect of what had better be considered as two separate assaults, both which the plaintiff alleges were wholly unprovoked and unjustifiable, and in any case were excessive, cruel, and even dangerous to life. The counsel for the defendant, Mr. Rose Innes, informed the court that the action was defended by the Police Commissioners, and that they awaited the result of the trial before taking action in the matter, and it clearly demands more particular attention on my part and also a fuller statement of the grounds of my decision than the ordinary actions of assault which at times come before this Court. The parties are agreed that the first of the alleged assaults was, in fact, committed by the defendant by his striking the plaintiff on the arm and on the head with his truncheon, and knocking him down on the ground, but the defendant alleges that this assault was provoked and justified by very threatening language and violence used by the plaintiff and others in concert with him and by an assault by the plaintiff in making a running kick at the defendant and injuring his leg. With regard to the second assault, the plaintiff alleges that whilst he was down on the ground and helpless the defendant further inflicted on him several violent blows, which the defendant wholly denies. The parties agree that the plaintiff was rendered unconscious for about half-an-hour, whilst another police constable named Waylett, who was in charge of another man in custody, went with him to the station, some 500 or 600 yards away, and returned with an ambulance. The first question to be decided in this case is therefore whether the assault by the defendant on the plaintiff which is admitted, was provoked and justified by the plaintiff's conduct as contended by the defendant, and, if so, whether it was excessive ? And the second question is whether the subsequent further alleged assault on the plaintiff whilst he was on the ground was committed by the defendant. At the trial the plaintiff deposed that on the 3rd August last year, he was outside a public house called the "Jack of Newbury" in the Kensal Road, and saw the defendant with the other police constable named Waylett taking into custody a man named Mallows, who was struggling on the ground, and that he walked up to them and said to Mallows, "Hold up, Mallows," meaning by that "Go quietly," and that the defendant thereupon left Mallows and came to him and hit him with his truncheon, knocking him down ; that the defendant afterwards hit him as he lay on the ground several times with his truncheon, and that the next thing he remembered was being helped to the police station, where his wounds were attended to, and he was liberated on bail, and went to St. Mary's Hospital, and that the next day he appeared at the Marylebone Street Police Court and was discharged. The plaintiff positively denied using any threatening, violent, or improper language, or saying anything except "Hold up, Mallows," meaning "Go quietly"; that he never made a running kick at the defendant or otherwise assaulted him. Mrs. Emily Schull, a laundress living in Kensal Road, corroborated the plaintiff's evidence as to both assaults. She deposed that she saw the defendant strike the plaintiff with his truncheon on the arm and on the head, knocking him down, and afterwards struck him three or four times when he was on the ground, and that she halloed and he stopped, or she thinks he would have killed him. She first saw the defendant strike him from her window on the first floor; there was no crowd then, but afterwards she went out and expostulated with the defendant, and there was a crowd of thirty or forty people then; the crowd was not very angry, and there was no interference with the police. Emily Hicks, a young girl, niece of the last witness, corroborated her evidence as to both assaults. Charles Hopkins, a bootmaker in Kensal Road, also corroborated the evidence as to the second assault; when the plaintiff was on the ground, he added that he suggested to the defendant that the plaintiff should have some water, and the defendant said "Let his pals get it for him"; and then a touching incident occurred, a woman came out of the crowd and gave her apron to the police constable to staunch the blood which was flowing from his head, and when the plaintiff was taken to the station the apron was round his head. Charles William Capp, a labourer, also corroborated the evidence of the foregoing witnesses as to the second assault. He deposed that he saw the police constable pushing the plaintiff, who fell down, and belabouring him with his truncheon as he lay on the ground. He said there was no crowd to speak of, but that the women were screaming out of the windows. The witness went on to the station, and when he came back he found the constable shuddering with cold or fear, as if he were afraid he had killed the plaintiff, a circumstance which was confirmed in part by George Bond, a police constable, a witness subsequently called on behalf of the defendant. James Cooper, a greengrocer, living at 252, Kensal Road, about forty or fifty yards from the "Jack of Newbury," deposed that he saw the plaintiff fall on the ground, but did not know whether he slipped or was knocked down; and that he saw the policeman kneel over him and deliver him three distinct blows when he was on the ground, and that the crowd appeared afterwards whilst the plaintiff was on the ground. Dr. Arthur Bradley (who had been called immediately after the opening) deposed that he attended the plaintiff at the hospital, and that he had a cut and bruising on the left arm and sprains at the elbow, and at the back of his head he had a scalp wound about 1½ inches in length, and there was a great deal of bleeding. The plaintiff was treated at the hospital for three months. The defendant's case was as follows:—The defendant, who was first examined, gave his evidence in a somewhat confused and excited manner, and he appeared to me to be of a nervous and excitable temperament. I had considerable difficulty in following his evidence, and I do not think he had a clear recollection of the matter. He deposed that on the day in question he was called to the "Jack of Newbury," which was in a very rough neighbourhood, and found about half a dozen men there, outside, drunk and violent, and using bad language. He took one of them, a man named Mallows, into custody, and whilst struggling with him the plaintiff came up and rushed at him with a running kick, shouting, "Let's —— well out him," then another constable, P.C. Waylett, came up and took Mallows, and the defendant went to take the plaintiff, who was very violent. There were about a dozen persons then present, and his comrades rushed, and struck, and kicked at the defendant, who pulled out his truncheon, but avoided hitting the plaintiff once or twice, and then the plaintiff rushed at the defendant, and the defendant struck the plaintiff on the arm, and he rushed at him again, and the defendant struck him on the head, and the plaintiff fell on the ground. Police Constable Waylett was present at the time. The crowd was very hostile. The plaintiff was drunk, but not helpless. Waylett took Mallows off to the station, and the defendant remained with the plaintiff until they brought the ambulance. The defendant did not show his leg at the station or at the Police Court. Mr. Plowden said "it was not wanted." He said that the plaintiff had been severely punished, and he discharged him. He did not say that the defendant ought not to have used his truncheon. The defendant did not whistle, because it was not necessary. Mr. Oakway (a witness subsequently called) came up, and the roughs thought he was an officer in plain clothes, and went off. There was no woman there, and no woman spoke to him. The defendant was on point duty near the "Jack of Newbury." The defendant had been in the Police Force five years. Alfred Waylett, a police constable, corroborated the defendant's evidence in some particulars, but not in others. He deposed that he was on duty in Kensal Road, and saw the defendant struggling with Mallows, and went to his assistance, and as the defendant and the witness were about to start with Mallows, the plaintiff rushed across and made a running kick at the defendant, saying "Let's ——— well out him"; upon which the defendant released his hold on Mallows in custody. There were about a dozen persons present. The witness came back to take the plaintiff, and found the plaintiff on the ground. The crowd was very angry, and they shouted, "Out with the police," but they confined themselves to shouting. The witness did not blow his whistle, as he did not think there was danger. He had all his work with Mallows and did not see the defendant strike the plaintiff. John Oakway, who described himself as an insurance agent, was the next witness called on behalf of the defendant. He deposed that on the afternoon in question he was walking along Kensal Road, and saw five or six people outside the "Jack of Newbury." He saw the defendant use his truncheon on the plaintiff, who made a running kick at him. The constable used the truncheon on the plaintiff's head; there were forty or fifty people there; when the kick was made he went to the constable's assistance; the witness did not give evidence at the police court; he had volunteered his evidence when he met the defendant three weeks afterwards. The witness saw the truncheon used twice. It was after the man was on the ground. He did not see anything to justify the constable using it then. George Bond, police constable, who was acting as sergeant at the station, deposed that in consequence of what Waylett said to him when he brought Mallows to the station he hastened to the "Jack of Newbury." There was a large crowd there shouting "Let's out him"; that means, "Let us kill him." The plaintiff was on the ground; the defendant said he had been kicked, and showed witness a mark on the leg of his trousers. There were fifty or one hundred in the crowd when he came up. The defendant was there alone, trembling like a leaf. Henry Dellow, a police sergeant, deposed that he was present at the police court. The Magistrate said that Wilson had been severely punished, and that punishment had been equivalent to any he would have given him. The Magistrate also commented upon the use of the truncheon, but did not say the constable ought not to have used it. If the witness's man was on the ground, and he was confronted by a threatening crowd, he should certainly blow his whistle. William Burrell, a police detective sergeant, produced seven convictions between the years 1882 and 1898 against the plaintiff for drunkenness and assaults, and one being for an assault on the police. I have now gone through the material evidence in this painful case as I thought necessary and have considered it with the greatest care, and I have come to the following conclusions as to the two questions which it is necessary to decide. First, as to that which I have regarded and referred to throughout as the first alleged assault against the defendant in striking him on the arm and head. I find that there was in all probability provocation by word and deed on the part of the plaintiff and others which occasioned and so far justified the defendant in using his truncheon in his defence. The evidence of the plaintiff himself, that he had recently been in altercation with the defendant and threatened by him with the use of the truncheon, furnishes a reason for such an act on his part, and the strong personal animosity to the defendant which he evidently has and showed at the trial, and the presence of other men idling and drinking during Bank Holiday week, provided sympathisers and allies in a conflict with the police which I believe the plaintiff threatened and engaged. I do not believe, however, that he inflicted any serious personal injury on the defendant. If that had been the case, the defendant would, in all human probability, not only have shown his leg at the police station or the police court, and indeed would have been temporarily lamed, and I therefore find that the first assault was to some extent justifiable, but at the same time I find that it was excessive in the infliction of a blow on the plaintiff's head. The evidence of Mrs. Schull and her niece (in which both gave their evidence very creditably) militates no doubt against the conclusion to which I have come as to the plaintiff having been violent in word and action, but very probably after the sight of the assault they have no very clear recollection of the circumstances which preceded it, and which they may not have seen or given attention to. With regard to the second question in this case, viz., whether the subsequent assault was committed by the defendant on the plaintiff in beating him whilst he was on the ground, I find that it was so committed without any justification, which has been clearly proved by the plaintiff and his witnesses, and even by one of the defendant's own witnesses, and has been contradicted only by the defendant's wholly unsupported evidence. On that point I find for the plaintiff with £20 damages. Costs on B scale."

We had not before us the particulars of the plaintiff's claim which showed presumably the separate acts which together constituted the wrong in respect of which the plaintiff sued. The learned Judge commenced his judgment by dividing the blows given by the defendant into two separate assaults by reference to the time at which the blows were delivered. The succession of blows given before Wilson fell to the ground constitute the first assault, and the series given afterwards constitute the second assault. With regard to the first, the learned Judge finds that "there was in all probability provocation by word and deed on the part of the plaintiff and others which occasioned and so far justified the defendant in using his truncheon in his defence"; and he therefore finds that the first assault was to some extent justifiable, but at the same time that "it was excessive in the infliction of" the blows "on the plaintiff's head." With regard to the second assault (i.e., the blows given with the truncheon after Wilson had fallen to the ground), the learned Judge found that that was "committed without any justification," and, as we understand the concluding sentence of the judgment, it was for the second and entirely unjustified assault that the damages were awarded. The effect is that, as to the first assault, the learned Judge came to the conclusion that it was justified, but that more force was used by the constable than was necessary to defend himself, and that, as to the second assault, it was violent and unjustifiable.

We feel, under these circumstances, no doubt that Wilson's complaint against P.C. Worsley was well founded, and that also was the view of the police authorities, because an inquiry was held in the case, and, as a result, P.C. Worsley was punished. The judgment of the Assistant Commissioner, dated the 30th January, 1906, after the
Q. 15401. inquiry was as follows: "I have sent for you to convey the decision of the Secretary of State in your case, and to deal with you myself. I think I need not go into the case at all. Of the decision of the County Court Judge you are quite well aware, and, in accordance with this decision, damages were given against you to the extent of £20 and costs. The case was laid before the Secretary of State inasmuch as there were extenuating circumstances, and we have now got his decision, which is 'That he cannot sanction the whole payment of the damages and costs out of the Police Fund,' but he leaves it to the Commissioner for the officer to pay a portion of it. I want you to understand quite clearly what the Commissioner's opinion is in this case. It is that you were justified in using your truncheon when attacked; that you were not to blame for having struck this man on the head; and, so far, there is nothing against you; but, after having partially disabled this man, you were not justified in continuing to strike him, as has been proved to the satisfaction of the Court you did; consequently, you were guilty of unnecessarily using your truncheon. For that offence you are now severely reprimanded and cautioned, and you will pay £5 towards the damages and costs. That £5 will be recovered from you by instalments, such as the Superintendent thinks you can pay weekly. I think you have been treated exceptionally leniently from one point of view, inasmuch as the Secretary of State might have held that you should have paid the whole of the damages. I hope you will be exceedingly careful how far you make use of your truncheon on any future occasion."

It will be noticed that in this judgment the Assistant Commissioner expressly states that the Constable was not to blame for having struck Wilson on the head. That view is not in agreement with the learned judge's findings if the words mean that the blow on the head was absolutely necessary.

It is, however, very difficult to determine exactly what took place, and what were the opinions of the learned Judge about the details of the first assault; but the defendant P.C. Worsley and all his witnesses spoke to Wilson rushing at the constable and giving him a running kick. If the learned Judge had adopted the evidence of the defendant and his witnesses in its entirety he would probably have found that the truncheon could not under the circumstances have been used promptly and effectively without hitting Wilson on the head.

Sir Edward Henry was good enough to give us his view of the matter. He said: "This constable" (Worsley) "was on duty in Kensal Town, and he found a great deal of disorder outside a public-house. He tried to get the disorderly persons to move away, but they would not move away, and he arrested a man named Mallows for being drunk. When he arrested Mallows another man called out 'Let's out him,' and he took a running kick at the constable. The constable blew his whistle, and another constable came up, and he handed Mallows over to this man's custody. Then the aggressor—Wilson, I think his name was—came at him again with a running kick, intending to kick him, and the constable drew his truncheon and hit him on the head." Q. 52120.

The Chief Commissioner is obviously taking his facts from the reports and statements as well as from the learned County Court Judge's judgment, because one of the witnesses for the defendant said that the constable did not blow his whistle, and neither he nor P.C. Waylett, who came to P.C. Worsley's assistance, alleged that he did that. But for our present purpose it may be assumed that the facts were exactly as put by Sir Edward Henry. He continued as follows: "Upon that a civil suit was instituted against Worsley, and the County Court Judge held that there was provocation by deed and by word, justifying him in using his truncheon; but he held that he was not justified in hitting the man on the head. From that opinion I venture to dissent; and I think, if you put yourself in the position of a constable against whom a drunken and disorderly man is coming with intent to injure you, the probability is you would hit him on the head. In fact, you would find great difficulty in hitting him anywhere else, because you cannot flourish your truncheon in this way—(illustrating)—because you would hit somebody else in a hostile crowd. The constable has to bring his truncheon down in a lateral direction, in which a portion of the man is exposed; and you must either hit him on the shoulder or on the head, and I think no one can blame a constable if he hits a man on the head. I go further than that, having regard to my knowledge of the grave injuries that are caused to constables. There is a case I am now dealing with where a young constable was kicked by a savage like that quite a year ago. This young constable got over it, married, and now he has developed epileptic seizures, which are the first symptoms, I understand, of general paralysis, resulting from the grievous injuries done to him." Being specifically asked whether he thought it was a case in which the constable could not, under the circumstances, avoid hitting the man on the head if he used the truncheon at all, he answered "Yes, I say more than that. If it merely struck him on the shoulder he might not have stopped the onslaught. He was bound to stop that man getting home. I think these words" (referring to the White Book) "are a sort of protection to the police authority, who give very humane directions to the men, but they are not reasonable in view of the difficulties of the constable. The words should be that he is not to use more violence with his truncheon than the emergency requires." Q. 52123. He admitted that this was a case in which Worsley had not acted in strict accordance with that instruction; but he said, "I do not see how he could hit him on the leg. He would have to stoop down to hit a man on the leg. How could you hit a man on the leg when he is charging you? It is not possible." Q. 52124.

Sir Edward Henry also read to us a letter which he had written in regard to this matter to the Secretary of State, in which the following passage occurred: "The judge finds that there was provocation by word and deed on the part of the plaintiff which justified the constable in using his truncheon, though not justifying his striking the plaintiff on the head. The wound on the head constitutes by far the most serious injury inflicted, and it was the extent of the injury which influenced the court in assessing damages. Experience has shown that however good the intention of the constables, and however explicit the instructions under which they act in the excitement of a contest, it is not possible for a man wielding a truncheon to deliver his blows exactly where he intends. If the use of the truncheon was justifiable, as it obviously was, it is not, in my view, reasonable to hold that the constable was necessarily to blame because the plaintiff was struck by him on the head. The description of what occurred of the plaintiff attempting to deliver a running kick sufficiently indicates that a blow not intended for the head might have fallen upon it. In using the truncheon while Wilson was on the ground the constable was clearly in the wrong. In estimating his culpability the circumstances of the case must not be lost sight of. Outside the public house is a very rough neighbourhood; drunken men were quarrelling, and using obscene language. The constable, who might have purposely omitted to take action, deemed it his duty, though single-handed, to intervene, and not being able to disperse these men, he arrested one Mallows, who struggled and struck him twice in the face without, as far as is known, any retaliatory Q. 52133.

action by the constable. It was then, as another constable came up, the plaintiff, after calling on the bystanders to 'out' the constable, tried to hack him over with a running kick. Had his performance been equal to his intention P.C. Worsley might have been seriously injured. He is said to be a highly nervous strung man, and as Wilson's character is well known, he having been convicted some seven times for drunkenness, assaults on police, etc., the constable may reasonably enough have considered that he was in danger, and he accordingly drew his truncheon and used it, and, as it appears, used it too much." Further in the same letter the Commissioner said: "When an officer is held culpable of such misuse of his powers he is severely dealt with departmentally. The comparatively few instances in which the courts comment adversely on constables' conduct in this exercise is a proof that the disciplinary control exercised is sufficient. Giving all the evidence consideration, the conclusions I arrive at are that the constable was justified in using his truncheon when attacked, that he should not, under the circumstances of the case, be necessarily held culpable because he struck Wilson a blow on the head, and that he was not justified in striking Wilson while on the ground." Assuming the facts to be as put by the Chief Commissioner, we see no reason for differing from his conclusion in this case.

We agree with Sir Edward Henry that, when the use of the truncheon becomes justifiable, it cannot be reasonably held that the constable is necessarily to be blamed for striking a man on the head. The White Book lays down the rule that the constable is "to take care to avoid striking anyone on the head;" but that does not mean that if the constable cannot, under the circumstances of any particular case, defend himself effectively without striking his assailant on the head he is to be censured for so doing.

White Book, p. 257.

As we construe the learned judge's observations he does not say anything inconsistent with the proposition advanced by Sir Edward Henry. He simply finds that, though there were circumstances that justified the use of the truncheon, the constable used excessive force in that he inflicted a blow on the Plaintiff's head; he evidently did not accept the Defendant's evidence in its entirety; but as he awarded no damages for the first blow on the head, delivered in the heat of combat, the learned judge clearly showed that no substantial blame could, in his opinion, be cast upon him in respect of the excess of force then used.

The complainant in this case complained that the County Court Judge had been misled by false evidence as to the previous convictions. A list purporting to be a list of previous convictions against George Wilson in this case was handed in to us, and Detective Sergeant Burrell, who was called as a witness in the County Court to prove the convictions, was also examined before us. The total number of convictions extending over more than twenty years was twelve. Wilson complained that some of the convictions as read at the County Court stated that he had been imprisoned, and, as we understand it, he was seeking to draw a distinction between a conviction resulting in a fine and a conviction resulting in imprisonment; but when asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes how many times he had been fined, he answered, "I might say a dozen"; and in the list of convictions which was handed in to us, we do find ten convictions all resulting in fines, and that in two other cases the charge was dismissed. So far as we can see, no complaint can be made against the user of this list of previous convictions at the County Court for the purpose of the defence in a civil action, and we do not find that there was any misconduct on the part of Detective-Sergeant Burrell.

Our conclusions are:—

(i.) P.C. Worsley was justified in using the truncheon to defend himself from an assault by George Wilson; and though it was not proved to the satisfaction of the learned judge that the blow on the head was necessary, yet under the circumstances the difficulty of avoiding excess of force was so great that the constable ought not to be censured for such excess.

(ii.) P.C. Worsley was guilty of serious misconduct in striking G. Wilson while he was on the ground for which he has been adequately punished.

IX.—EDWARD WELLS' CASE.

Edward Wells, who described himself as a ladies' and gentlemen's outfitter, residing at 55, Ambler Road, Finsbury Park, made a complaint against the police in reference to an incident that occurred on the 13th October, 1906, at Kelvin Road, Highbury Barn.

Edward Wells first wrote to the Secretary, and, at a subsequent interview, a statement was taken down which was in substance in accordance with the evidence which he gave before us.

The complaint was heard before us on the 22nd and 28th November and on December 14th, 1906. Wells appeared in person, and Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir represented the police concerned. We examined Wells and several witnesses who were called to support him as well as P.C. Dunham 166 N, Sergeant Hawes 58 N, and S.D.I. Smith.

The nature of the complaint can be best understood by extracting the relevant portions of his evidence in chief.

Wells told us that at about three o'clock in the afternoon on the 13th October, 1906, he was talking to a 'bus driver at the corner of Kelvin Road, where the omnibuses stop. We asked him to tell us in his own way what took place, and he said: "I had been at Highbury Barn for about two and a half hours previous to my arrest. I was talking to this coachman about business, and he promised to see me on the Tuesday. I asked him not to disappoint me on the Tuesday, as it would cause me to break other appointments with other men. While I was telling him not to disappoint me, a constable came up and caught me by the collar and cuff and told me to go away. . . . . He put one hand on my shoulder and the other on my sleeve and hustled me about, and told me to go away. I looked round at him with surprise, and asked him why he was handling me in that manner, knowing I had not convicted myself in any way, when he told me I had been there quite long enough. 'Will you go away?' I said, 'I cannot go away while you have hold of me like this.' 'Come on,' he says, 'down you go to the station, then.' I asked him continually going down what his charge was. I said, 'You cannot charge me with being intoxicated; you cannot charge me with swearing; I have caused no obstruction; I simply did my business there just the same as I have done it for years.' I said, 'What is your charge?' He said, 'I did not say I was going to charge you with being drunk or swearing.' I said, 'Tell me to satisfy me.'" He said, further, "He had his hand on my collar and sleeve, which I objected to, and I asked him if he would allow me to walk by the side of him. He said, 'No, I shall still keep hold of you,' which he did. Then when we got to the station, to my surprise he charged me with disorderly conduct and using obscene language . . . . I went into the police-station and I was put behind the iron bar, and I was asked my name and address, which I gave, and I said, 'I feel rather anxious to know what this man is charging me with, and what he is doing this for,' and the sergeant said, 'You will hear all in good time.' He was behind a partition with a small window. He was on one side, and I was behind the iron bar, and the constable stood in front of him from the window . . . . I did not hear what he was saying previous to the charge being read out to me." He suggested that the police constable whispered it first to the sergeant. He then continued: "I had to ask him to speak up, as I could not hear what he was saying. The sergeant said, 'You say he was using bad language. What was it?' 'Well,' he said, 'he was swearing.' The sergeant said, 'Tell me what it was; you are no priest. Was he f—— and b——g?' and the constable said, 'Yes.' The charge-sheet was then written out, and he was about to sign it when I stopped him and said, 'Constable, can you conscientiously sign that charge-sheet?' He made no reply, but signed it." Wells further explained that he was then put into "a dirty, dreary, ill-smelling cell." He said, "When I got used to the light I looked round for the cause of the smell. Then I found at the end of a bench or wooden seat an open water closet pan half full of refuse. I looked for some means of sluicing it out, but could not find any. I found a button in the cell, which I pressed, and a man came and opened the little

Q. 15433. wicket gate, and asked me what was the matter, and I told him. I said, 'Come and look at this; it is not the sort of place to put a respectable man in'. . . . . It was a wooden bench just high enough to sit on, and at the end of it was this w.c. pan. Then he sluiced it by some means outside. He shut the wicket door, and I asked him what steps they were taking to get me out of it, and I was told that as soon as it was necessary they would let me go. I was there, I suppose, an hour and a half, when I was called out, and it appears a gentleman came down to bail me out at about half-past three, when he was told they could not let me go till a quarter-past four. So I was detained three-quarters of an hour after an application had been made to bail me out." It appears that the witness Carter was the person who bailed Wells out. That is the substance of Wells' complaint.

On Monday, the 15th October, the case was heard at the North London Police Court before Mr. Fordham, the Magistrate, who, having heard the evidence of P.C. Dunham, Ralph Hill and Henry Carter, dismissed the case.

The following is a copy of the Charge-sheet.

Charge No. 2 without Warrant.

N. C. R. Superintendent.

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken at the Police Court:—

Thomas Dunham, P.C. 166 N., on oath saith :—On Saturday afternoon at 3, in Kelvin Road, the Defendant was using bad language and quarrelling with a 'bus driver. I asked him to go. He used abusive language, and stood in front of the horses' heads and would not go away.

Cross-examined.

You didn't ask me if I could conscientiously sign the Charge Sheet. You said at the Station :—"Now I come to think of it, it was the 'bus driver who used the bad language." He was f——g and b——g, so did the 'bus driver. I didn't charge him. I think he may be summoned.

Defence.

Ra'ph Hill, Driver, 18856, on oath saith :—On Saturday afternoon I and prisoner had a little conversation together. He talked to me on the 'bus. Prisoner used no bad language, nor did I. The police constable told him to go, and gave him no chance and took him. Prisoner collects debts for us. I was not quarrelling with him.

Henry Carter, on oath saith :—I am a coachman. I heard these two speaking to each other. I saw police constable take prisoner. I asked why, and went and bailed him out. I heard no vulgar language at all. They were talking loud about business. The 'bus was not impeded by the talking.

Discharged on Evidence.

The charges of misconduct in this case may be thus formulated :—

(1) That P.C. Dunham wrongfully arrested Edward Wells on the 13th October, 1906.

(2) That Station Sergeant Hawes improperly prompted the constable as to the charge that he ought to make against Wells.

(3) That Station Sergeant Hawes did not exercise due and reasonable care in seeing that the cells were clean and fit for the reception of prisoners.

(4) That Wells was unnecessarily detained for three-quarters of an hour after Carter had arrived to bail him out.

The principal question in this case is whether P.C. Dunham was justified in arresting Edward Wells as mentioned above. The charge he preferred at the police-station was that Wells had been guilty of disorderly conduct in making use of obscene language at Kelvin Road. Of course, if that charge is made out the constable was justified in the course he took. The question for our determination is whether in fact Wells did behave in a disorderly manner, and did make use of obscene language.

Let us see then what P.C. Dunham's account is. He said he was on point duty on the 13th October, 1906, and about 3 p.m. he heard Wells quarrelling with a
Q. 17136, &c. 'busman. He was halloaing and shouting and using the most filthy language to this 'busman in the urinal. He (the constable) was standing on the corner against Highbury Barn "on the first point about twenty yards from the urinal." When
Q. 17154. Wells and the 'busman came out the former was "using the most filthy language, and called him a f——g twister, and said he (Hill) did not mean to pay him." The constable spoke to the 'bus driver first, and told him he had better get on his 'bus, and he also spoke to Wells, telling him to leave off using such language and go away, and that he ought to know better coming and quarrelling with a 'busman during his employment, having been a licensed man himself at one time. Wells then said, "I am not f——g well going for you ; I am not drunk ; I am on the road." The 'busman got on his seat, and Wells placed himself in front of the horses' heads
Q. 17157. with the intention, as he (the constable) thought, of preventing the horses going on.

He asked Wells to go away several times, and he kept saying, "I am not drunk; I am not going for you." The constable then told him that if he did not go away he should take him away. He said, "I am not going away; I am not drunk." The constable thereupon, as he refused to go away after being asked several times to do so, caught hold of his arm and told him he should take him away. He shouted to the driver, "I shall see you again." The constable took him to Upper Street Police Station and charged him before Sergeant Hawes with disorderly conduct and using obscene language. The prisoner said, "I am not drunk, and now I come to think it over, it was not me who used the language. It was the other man." The charge having been taken, P.C. Dunham returned to his duty. That seems to be the principal part of P.C. Dunham's evidence. Q. 17158, &c. Q. 17161. Q. 17168, &c.

Most of the circumstances attending the altercation or conversation between Wells and the 'busman and the arrest by P.C. Dunham form common ground between the parties. Wells was formerly a licensed 'bus driver himself, but for some years he has carried on the business of an outfitter, and a very large part of it is due to his acquaintance with 'bus drivers and men employed in connection with the driving of omnibuses. It seems that he has been in the habit of frequenting this corner near Highbury Barn, where a great many omnibuses stop, for the purpose of obtaining orders from the employees of the various companies for clothes, and it appears also that he is in the habit of delivering them upon credit upon the terms that the price with which he debits his customer shall be paid by instalments of settled amount on certain arranged days. Hill, with whom Wells on this occasion was having what both described as a "conversation," and P.C. Dunham a "quarrel," is one of his customers, and, as we gather, on the 13th October, he owed a balance in respect of things he had bought from Wells, and had made default in payment of an instalment of the debt that had fallen due on Friday, the 12th. The conversation was about the instalment, and the result was that Hill promised to pay on the following Tuesday. The conversation began by Wells following the driver, who, after he drove up, got off his box and went into the urinal. Both men came out of the urinal together still talking, and Hill mounted to his seat in order to drive on. Wells continued to talk to him, and it seems clear that he was doing so in a loud voice, a thing that was explained by him and others as being made necessary by the noise caused by a motor-'bus just about to start. It is not quite clear where Wells was standing while he was talking to, or shouting out at, Hill after he had taken his seat. It seems certain that he was in the roadway, but he himself denies that he was standing in such a position as to lead anyone to think that he was blocking the way for the starting of Hill's 'bus. The impression left upon our minds by listening to the witnesses in this case is that the conversation was carried on throughout pretty loudly by both men, and that very likely Wells was, like a good many creditors, rather importunate in insisting that Hill should pay the instalment and eager to get him to fix a time and place for payment. Both Wells and Hill denied that there was any quarrel, and the sort of idea that they both conveyed to us was that Hill, having only a moment or two to get off his box and relieve himself in the urinal, was proceeding quite hurriedly, and that the whole conversation was carried on in a hasty and abrupt kind of way, Hill rather trying to pass the matter off, and Wells trying to pin him down to a time and place. However, so far all is plain sailing enough. That P.C. Dunham came up when Hill was on the box and Wells still talking before the omnibus moved away is not disputed, and Hill told us that he was very much surprised when the constable came up and put his hand on his (Wells') shoulder and caught him by the collar and cuff. It is, however, undoubted that the constable did come up, and for that there must have been some cause. It is clear to us that the conversation must have been carried on in an unusually loud manner, and that Wells must have been behaving unusually or the attention of the constable would not have been attracted. But the real question for us is not whether P.C. Dunham was wrong in coming up to satisfy himself as to what was going on, but whether what he saw and heard justified him in arresting Wells. Q. 15621 to 15626. Q. 15631. See Q. 15601.

If the matter stood simply upon the evidence of Wells and Hill upon the one hand and P.C. Dunham on the other, it is quite clear that it would be unsafe to accept the account of the conversation and behaviour given by the two former as against a constable of good character who had no personal object in intervening, or in taking Wells into custody, and who would hardly use his power of arrest unless Wells, when the constable called his attention to his misbehaviour and civilly requested him to be quiet and go away, had refused to do so. However, that is not the case, because there is a considerable body of testimony which goes to show that P.C. Dunham is not at all accurate in his description of Wells' behaviour and language. Besides Hill, to whom we have already referred, and to whose evidence perhaps it would not be right to attach much importance, since he, in a sense, was a partner in such disorder as there was, we have the evidence of five witnesses who seem to be very quiet, decent, trustworthy men, who had no real personal interest in the matter, and who appeared to be honestly endeavouring to tell us what they saw of the matter.

Q. 15514, &c. Henry Carter, a coachman, who was acquainted with Wells, first went into the urinal and saw Wells and Hill there talking business, and they went out leaving him inside. When he got out he heard them "still talking, and then saw the police constable put his hand on Wells' shoulder and take him." Carter said to the constable, "What's up," and the latter replied, "Oh, don't you have so much to say, otherwise I shall take you." He said, "Oh, will you." Carter then added to Wells, "Never mind, I will soon go and fetch my receipt and fetch you out," by which he meant he would go to his house to fetch his receipt for rates in order to show the Q. 15516. officer in the charge-room that he was a householder. Asked where they were, he Q. 15520. somewhat amplified his preceding answers and said, "They were in the urinal, and then they walked out into the street, and kept on talking as they went out. They were speaking loud, and when I got outside the 'busman was on his box, and Mr. Wells was speaking to him on the side of the omnibus, and I saw the policeman put his hand on Mr. Wells' shoulder." The 'bus was then standing there. In answer Q. 15543. to Mr. Dickinson, the witness said that "Wells was demanding his money from the driver. The driver owed him some money, and he was talking to him, and they were both talking in rather an excitable state—loud." He further described the Q. 15544. conversation as a kind of altercation "between their two selves." He positively denied that Wells made any movement towards the horse. He was only "talking to the driver and looking up at him when I saw him."

Q. 25217 &c. William Hume, who described himself as puller-up to the London General Omnibus Company outside Highbury Barn Tavern, said that he had been there for nearly four years, and he seems to have been acquainted with Wells before the Q. 25224. incident into which we are now inquiring. He told us: "I saw Wells having a few words with Driver Hill; it was concerning money matters, I believe, and when he got out in the middle of the road, Mr. Hill certainly got a little bit excited, but no more than a great many more people do. Driver Hill said something to him that I could not catch, and Mr. Wells said to him, 'Oh, wont I? Then I'll see about that on Tuesday.' Thereupon the constable came and caught hold of his coat collar and arrested him." The witness said that he had heard no bad language used on this occasion. This witness did not see Wells and the driver going into or coming out Qs. 25257, 25258. of the urinal; and when his attention was attracted by the conversation Hill was on the box and Wells was in the middle of the road. Wells did not get in front of the Q. 25261. horses, he stood by their side, and he made no movement as if to prevent the horses going on. In cross-examination the witness, though he denied that there was any Q. 25320. f——g and b——g on this occasion, admitted that "There is a certain amount of swearing going on amongst them"—('busmen)—"you know," and he also admitted Q. 25329. that Wells shouted to the driver of the 'bus, "You don't mean to pay me," or words to that effect, which he had not mentioned before.

Q. 25334, &c. Harry Preston, a ticket inspector in the service of the London General Omnibus Company, said that he was on duty at Highbury Barn at the time of Wells' arrest. He said he had known Wells for many years. He said that he did not notice Wells Q. 25405. and Hill coming together from the urinal, but only just before the arrest after Hill Q. 25409. had got on to his box. Wells was in conversation with the driver, talking a bit loud. Q. 25406. He said that was a common thing for a 'busman, and that he often got called over the coals at home for speaking loud. He was much surprised when the constable took Wells, and so were other people standing there, "they all could not make head or Q. 25453. tail of it." He did not hear the constable speak to Wells before he arrested him, but, Q. 25451. in answer to another question, he gave an answer not quite consistent, because on Q. 25478. being asked, "How long was the constable talking to Wells before he actually took Q. 25479. him," he said, "Not two minutes; that is where the surprise came in; it seemed like two minutes."

The evidence of John Miller, who was occupied in watering motor-'buses for the Road Car Company outside Highbury Barn on the 12th October, and who remembered seeing Wells arrested, does not seem to carry the matter any further, as he did not actually see Wells talking to the 'busman; but he told us that the car he was watering then never stopped working during the time it was on the rank; and, if that be so, there appears to be some ground for the suggestion that Wells and Hill were bound to converse loudly. Q. 25165. Q. 25174 &c.

Charles Matley, a timekeeper employed by the Road Car Company, was also called, and remembered the affair. He heard some loud shouting in the urinal and saw the police constable take Wells away, but he said little about it. He said, however, what is not without some importance, that he had known Wells for many years, and had never known him to use a bad word. Q. 25369.

That is what is to be gathered from the witnesses, who may be regarded as coming to confirm Wells' affair of the matter. It will be noticed that two of the witnesses, at any rate, are persons in the same employment as Hill, the 'bus driver, and as it happens (whether by a mere coincidence or not we cannot say) two witnesses, Young and Dawson, were connected with the motor-'bus of which mention has been made.

Thomas William Young said that he was in charge of a motor-'bus at 3 p.m. on the day in question on the front rank at Kelvin Road outside the Highbury Barn public-house. He went into the urinal, and as he went in he heard Wells shouting at another man in there (Hill). He said, "You f——g, b——g twister, you don't mean to pay me," and used other obscene words. When he came out of the urinal, Hill was getting on to his 'bus as though he were getting out of Wells' way. Wells walked just in front of the horses and shouted, "If you don't b——g well pay me before next Tuesday you will see what I will do." The witness described his motor as being stationary and the engines not working. He said P.C. Dunham came round in front of the motor and said to Wells, "You had better clear out of this; it is not a fit place to come and quarrel with the man, and you had better go away." Wells said, "I shan't go away for you. What have I done to go away for? I have not caused any breach of the peace." The policeman said, "Go away," and Wells said, "I shall not." The policeman said, "If you wont"—and then he put his hand on his collar and took him down the road. Q. 16447, &c. Q. 16460. Q. 16465.

It is not necessary to go very much at length into this witness's evidence, because if we accept it as true there seems no reason why we should accept one part of it and reject another part of it, and, if true, it affords very complete confirmation, in substance, of the constable's version of the affair, but it seems difficult to accept Young as an honest witness. Upon being examined at considerable length by us he said he thought the constable was perfectly in his right, but when he did so he was unaware of the fact that we had in our minds a letter to Wells undoubtedly written by him in which he said, "Sorry to say I cannot get the day off; I must study my living. I would come if I could get the time off, as I witnessed your arrest from start to finish, which I considered unwarranted." We feel in face of that letter, quite apart from the fact that the witness's manner was wholly unsatisfactory in the witness-box, that we cannot accept his evidence as that of an honest observer.

George Edward Dawson, who was the conductor of the motor-'bus of which Young was the driver, was standing outside the Highbury Barn public-house on this occasion. His attention was first struck by a loud voice in the urinal. He heard the words, "You b——g tyke, you f——g well don't mean to pay me." He saw Wells and Hill come out of the urinal. Wells was swearing and shouting at the top of his voice all the while. When he came out Hill got on to his box because his time was up to go away, and his 'bus pulled out from behind witness's, and Wells followed round and kept shouting to him all the while. When the 'bus came to the corner the police constable came up and said, "We cannot have anything of that here; get away out of it." Wells said he would not. He said, "I am not drunk." The police constable told him two or three times to get away out of it. Wells said, "No, I will not"; and the police constable caught hold of him by the shoulder and Q. 16859. Q. 16872 &c.

led him away. Here again, though there is considerable discrepancy between Dawson's evidence and the evidence of P.C. Dunham, his account, if true in substance, affords corroboration of the constable's evidence, which we should find it very difficult indeed to disregard. There is no document, as in the case of Young's evidence, by which one can check his evidence, and it is not easy to fix upon any of his statements as obviously improbable or untrue. It appears that he came to give evidence in consequence of being asked by a police constable to go to the police-station. He went there and had an interview with Inspector Smith, to whom he made a statement. Inspector Smith appears also to have taken a statement from the witness Young, and we see absolutely no reason for supposing that the Inspector did not take their evidence down with complete fairness, and no inference adverse to these two witnesses ought to be made from the simple fact that they had been in communication with the police; but still it is for us to judge whether they were honestly telling us nothing but the truth, and, forming the best judgment we can, we think that Dawson, like Young, was exaggerating and embellishing his tale with the view of misleading us in favour of P.C. Dunham.

The really crucial difference between the two versions of the affair is whether such words as "f——g" and "b——g" were used by Wells. As to the degree of loudness with which the conversation was carried on, either in the urinal or when the driver had got on top of the 'bus, it is impossible to arrive at any certain result. So, again, as to whether the conversation was of so friendly a character as Hill wished us to believe when he came before us to give evidence, or whether it was of a somewhat angry character, is a matter that we cannot possibly decide. But the question whether Wells did interlard his conversation with offensive words of the description suggested is one as to which there is a clearcut issue. No one can suppose for a moment that 'bus drivers never use expressions of the kind. We should think it very likely that they are rough and not particular about their expressions, but still that may be so without its being at all probable that they would so far forget themselves as to do so when speaking loudly in a public street. Wells appeared to be a man of good character, and he seemed to us, from the way he talked, to speak better and more correctly than one would have expected, even making allowance for the fact that it was his cue to make a good impression upon the members of the Commission. It should be observed that the mere dropping in the course of a conversation of some improper word is hardly in itself using "indecent or obscene language to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers," and even if Wells here did use one of these vulgar and improper words, that alone would not justify the intervention of the constable, who is not placed on his point or his patrol for the purpose of regulating the conversation of other people, but for the purpose of keeping the peace, and it is only when the use of indecent language, coupled with other circumstances, constitutes a nuisance to passers-by, or to persons standing near, that a constable is justified in treating it as an offence.

Upon the whole, the circumstances here seem to amount to no more than this: Wells and Hill engaged in very loud conversation when they met in the urinal; they came out still talking loudly and, it may be, heatedly, and they continued the conversation after the driver had got on his box. Wells was talking so loudly that it may fairly be called shouting, and it may be that in the hurry of the moment some improper expression may have slipped from him, but he was not threatening or abusing Hill, and, whatever may have been suggested by tone and gesture, there was no real quarrel between the two men. That being so, it appears to us that P.C. Dunham was over-zealous in interfering. Wells immediately imagined that he was supposed to be drunk, and protested his sobriety, not recognising the fact that the constable might be right in telling him to be quiet and to go away instead of standing shouting in the street, and, coming to the conclusion that it was alleged that he was drunk, Wells, instead of behaving prudently, refused to accept and to act upon the constable's warning. Thereupon P.C. Dunham, in his turn not behaving very prudently, and perhaps losing his temper, arrested Wells for being disorderly and using obscene language to the evident astonishment of men who had seen and heard Wells talking on the corner to 'busmen dozens of times before. When he got to the station he had of course to prefer a charge, and to support that charge he had to make allegations of sufficient gravity to justify the Station Sergeant in taking it. If Wells is right upon the point, as to which we are very doubtful, it was only after private colloquy with the Station Sergeant that P.C. Dunham hit upon a satisfactory form of words. Anyhow, the charge was taken, and P.C. Dunham was committed to a formal prosecution at the Police Court.

The explanation of this case is much the same as that which in our opinion is the true one in regard to the arrest of James Baker, and that is over-zealous and unnecessary intervention on the part of the constable, resentment on the part of the person spoken to, an altercation between him and the constable, and in the result the preferring of an inaccurate and unfounded charge. We have therefore come to the conclusion that in this case we must find that the arrest of Wells was not justified.

Complaint as to Private Colloquy between Sergeant Hawes and Wells.

Wells, as we have seen, complained that something in the nature of a private colloquy went on between the Station Sergeant and P.C. Dunham in the charge-room, and suggested that the sergeant prompted him as to the kind of words that he ought to employ in making a charge of disorderly conduct by using obscene language.

It would, we think, be wrong on the part of an inspector to prompt the officer making a charge as to the best form of language in which to make it, if the prompting were of such a character as to amount to instructions, or suggesting to, the officer as to what evidence he was to give in support of the charge. Here we do not think, when the evidence of Sergeant Hawes, as to the interview, is looked at, that there is any ground for thinking there was any impropriety of the kind alleged.

Sergeant Hawes said that he was in his office at the time that Wells was brought into the station, and he came to the window, which apparently is in the partition between the inspector's office and the charge-room. The constable, speaking through the window, said that he had a charge there of disorderly conduct, making use of obscene language. The sergeant then, to use his own language, took the charge under the following circumstances: "I went into the charge-room. I said, 'What did you see him do?' He said, 'I saw him having a heated conversation with a 'bus driver at Highbury Barn, Kelvin Road.' I said, 'Yes.' He said, 'Making use of filthy language.' I said, 'What did you hear him say?' He said, 'I heard him call the driver a f——g twister.' He lowered his voice when he said the word 'f——g.' I said, 'Speak up, so that the prisoner can hear.' He said, 'I cautioned him two or three times to go away, but he refused, and then I took him into custody.' Then Wells said, 'I am not drunk; I am not f——g well going for you.' He said, 'The driver went on,' and he took him into custody. I accepted the charge. I read the charge over to him. The prisoner replied, 'I am not drunk.' Now I come to think of it, it was the 'bus driver made use of bad language. He was searched and placed in a cell."

Wells' suspicions were probably aroused by the lowering of P.C. Dunham's voice, and it is likely, though there is no doubt that the sergeant is giving a substantially accurate version of what took place, that from where Wells was standing it may have appeared that there was a short private conversation between the constable and the sergeant, and it may be that more talk took place between the sergeant and P.C. Dunham before the latter was told to speak up than the former remembers.

The case as detailed, according to the sergeant's recollection, by the constable certainly seems a somewhat weak one, but we are not prepared to say, as the constable did describe the conversation as "heated," and did suggest that the defendant had publicly made use twice of the word "f——g," and refused to go away when cautioned, that the sergeant was wrong in taking it. It seems to us, however, that Wells is mistaken in thinking that there was any impropriety whatsoever in the conduct of the sergeant.

As to the Cell.

Wells complained that the cell in which he was placed was dirty. He said, "I found at the end of the bench or wooden seat an open w.c. pan half full." Sergeant Hawes, being asked who was responsible for the state of the cell, told us that the custom was to flush the w.c. "every time a man goes down there," and that "if a Q. 17489 man was liberated on bail the flush would be pulled before anybody went into the cell." The cell he described as clean enough, though he would not say anything

Q. 17491. about its being "dreary." He said that he himself had, when he went on duty at 2 o'clock that day, gone over the cell.

The negligence complained of by Wells does not appear to be of a very serious character. If Sergeant Hawes in his inspection at 2 o'clock omitted to see that the w.c. was flushed then, or if some other prisoner had been in and the gaoler omitted to flush the w.c. after that prisoner went, we do not think that there is any good ground for complaint. So far as we can see, Wells' statement that he had to ring the bell, and that the w.c. was flushed while he was there, is not contradicted; but he admits that upon his ringing the bell the matter was put right. The omission to flush the w.c. before he went in seems to have been an accident which might happen even in a very well managed and superintended police-station; and we do not feel called upon to take any formal notice of the matter.

Alleged Negligence as to Bailing.

Wells complained that he had been kept at the station longer than was necessary.
Q. 17420. Sergeant Hawes tells us that before Wells was taken to the cell he said to him, "I shall let you out as soon as possible; I shall verify your address and let you out on your own bail." Carter, however, in the meantime came in and said to him, "My friend has been locked up. Can I be bail for him?" The sergeant said, "Yes. Are you a householder?" He said, "Yes." The sergeant said, "Have you anything to prove to me that you are a householder?" He said, "No, but I can soon slip up home and fetch my rent-book or receipts." Thereupon, the sergeant having asked how long it would take, and Carter having replied about half an hour, he (Carter) went off.

Wells is clearly wrong in saying that he was at the station for an hour and a half, since it is clear that he was brought into the station at 3.20 and was bailed out at 4.21. It is true that Carter was there pretty promptly after him—very likely half-past three, as he says. Wells appears to have thought that he ought to have been bailed out the moment Carter came; but the conversation with Sergeant Hawes,
Q. 15538. with the substance of which Carter agrees, shows why he went away, and Carter himself says that he did not come back till 4.15, so that from the time Carter came back to the time Wells was let out only five or six minutes elapsed. The complaint on this head wholly fails.

The result is we find:—

(1) That P.C. Dunham was not justified in arresting Wells; that P.C. Dunham wrongfully preferred a charge of disorderly conduct and making use of obscene language at Kelvin Road against Wells; and that P.C. Dunham at the police-court gave evidence which tended to exaggerate the case against defendant in such a way that the Magistrate might have been misled.

(2) That Sergeant Hawes was not guilty of any improper conduct in the charge-room.

(3) That Sergeant Hawes did exercise due and reasonable care in seeing that the cells were clean and fit for the reception of prisoners.

(4) That Wells was not detained unnecessarily at the police-station.

X.—MULLINS' CASE.

The complainant in this case described himself as a porter at Covent Garden, residing at 35, Johanna Street, Oakley Street, Lambeth, and alleged that he was the victim of an unjustifiable assault committed by a police constable in Oakley Street, followed by his arrest by the same constable without lawful cause, and a further assault by the same constable at Kennington Road Police Station. He also complained that unnecessary violence was used in taking him to the police-station. Qs. 15673-15674.

Mullins' Story.

Mullins' story as told before us was as follows:—He was a married man with a wife and five children; he had been for several years with the same employers, and he produced a certificate from them which confirmed his statement and gave him an entirely satisfactory character. Q. 15677. Q. 15679. Q. 15680.

On Sunday, the 9th September, 1906, he was going home with his ten-year-old daughter, and passed a constable whom he thought he knew speaking to two marine store dealers whom he knew. Mullins touched the constable's shoulder and said, "What! At the ear-hole again," as a joke. It turned out that the constable was not an acquaintance of Mullins, and he turned round and punched him in the ribs saying, "I will give you ear-hole." His child started crying and he took her home (100 yards); he took her to the top of the street and sent her indoors and went back to the constable. The constable was then by himself. He asked for his number. The constable said, "I will give you number," and caught him by the collar and took him to Kennington Road Station; he caught Mullins by the ear and kept prodding him with his knee and shaking him till he got him to the station. At the station "I sat down on a form, and there were two other policemen in the room at the time. One went through one door—as the dock might be here, there is the door on the right. He went through that door with some papers in his hand. The other one went into the Inspector's room. There was only me and the policeman in charge of me in the room by ourselves. He walked up to me and hit me in the mouth and slit all my lip. . . . . Whatever business these other policemen were doing one went through one door and one went through the other door, and when he (the arresting constable) saw there was no one there he walked up to me and hit me and burst all my lip." He was charged about five minutes afterwards and nothing further happened in the interval. He thought the constable said to the Inspector, when the constable charged him, that he was in Oakley Street creating a disturbance and was drunk. The constable also said something about obscene language. Mullins asked the Inspector to take him to the cells himself. He showed the Inspector his handkerchief that was smothered with blood. He told him while in the dock before the charge was taken, "I had no cut mouth when I came to the station, and now he has punched me in the mouth for nothing at all." After he was taken to the cell he asked the Inspector to send for a doctor. He also asked for his own doctor (Dr. Read), but only the divisional surgeon came. He saw Mullins' mouth all swollen, and Mullins told him how he got it. Mullins stated that he had had a glass of cider at ten minutes to 11 at one house and one twopennyworth of Irish whisky after that at another house where he had come out of when he saw the constable. He had only lemonade or ginger beer during the previous three or four hours. After half an hour or an hour or an hour and a half a friend came and bailed him out. Next morning he saw the constable in the corridor at the Police Court. The constable said, "You do not want to say this and say that. It is all right; it is a very lenient magistrate, Mr. Rose, and it will only be a matter of a fine." He told the constable to mind his own business. Q. 15681. Q. 15683, &c. Q. 15687-15688. Q. 15691. The Proceedings.

The formal facts and proceedings are as follows:—P.C. Morgan, 383 L, arrested the complainant in Oakley Street, about 11.15 p.m. on Sunday the 9th September, 1906, and took him in custody to Kennington Road Police Station, and there charged him before Inspector Wheeler, who was in charge of the station when the complainant was brought in, with being drunk and disorderly, and using obscene language in Oakley Street. The Inspector accepted the charge, and the prisoner was detained in the cells until 12.55 a.m., when he was bailed out and allowed to depart. He had been some time previously examined by Dr. Henry, the Divisional Surgeon, who was telephoned for by the Inspector, when Mullins alleged that he was not drunk, and asked to see a doctor. The result of the examination was recorded in the Occurrence Book as follows :—"At 12 a.m. attended and examined George Mullins, who denied being drunk. He had evidently been drinking, but was not drunk at the time I examined him." This entry was signed by Dr. Henry.

The case was heard on Monday, the 10th September, at the Tower Bridge Police Court by Mr. Rose. It appears that the charge prosecuted at the Police Court differed from the charge taken at the station.

Q. 17820. Qs. 18965 18970. The charge against Mullins tried by the Magistrate was for that he was found unlawfully drunk in Oakley Street, and while so drunk was guilty of riotous and disorderly behaviour. The charge of using obscene language was apparently dropped, and the last-mentioned charge substituted at the Police Court for the original charge.

Q. 15749. Besides the evidence of the prosecuting constable and Mullins, the Magistrate heard the evidence of Inspector Wheeler and two other constables as to the alleged assault at the station, and in the result discharged the prisoner. It is clear that the Magistrate was impressed by Mullins' story. The constable admitted that he made Q. 18674 this observation—"He makes a very serious allegation against you, and his story is rather circumstantial as to what took place in the street," though he denied the Qs. 15797, 18170. allegation that the Magistrate said, "I do not believe your story, and the prisoner will be discharged."

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken by the Clerk of the Court:—

The examination of George Morgan, Thomas Wheeler, Charles Hunt, Alfred Saunders and George Mullins, taken on oath this 10th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1906, at the Tower Bridge Police Court, in the County of London, and within the Metropolitan Police District, before John Rose, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis, sitting at the Police Court aforesaid, in the presence and hearing of George Mullins, who is charged this day before me for that he was found unlawfully drunk in Oakley Street, and whilst so drunk was guilty of riotous and disorderly behaviour. George Morgan (sworn), P.C. 383 L Division. At 11.30 p.m. yesterday I saw the prisoner in Oakley Street, drunk and quarrelling, surrounded by a crowd. I sent him away, but he came back and refused to go away, and used obscene language. A doctor saw him at 12 o'clock, and said he was not drunk.

Thomas Wheeler (sworn), Inspector, L Division. At 11.30 p.m. last night the prisoner was charged. He was very excited, and accused the P.C. of striking him in his mouth. His lip was swollen. He admitted the charge. He was drunk. Later he asked to see a doctor, as he said he was not drunk. The doctor certified him not drunk then.

Charles Hunt (sworn), P.C., 58 L Division. The prisoner was drunk and excited when he was brought into the station. I saw no violence used. I was busy writing. There was a little blood on his face. I took him to the cell.

Alfred Saunders (sworn), P.C., 412 L Division. The prisoner was very excited. I did not see the P.C. use any violence towards him. He refused to give me his name.

Cross-examined.

It was necessary for the P.C. to hold him on the seat.

(Prisoner) George Mullins (sworn.) I am a Covent Garden gangsman. At 11 p.m. last night I had a glass of cider in the Duke of Sussex public-house. A girl of 11 was with me. I came out and saw P.C. speaking to two men. I tapped him on the shoulder, saying, "At his ear-hole again" (meaning a man being bribed). He walked over to me and hit me in the ribs. The girl cried. I handed her over to her mother and went back to the P.C. and asked him for his number. Another man with him said to him, "Go on, give him one." He caught me by the back of the neck and nearly strangled me. Against the paper shop he hit me again in the back, and he kept poking me with his knee. In the police-station I sat down. He stood over me and said, "You——. I know who you are, you are one of those bleeders," and he hit me in the mouth, and then a second time. My mouth bled. I held out my hands and said, "I don't see why you want to hit me." The doctor examined me for a quarter of an hour.

The above depositions of George Morgan, Thomas Wheeler, Charles Hunt, Alfred Saunders and George Mullins (prisoner) were taken and sworn before John Rose, Esq., one of the Magistrates of the Police Courts of the Metropolis at the Police Court aforesaid on the day and year first above-mentioned.

The charges of misconduct in this case may be thus formulated:

(1) That P.C. Morgan assaulted Mullins when Mullins went up to him and made a jocular remark to him in Oakley Street. Q. 15696. Q. 15785

(2) That P.C. Morgan wrongfully arrested Mullins in Oakley Street at the time and under the circumstances mentioned above in the account given by the complainant. Q. 15703, &c. Qs. 15791–15593.

(3) That P.C. Morgan was guilty of using unnecessary violence towards and causing unnecessary pain to the prisoner while taking him from the place of arrest to the police-station. Q. 15706. Q. 15707.

(4) That P.C. Morgan assaulted Mullins at the station in the charge-room as mentioned above in the account given by the complainant. Qs. 15709–15912, 17532, &c.

(5) That P.C. Morgan wrongfully preferred a charge of being drunk and disorderly and using obscene language. Q. 15724.

(6) That Inspector Wheeler was guilty of an error of judgment in accepting the charge of drunkenness.

It may be noted that the complaint of misconduct was confined to P.C. Morgan. In the complainant's own words, "When I made the complaint to the Inspector I got more than justice from the Inspector." In fact, the matter at which the complainant seemed chiefly if not solely aggrieved was the assault in the charge-room. Moreover, he expressed him self satisfied with the way in which the case was tried. "I got the greatest justice at the Court." Q. 17516 Compare Q. 15761. Q. 15801. Q. 15845. Q. 15784.

Proceedings before the Commission.

We heard the complaint preferred by Mullins on the 22nd and 29th November and the 3rd December, 1906. Earl Russell appeared as Counsel for Mullins, and the Police were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

Mullins told his story as stated above, and his little girl Katie Mullins and Mrs. Mullins were also called as witnesses on his behalf.

On the police side the first and principal witness was, of course, P.C. Morgan, 383 L. Besides the constable we examined Inspector Wheeler, who took the charge, and P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders, who gave us information as to what took place in the charge room. Dr. Henry, the Divisional Surgeon, who was called in to examine Mullins at his request, also gave evidence. Inspector Spencer told us the result of inquiries which he had made after the dismissal of the charge against Mullins by the Magistrate, and how he came to take statements from George Sims and his uncle, Frederick Sims. The learned Counsel for the police very fairly called the two Sims, though their evidence so far as it goes confirms Mullins' story. The only portion of the police evidence which it appears to us to be expedient to summarise here is that of P.C. Morgan. It will suffice to refer to the other portions of the evidence on the police side when discussing the issues raised in the case.

P.C. Morgan gave us an account of the way in which it became his duty, as he thought, to arrest the complainant, which is almost entirely at variance with the latter's story. He said that he was on duty on the 9th September in Oakley Street, which runs between Waterloo Road and the Westminster Bridge Road, when at about 11.15 p.m. his attention was called to Mullins with several others having "a heated altercation" which led to blows. A good deal may turn upon the origin of the disturbance or affair, and therefore it is best to give the constable's account in his own words. Asked to tell us what he first noticed, he replied: "At ten past 11 on the evening of the 9th September last I was on duty in Oakley Street when I saw Mullins Q. 17605, &c.

with several others having a heated altercation which led to blows, Mullins taking part. I went to disperse the crowd, and requested them all to go away. They all went away with the exception of Mullins. I again advised him to go away, and he did so. Five minutes later he returned, running up the road with his hat off, several persons following behind shouting out, 'Where is he?' I again went to him and asked him what was the matter. He said, 'What has it got to do with you?' I told him to go away home. He said he would f——g well go when he liked, 'You and twenty other policemen would not take me.' I arrested him. He became violent at first for a few yards, and then went quiet. I got him to the station." He said that from his behaviour he thought that he was drunk. When he got his prisoner to the station he set him down on the form in the charge room where at that moment there were present two reserve police constables. Then, in his own words, "The Inspector arrived a minute after I took the charge in. The man (Mullins) accused me of assaulting him by striking him in the mouth. The Inspector asked me if that was right, and I told him it was a falsehood. He asked me then what the charge was. I told him it was drunk and disorderly and making use of obscene language in Oakley Street. He asked me what he was doing. I told him he was fighting with another man and using obscene language. I told him to go away, and he said he would f——g well go when he liked. The charge was taken. When read over to him he said, 'I admit all that, but,' he said, 'this man struck me in the mouth in this room,' which I denied. He was put back in the cell, and I went back on my beat." The only other point of importance elicited in examination in chief is that P.C. Morgan remembered a man named Cameron, whom he knew by sight, who, when he had got his prisoner in custody, asked him (the constable) if he wanted any help. P.C. Morgan replied, "I think I can manage," and Cameron walked down as far as Westminster Bridge Road with him, when he left.

The Questions in Dispute.

So far as Mullins himself is concerned, his chief grievance is that P.C. Morgan struck him with his fist in the face in the charge room, and thereby cut his lip. He came before us with very great reluctance because of the publicity which it entailed, especially as his name had appeared prominently in some newspapers as an alleged recipient of money which had been distributed in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden by some eccentric person. We rather gathered that if it had not been for the alleged assault Mullins would not have thought the arrest and the consequent proceedings worth making a fuss about, because they had not affected his good relations with his employers, and because his occupation as an outdoor porter brought him a good deal into contact with constables, and he desired to keep on friendly terms with members of the Force. But though the question of the alleged assault in the charge room is the most important issue for us, as it seemed the only one of consequence to Mullins, it becomes necessary for us to consider the case in all its bearings upon the conduct of the police officers concerned.

The principal questions of fact are:—

(1.) Was Mullins drunk at 11.15 p.m. or so on the Sunday evening in question?

(2.) Was he disorderly at or just before the time of arrest?

(3.) Did P.C. Morgan strike Mullins on the face in the charge room, or, if not there, before they got to the station?

Here, as in other cases which we have investigated, the protagonists in the conflict of evidence are the complainant and the constable on his beat. The answers that we give to the question put mainly depend upon whether we believe Mullins on the one hand or P.C. Morgan on the other. The stories cannot be reconciled, and as the acceptance of either story does not land us in any great improbabilities, the result of the inquiry must largely depend upon the respective credibility of the complainant and the constable.

Mullins may certainly be described as a man of good character. He and his wife had been living in the same street for some years, and he appears to be a sober and industrious person. He is clearly not, judging from his appearance, a man who has been or is addicted to excessive drinking. There is nothing to show that he is a man of quarrelsome temper, though he did appear to be, as one might expect from his occupation, a somewhat rough and hardy man, not very particular about the niceties of language, well able to take care of himself in a scrimmage, and not likely to be over-sensitive about a little rough usage. There was about his way of talking a kind of bluff, manly straightforwardness that impressed us personally very favourably. His whole manner during the proceedings struck us as that of an honest man.

P.C. Morgan, too, had been in the Force for some nine years, has borne a good character, and has received the usual regular increases of pay which follow upon good and efficient discharge of duty. On this night he was upon his beat as usual. Mullins was a complete stranger to him, and, apart from an incident which took place, if Mullins' story be true, when he came up to P.C. Morgan on his beat, there is no suggestion that the constable had any spite or feeling of any kind against him, or that anything had occurred to ruffle his temper. He may fairly claim that so far as character is concerned his word ought to be treated as being quite as good as Mullins'. But while we are willing to give him the full benefit suggested by these considerations, we regret to say that we came to the conclusion from his manner in the witness box that his testimony is not to be relied upon. His manner was by no means satisfactory. He told us, indeed, his own story in chief well enough, but when in the course of his further examination certain points, which we need not pause to mention here, were put to him, he was on more than one occasion reduced to an embarrassed silence. That was the case, for instance, in regard to a rather remarkable omission before the Magistrate. It appears from the Notes of Evidence that he simply told Mr. Rose "At 11.30 p.m. yesterday I saw the prisoner in Oakley Street drunk and quarrelling, surrounded by a crowd," without mentioning one word about any fighting or blows. Seeing that the only suggestion that he made to us as to the origin of Mullins' cut lip was the fighting, and that Mullins when giving evidence in his own behalf told the Magistrate that he had been hit in the charge room, it strikes us as curious. He had told Inspector Wheeler that the prisoner was fighting in Oakley Street. In itself the mere fact that he did not use the same form of words before the Magistrate as he employed in making the charge at the station does not tell against him, in our opinion, though the omission is one of a serious fact, aggravating the disorder alleged against the defendant. What struck us was the way in which the witness completely broke down in giving any explanation of the omission. That circumstance points to a want of certainty on the part of the witness as to what had taken place, and a fear lest any explanation that he might suggest might compromise him. Apart from his failure to account for one or two such discrepancies, there were indications in his manner that somehow suggested to our minds that he was not genuinely repeating what he remembered of the scene in which he had been an actor, but that he was repeating and endeavouring to adhere to an account of the way in which Mullins came to be arrested which would justify him, and afford at the same time a plausible answer to the counter charge of assault. However, it is fortunate for us that the evidence of other witnesses makes us largely independent of considerations resting simply upon a nice discrimination of the comparative trustworthiness of these two witnesses founded on appearance and demeanour in the witness box, though we should certainly prefer Mullins' account to that of P.C. Morgan if we had been dependent simply upon their testimony.

Condition of Mullins.

In our judgment there is no doubt that Mullins was quite sober when arrested, not only because Dr. Henry, the Divisional Surgeon, found on examining him about 20 minutes after the charge against him was taken that he was not drunk, and gave it as his opinion that it was unlikely that he could have been violently drunk at 11, and still less likely that he could have been in that condition at 11.15: but because we believe the account Mullins gave of the way in which he had spent the day and the evening and the amount of drink he had taken during that time. He told us that after going with his daughter to High Mass he went home and had dinner with his family. Afterwards, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, he and his daughter Katie started for an excursion to Greenwich, where they stayed in the Park a long time, and then came back by

Q. 15750. boat, arriving home about 10 or a little later. Mullins told us that during the six weeks previously he had been taking nothing else but cider, and that during the day when he could not get cider he took only lemonade. On getting back, and having finished tea, he went out a little before 11 o'clock, and went to the public-house at the corner of his turning, i.e., at the corner of Johanna Street and Oakley Street, where he took a glass of cider. Then, to use his own words, he said "to the chap who used to work there, 'I fancy two-pennyworth of Irish; I have had nothing for some weeks,' and went to another house, where I had come out of when I saw P.C. Morgan, and I had one two-pennyworth of Irish. I had a job to get it, because I was the last one that left the premises after having this two-pennyworth of Irish—in fact, I was the last one served with that two-pennyworth of Irish." It appears that when he went out the second time, late though it was, his daughter Katie again accompanied him.

We thought it expedient to summon Katie Mullins before us, and, we having requested Mullins to send for her, she came with her mother, and was examined almost immediately after she arrived, so that there had been no opportunity for coaching her as to the story she was to tell in the witness-box. She proved to be a bright, Qs. 18324–18385. intelligent little girl, who gave her answers quickly, without hesitation, and without any kind of confusion after the novelty of being questioned in public had passed off. Her story confirmed that of her father in every material respect. It was the first time she had been taken out by him in this way, and the events of the afternoon had impressed themselves on her mind. Her narrative was evidently a true one, and is quite inconsistent with Mullins having been drunk at the time he came across P.C. Morgan.

Qs. 18515 & 18661 Mrs. Katherine Mullins (Mullins' wife) was positive that he was quite sober. Her evidence, however, is principally of importance upon the question of what took place when Mullins went out and came across the policeman the second time, a matter with which we deal later on.

The police evidence as to the drunkenness of the prisoner in this case, and especially that of Inspector Wheeler is very unsatisfactory; for not only did the Inspector, P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders form a wholly incorrect opinion on Mullins' condition in the charge-room, but in face of the doctor's opinion, which was not questioned by the Inspector at the time his entry was made in the Occurrence Book, the Inspector and the two constables told the Magistrate the next day that Mullins was drunk, and before us positively adhered to their statements, though it is only fair to add that the Inspector also said in the Police Court that the Doctor had certified that he was not drunk then—i.e., when the doctor examined the prisoner. It is, however, in our judgment very unlikely that if Mullins was not drunk when the doctor saw him at midnight he could have been drunk in any fair and reasonable acceptation of the term at 11.30. It is true that the form of the doctor's entry suggests that though Mullins was not drunk when the Doctor saw him he may have been recently drunk, but that does not under the circumstances in our opinion afford any justification for the inaccurate allegation that the prisoner was drunk when the charge was taken; and as the doctor's examination before us proves, the entry was not intended to bear that meaning though it was in fact misleading.

Let us see what the Inspector's own account of his way of dealing with the case is. He was described by Mullins as "a perfect gentleman," and we who saw him in the witness box are not inclined for a moment to quarrel with that description. We are quite satisfied that so far as the actual procedure in regard to taking the charge against Mullins is concerned, as to his treatment of Mullins' complaint that he had been assaulted actually in the station, and as to his treatment of Mullins throughout the affair, the Inspector behaved not only with perfect adherence to the rules laid down, but in a genial and considerate way. That, however, does not prove that he did his duty with that thoroughness and acuteness which may be reasonably expected from a man in his responsible position. He told us that he Qs. 18329, 18330 noticed the prisoner being brought in, and had a good view of him from the doorway. He asked P.C. Morgan what the charge was, and then, to give his own words, he Q. 18762 said: "He told me he was drunk; he found him fighting in Oakley Street and making use of obscene language. He had requested him to go away, which he did for a short time, but returned and commenced to fight, and he took him into custody." Q. 18763 Thereupon the prisoner said, "He has struck me in the mouth since I have been in this room." The Inspector found on the lower lip a slight abrasion inside, not bleeding, and a little swollen on the outside. He then asked P.C. Morgan whether it was true that he had assaulted the prisoner as he alleged, and the constable said "No." The Inspector next asked P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders if they had seen the alleged assault take place, and they both answered "No." He then took the charge. The Inspector Q. 18777 told us that on being charged Mullins said, "I will admit all that, but this man has struck me in the mouth inside this room." This, we gather, was said on the formal reading of the charge after the name, and so forth, had been taken down Qs. 18775, 18776, on the charge-sheet. Mullins did not at that time deny being drunk, but he did so after being placed in the cells; and immediately after the door had been closed upon Qs. 18778, 18779, 18780, 18781, 18782 him asked, "Can I be allowed to see a doctor? I do not think I am drunk," and the Inspector replied, "Yes, the Divisional Surgeon will see you." Thereupon the Divisional Surgeon was sent for at once, and he arrived in about a quarter of an hour.

It will be observed that up to this point the Inspector does not say that before taking the charge he had made any observation whatever of Mullins with a view to seeing whether in fact there was any ground for saying that he was drunk. Taking his own account literally he took the charge as one of drunkenness and disorderly conduct upon, first, the charge of the constable and, secondly, the words, "I will admit all that," &c., which he understood Mullins to make use of; but when he came to be further examined upon the point it came out that he had formed the opinion that Mullins was drunk as a result of his own observation. In cross-examination by Lord Qs. 18911 to 18914
Russell, the Inspector was asked, "Was Mullins, in your opinion, drunk when you saw him?" and he replied "Yes, when I saw him he was." Being asked "How did he show it," he replied, "He smelt very strongly of drink, and he was very unsteady on his feet, which, to my mind, indicated that he was drunk. Those were the only indications." Lord Russell then put to him a question of a more far-reaching character than the Inspector seems to have thought. The learned counsel asked: "And the fact that Q. 18915
Morgan told you he had been drunk and fighting—I suppose that influenced your mind to some extent," and the witness replied "No. I have to be governed by the facts as they are placed before me when the person is brought to the station, irrespective of what Morgan or any other officer has to say." Lord Russell pursued the Q. 18916 matter with the question: "If a man had been held rather tightly by the back of the neck or marched rather uncomfortably to the police station, he might be a little unsteady on his feet when he got there, might he not?" and the Inspector replied, "Not necessarily so." On being pressed further by the question, "You do not think that would upset him at all?" he said "No." What we gather from the Inspector's Q. 18916*
replies is that, in his view, it was his duty to come to a conclusion upon the question of the sobriety or drunkenness of the prisoner without allowing himself to be influenced by the character of the charge or by the statement of the constable, and we think that in holding that view he is right; but, if that be the case, we are afraid that he did not follow what he himself admitted to be the proper course. In the answer which followed that in which he defined his duty he seems to think it quite right to eliminate from the consideration of the question of drunkenness a fact which, from the standpoint of an ordinary layman having to form a conclusion, would be very material indeed. He himself had told us just a moment before he gave these answers that the fact that Mullins was very unsteady on his legs was one of the indications of drink. Take it so, still the possibility that the prisoner's unsteadiness might be due to violence on the part of the constable ought to have occurred, though in fact it did not, to his mind. To that possibility the Inspector, upon his own showing, either paid little or no adequate attention. That he then honestly believed, as he says, that Mullins Q. 19007 was drunk we are not doubting, but what we are questioning is whether, having regard to the fact that the Inspector quite rightly laid down the rule that it was for him to form an independent judgment as to the condition of the prisoner, he did in this case properly apply his mind to the question of drunkenness. The moment Mullins asked that the Divisional Surgeon should be sent for, his request was complied with, and probably if the Inspector, instead of jumping to the conclusion upon data which appear to be and which, as the medical evidence shows, were insufficient, that Mullins was drunk, had permitted himself to think a little more, and to ask Mullins categorically whether he denied the drunkenness, it is certain that Mullins would have said, "Certainly I do," and the Divisional Surgeon might have been sent for at once before the charge was finally taken. In making these Q. 19019 criticisms we are taking the facts to be as stated by the Inspector himself, but it should not be forgotten that Mullins had asked that his own doctor (Dr. Read) should be sent for. Of course it must be said in favour of Inspector Wheeler that he is under the impression that Mullins did not deny the drunkenness, and

Q. 17547 used some words to the effect, "I will admit all that," &c., though the latter denied that he said anything of the kind. Of course if a prisoner who does appear excited and upset, does use words admitting that he has been drinking too much, it would be asking too much that an Inspector should make a very careful inspection of the appearance of the man charged, but, on the other hand, great care should be taken, even when words of admission are used, to find out whether it is the whole charge, or only part of the charge, or one element in the charge, which the prisoner admits. Though we do not think the Inspector acted in bad faith, we cannot help coming to the conclusion that he accepted this charge of drunkenness with undue haste and without adequate consideration of the particular circumstances of the case.

The evidence of the two constables on the question of drunkenness is rather more emphatic than that of the Inspector, and affords an illustration of the danger of coming to a conclusion hastily, and by reference to what may be called general maxims in such a matter.

P.C. Hunt told us that the prisoner was drunk when P.C. Morgan brought him
Q. 19189, &c. in. Asked how he showed it, he answered, "He appeared to be excited and had all the appearance of a man intoxicated." He was unsteady on his feet. He did not observe any thickness of speech. He was not shouting. He did not notice that he was violent. It appeared that he did not have a good look at the prisoner when he came in, but how he came to the conclusion that he had "All the appearance of a man intoxicated" is not made clear. At any rate, upon that P.C. Hunt had come to the conclusion that the prisoner was drunk, but when he was asked when he made up his mind that he was drunk, and he had apparently caught the drift of the cross-examining Counsel's question, he told us that he could not say that he had made up his mind that he was drunk before the Inspector came in to take the charge. Upon
Q. 19205, &c. being asked as to how the prisoner showed excitement, he said, "He would not be quiet, for one thing, while the charge was being taken; he kept moving about, though he did not try to get away." All this made it perfectly plain to P.C. Hunt's mind that Mullins was drunk. Every man is entitled to form his opinion, but all we can say is that if that is the way in which apparently quite efficient and intelligent constables come to a conclusion upon a matter of that kind, the sooner it is brought home to them that human nature is so constituted that a sudden arrest, and being brought into a charge-room and faced by an Inspector, is in most cases calculated to try the nerves, and that under such circumstances many men may show a good deal of excitement, move about a good deal, and be very restless, without being in the slightest degree under the influence of liquor, the better will the interests of justice be served. We emphasise this point here, because there is no doubt whatever, as is shown by the medical evidence, that Mullins was not in the least drunk in any ordinary and fair sense of the term, and that P.C. Hunt was entirely mistaken in the conclusion to which he came. The case affords, therefore, a good illustration of the danger of coming to a conclusion as to the physical condition of a person by reference to rules which may be sound enough in the generality of cases, but which are not rules which ought to be extended to a particular case without an intelligent application of the mind to its special circumstances. Similar observations may be made about the evidence of P.C. Saunders, who came to the same conclusion, and who thought that the prisoner was very excited, but who, when asked more particularly as to the signs by which he came to the conclusion that the prisoner was drunk, said that besides the smelling of the breath, and unsteadiness on his legs, Mullins' eyes had "the appearance of a man who had been drinking,"

The medical evidence in this case establishes the sobriety of Mullins on this occasion beyond doubt, and affords a useful commentary upon the police evidence that we have just been considering. That being the case, it is well to give the medical evidence on the question of drunkenness with a little detail, especially as it seems necessary to make some criticism upon the form of the doctor's entry in the Occurrence Book.

Dr. George Nicol Henry is Divisional Surgeon for the district of the Kennington
Qs. 18684, 18685 Road police station, and, as we know, he was called up a little before midnight on the 10th September. Mullins, as we know from the charge sheet, was brought to the station at 11.30 p.m., and the charge was almost but not quite immediately taken, as the inspector was out of the room for a period which was at least one minute, and, according to Mullins, about five minutes. The doctor was sent for immediately after Mullins was put in the cell, and he came in about a quarter of an hour after being sent for, so that we have only a short interval of time (at most twenty minutes) from the time when Inspector Wheeler and the constable had been looking at Mullins and coming to the conclusion that he was drunk and the examination by Dr. Henry. The doctor examined Mullins, and having done so recorded the result in the Occurrence Book. The entry is as follows :—" At 12 a.m. attended and examined George Mullins who denied being drunk. He had evidently been drinking but was not drunk at the time I examined him." Lord Russell in cross-examination referring to this entry said : " It is a regular phrase ; when a man is not drunk if he smells of drink at all you say he has been drinking, do you not ? " and then the doctor gave an answer which struck us as being very strange indeed having regard to the terms which he had thought fit to use in stating the result of his examination in the book. " I do," said he, " under certain circumstances. In this case I made the entry in the book that he had been drinking, because his breath smelt very strongly of very stale drinking. He had been drinking, I should say, for some time, not quite immediately before. But I say the man was quite sober when I examined him." In the course of his examination before us he told us further that from Mullins' conversation he judged that he had not been drinking excessively on the Sunday and that he must have been sober at 11 p.m.

Qs. 18689, 18690, 18691.

Q. 18697.

This evidence is of great consequence in this case not only because it disposes of the allegation that Mullins was drunk but because it discloses a complete contradiction between the police evidence as to Mullins' condition and the expert testimony of the Divisional Surgeon. Here we have an experienced Inspector and two seemingly capable and honest constables all telling us positively that they came to the conclusion that Mullins was drunk at twenty minutes to 12, and we have the Divisional Surgeon coming and saying that not only was Mullins quite sober but that he was giving a rational account, even as to time and place, of the incidents of the day, and conversing sensibly just twenty minutes after, making it practically impossible that he was drunk at the time alleged by the police.

Q. 18713.

We must pause for a moment to call attention to the form of Dr. Henry's entry in the Occurrence Book. He was examined minutely as to the meaning of the words "he had evidently been drinking," and also as to the purpose for which they were introduced. They seem unnecessary unless they were intended to mean that Mullins had been recently drinking to excess, but such a meaning the doctor expressly disclaimed. We feel bound to say his explanation was not wholly satisfactory and consistent. It seems to us that a Magistrate trying this case, and reading this certificate would come to the conclusion that the doctor meant by the entry that the man was sober at the time he examined him, but that he had been recently drinking to excess, and that he was very probably under the influence of liquor at the time when he was arrested. In other words, that it was a certificate telling rather in favour of the prosecutor's allegation that the disorder was due to the man being under the influence of liquor. We do not suggest that Dr. Henry lent himself intentionally to any attempt to mislead, but we do think that in this case he made the entry without adequately reflecting upon its possible consequences on the mind of the Magistrate.

The Commencement of the Affair.

We must now refer to the evidence bearing on what took place before and at the time of arrest near the " Duke of Sussex " public-house. All the witnesses upon this point are practically agreed as to where the arrest, and the circumstances immediately preceding it, took place. Mullins on the one side, and P.C. Morgan on the other, are agreed that they came across each other twice a little after 11 o'clock in Oakley Street, and that it was during the second meeting that Mullins was arrested.

Mullins' account is given above, and it will be remembered that after he had had tea, and when it was close upon 11 o'clock, he and his daughter went out. He went to a beer-house, where he took some cider, part of which his daughter drank, and he then went to the "Duke of Sussex" public-house. It was close upon 11 o'clock, and, according to the little girl, he was the very last to leave the public-house just before it was closed. He then walked towards home and saw a constable with his back to him (Mullins) talking to two marine store dealers ; he then touched the constable on the shoulder, thinking that he knew him, and said, "What at the ear-hole again." He explained this action and remark by saying that it was simply a matter of a "lark" between him and a policeman whom he knew. He fully admits that he was wrong in touching the constable, who was P.C. Morgan, and whom he did not know, and in making the remark. The constable turned round and punched him in the ribs, and the little girl started crying. The policeman said, "I will give you ear-hole." Mullins then took the little girl home.

P.C. Morgan's account is, in effect, a complete contradiction, and the story which he told us as to what took place when he first came across Mullins was that he saw Mullins with several others having a "heated altercation" which led to blows, Mullins taking part, that he went to disperse the crowd and requested them to go away, that they all went away with the exception of Mullins, that he again advised him to go away, and that he did so.

Now there is a clear cut issue as to which either Mullins or the constable must be telling a falsehood. Fortunately, we have not to decide the matter by reference to their evidence alone, for there is, as to what occurred when they first met, some independent testimony. Mullins' evidence was corroborated on this point by Katie Mullins, and the only discrepancy between her account and her father's account was that, according to her recollection, the constable struck her father not in the ribs but in the eye. That, of course, is a somewhat serious variation ; but still, it is not one that deprives the little girl's evidence of all value, because it appeared to us that she was mixing up her recollection of the appearance of her father's face when he came back from the station with his appearance when he took her home after being at the "Duke of Sussex" public-house. Still, for the present purpose, Katie Mullins' evidence may be treated as that of one so interested as not to be taken as sufficient if it had stood alone. The marine store dealers, to whom Mullins referred, were called before us, as appears above. They were named George and Frederick Sims respectively. The former gave his evidence not perhaps very willingly, but still fairly enough, and in a way that suggested to us that he was honestly stating what his recollection was, and as he had given to Ispector Spencer much the same account as that which he gave to us we see no reason whatever for distrusting him. He told us that he and his uncle had been in the "Duke of Sussex" public-house a few minutes before it closed, and they were both standing outside when they saw P.C. Morgan standing there. They said "Good evening" to him, but the witness could not be sure as to what he answered. Mullins then came back from the "Duke of Sussex" and tapped the constable on the shoulder. The constable had got his back to him. He heard Mullins say "At the ear-hole again" or something of that sort. According to George Sims the constable took no notice of him, and he (George Sims) then said "Good night" and walked away. Mullins went one way and he went the other, but before going away he exchanged greetings with Mullins. He saw no blow struck. He went to the top of the street (the Waterloo Road end) and could not say whether the constable heard what Mullins said or not. He did not notice the constable turn round, and no blow was struck while he was there.

Qs. 19789, &c.

The evidence of Frederick Sims, who in his examination-in-chief said that he confirmed what his nephew said, is unfortunately not of much value, because owing to the fact, perhaps, that he was called late in the day he had taken the opportunity of refreshing himself somewhat too freely, and was hardly in a fit condition to give evidence before us. This is not so important as it would have been, because he had made a written statement to Inspector Spencer, which was practically identical with that of George Sims.

What is significant and important in this evidence is that both these independent witnesses recollect that Mullins came up to the constable, tapped him on the shoulder, and used the phrase "At the ear-hole again." P.C. Morgan positively contradicts the statement that Mullins came up to him in the manner alleged, or used the phrase, and he thus contradicts not only Mullins but the two Sims's as well.

If he is wrong as to that, as we believe he is, then he is wrong as to what took place when he first came across Mullins—a most important point in considering the probabilities of a case like the one with which we are now dealing. We have come to the conclusion that Mullins' statement, to some extent confirmed by his daughter, and also very strongly confirmed by these two independent witnesses, must be accepted, and that P.C. Morgan's account must be rejected as false.

Taking that to be the case, and accepting as substantially true Mullins' account of the beginning of this affair, let us see how the matter stands. There is no reason for refusing to believe the account that Mullins gave. He took his daughter home, he was very angry, he was for a minute or two, or it may be a little longer, in the house when he decided to go out again in order to take the number of the constable. It would have been a good deal wiser on his part if, seeing that he himself had been guilty of a great mistake in tapping the constable on his shoulder, and making a remark which, though it might be one received as simply the revival of some old joke between his friends and himself, was obviously offensive when addressed to an unknown person, he had let things rest and gone to bed. However that may be, there is not the slightest reason for thinking that he went back with any other intention than that of getting the constable's number. There is a good deal of conflict of evidence as to what took place upon his re-arrival in Oakley Street.

P.C. Morgan's story is that "Five minutes later" (i.e., after Mullins had taken his advice and gone away) "he returned running up the road with his hat off, several persons following behind, shouting out 'Where is he'? I again went to him and asked him what was the matter. He said 'What has it got to do with you?'" and so forth, and that then he arrested him. Now seeing that we do not believe P.C. Morgan as to the origin of the disturbance, we see no ground whatever for trusting him as to what subsequently took place, unless his evidence is in some way confirmed. One cannot help in reading his account noticing that he puts into Mullins' mouth the words "Where is he?" and he does not give any explanation as to who the "he" was, and in cross-examination he said he had no idea at all as to whom he wanted. We cannot help thinking that the ascription of that question to Mullins suggests that P.C. Morgan had lurking in the recesses of his memory that Mullins did in fact want somebody, and if he had examined those recesses a little more carefully he would have remembered circumstances that would have led him to think that Mullins was after him himself. As often happens when a lying story is invented, something is inserted in it which has a flavour reminiscent of what actually took place, and that, in our opinion, is the case here. Mullins' account is that he went back to the constable and found him and looked for and asked for his number, and that we believe to be what really took place. Q. 17610 Q. 17914 Q. 15703

Mrs. Mullins, who, though interested, was in our opinion a trustworthy witness, told us that when her husband and Katie came back the second time she sent Katie to bed, and that Mullins told her he had been insulted by a constable and he wanted his number. She said that he went out dressed as he had been dressed before that day, and that he was wearing a hard hat as usual on Sundays instead of a cap as on week days, and she went with him, and when they got near Sims' shop she saw a constable. Q. 18521

Her husband said to the constable, "I want your number." A gentleman in the company of the constable said "Go on, give him one," and with that the constable struck him and arrested him, and took him right along Oakley Street. "I followed behind." She heard the constable say, "I will give you number. I will show you whether you will have any number or not." She also said that though it was an unusual thing there was hardly anybody in Oakley Street, only a few neighbours in the street where she lived, and they were rather surprised to see Mr. Mullins being arrested. She positively denied that her husband used any bad language. Mrs. Mullins described her husband as being "vexed to think that such a liberty was taken with him uncalled for," obviously referring to the blow which he had received when he tendered his explanation or apology for having mistaken P.C. Morgan for his own friend. Qs. 18530, 18531 Q. 18539 Q. 18553

of Mullins running up the road with his hat off pursued by several persons. It seems to us clearly proved, though of course there may be inaccuracy in some details, that the account which Mullins and his wife give of the circumstances immediately attendant upon the arrest is substantially true, and it follows from that that at the time Mullins was being taken to the station he had not been struck in the face, and had no abrasion on his lip. It is alleged by the constable that he (Mullins) fell down at least once on the way in consequence of his violence, but that would hardly account for the appearance of his face when he was in the dock and the charge was being taken.

The result of this examination of the evidence is that we ought to accept Mullins' story up to the time at which he was placed in the dock in the charge room.

The Alleged Assault in the Charge Room.

The result of the preceding consideration of the evidence has led to the conclusion that Mullins' story as to the circumstances of the arrest is substantially true, and prima facie he is entitled to credit as against P.C. Morgan, whose evidence we have concluded is untrustworthy. That Mullins received a blow in the face, which cut his lip more or less, is an ascertained fact, and he tells us that the injury was caused by a blow given to him by P.C. Morgan in the charge
Q 15709 room. He said he "sat down on a form and there were two other policemen in the room at the time." That appears to be the case. "One went through one door and the other one went into the inspector's room," so that, "there was only me and the policeman in charge of me in the room by ourselves. He walked up to me and hit me in the mouth and slit all my lip." Now, of course, if it be true that there was a moment in the charge room when Mullins and the constable who had brought him were together in the room, one would, under all the circumstances, come to the conclusion that Mullins ought to be believed in regard to this matter, as we have believed him in regard to others, especially as it is admitted by all who came in contact with him in the charge room, that the very moment the Inspector came in he complained of being hit by the constable, that is to say, that at the very earliest moment when he could make the allegation he made it. It should also be noticed that there was no apparent reason for his making any charge of the kind against his captor. He had, it is true, according to his description, been brought to the station somewhat roughly, and he had been insulted, though not hurt, by a blow or blows from the constable before he was arrested. That, however, though it might have accounted for exaggeration of what had taken place in Oakley Street, and of the violence which the policeman had used in coming to the station, is not the kind of thing which would induce, in our opinion, a man of Mullins' class to invent a false charge of that kind against another man. Especially is that the case since it is perfectly clear it was what took place in the charge room, and not what had taken place outside, that aroused Mullins' indignation. We think that the cowardly injustice of which he felt himself the victim, so filled his mind when he was in the dock that he did not trouble to deny the charge of drunkenness, and used words which led Inspector Wheeler to believe that he was admitting disorder in the street.

In considering what took place in the charge room we may do so in the light of what we have already found to be true as to the earlier phases of the matter. It began, as we know, by the tapping on the shoulder and the use of an offensive expression by Mullins under the mistake that the constable was one of his friends. P.C. Morgan lost his temper and struck Mullins when he ought to have contented himself with his obviously reasonable explanation. Mullins in his turn angry, instead of going to bed, unwisely went out again to get the number of the constable with whom he had come into collision, and the constable, not perhaps wholly without reason, resented the demand of Mullins, and the manner in which he made it; and the subsequent proceedings on the part of P.C. Morgan we believe to be explained largely by the fact that he allowed his temper to get the upper hand, and that he took advantage of his position as constable to strike Mullins for what he deemed his persistent impertinence. It seems to us that what took place in the charge room is explicable in the same way.

Those are the observations that occur to us upon the case as it stands upon the evidence of Mullins and P.C. Morgan, who, of course, denied that any such assault as alleged was committed in the charge room. But the statement of Mullins that there was a time when they were alone in the room is challenged. P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders were undoubtedly in the room when Mullins was charged in the dock ; but supposing that Mullins is mistaken in saying that P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders left or were not in the room after he had been brought in, and before the Inspector took the charge, it does not follow that P.C. Morgan, especially if our view that he was still in a passion is correct, should not have given Mullins a blow as alleged, though these two other constables were in the room.

Let us see how the evidence stands as to the persons in the charge room during the critical time. Inspector Wheeler was at the time Mullins was brought in "sitting at the desk in the inspector's office," from which he could see about half of the charge room—quite enough of the room to see them come in. He went into the charge room about a minute afterwards. When he got into the charge room there were four men in the room, P.C. Hunt, P.C. Saunders, P.C. Morgan, and the prisoner. It was immediately after the constable had said Mullins was drunk, and so forth, that the prisoner said, "He has struck me in the mouth since I have been in this room." Qs. 18756, &c. Q. 18761 Q. 18763

P.C. Hunt said that he was standing alongside the desk when Mullins was brought in by P.C. Morgan, and he assured us that he did not leave the room at all until the Inspector came in, which was just a moment, and he denied that P.C. Morgan struck Mullins in the charge room. In cross-examination he said he was standing at the desk and writing on it ; he could not remember exactly at which side of the desk, but he was positive that he had not left the room for an instant before the inspector came in. It was suggested that he had a book in his hand, and he admitted that might have been so, because he believed that he was writing in the telegraph book. He thought he was entering a telegram just sent in the telegraph book when Mullins was brought in : the book would show the messages sent and the times of despatch ; but the witness was not quite sure he did not go to the telephone after Mullins came in, but he did so before that. It ought to be mentioned here that the telegraph book was produced and it was proved that between 11.10 p.m. and 11.35 p.m. there was no call to the telephone, and no telegram or telephone message was sent out. Q. 19119 Q. 19123 Q. 19125 Qs. 19151, &c. Q. 19166 Qs. 19152, 19153 Qs. 19311, &c. Qs. 19406 to 19427

P.C. Saunders' evidence confirms that of P.C. Hunt. He said he was on duty in the charge room when Mullins was brought in and saw Inspector Wheeler come into the room, and that he had not left the room in the meantime. He denied that P.C. Morgan struck Mullins. He said he was doing nothing in particular at the moment. He stood between the desk and the dock, and was quite close to P.C. Morgan and the prisoner all the time. Q. 19433

Now, it cannot be denied that that evidence is very strong. We have three witnesses—Inspector Wheeler and the two constables—all saying what seems to be entirely reasonable, namely, that upon the prisoner coming in Inspector Wheeler came out in about a minute to take the charge. That is exactly what he should have done, and one does not see why it should be supposed that any longer interval of time should have taken place between the prisoner being brought in and being placed in the dock and being charged than the time which the Inspector states. It is of course possible that even in so short a time as that P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders may have gone out and come back again and forgotten all about it, but even then, as we understand the plan that was put in, it would have been quite possible for Inspector Wheeler from where he was sitting in the inspector's room to see the prisoner sitting on the form. One is naturally very reluctant to believe that the feeling of comradeship which ought to exist between members of the force can be carried so far as to induce seemingly capable constables like P.C. Hunt and P.C. Saunders not only to pass over such misconduct as is involved by the striking of a helpless prisoner in the charge room but also to give false evidence in order to shield the offender. It does not, however, seem to us that we are driven here to come to the conclusion, if we believe Mullins was struck in the charge room, that these two constables are intentionally speaking falsely, nor, on the other hand, is one forced to come to the conclusion that Mullins is intentionally trying to mislead us when he tells us that first one and then the other of these two constables went out of the room.

Though nothing is said in the notes about the matter, it must be remembered that P.C. Morgan, who, as we think, was in a temper, and Mullins, who was more or less in a temper, or at any rate excited, too, made a good deal of noise in entering the charge room, and arrived with a considerable amount of bustle, and not like two visitors quietly entering a room. Mrs. Mullins described to us the way in which her husband was taken to the station. He and the constable were going pretty fast, and we think it extremely likely that both came bursting into the charge room in a rapid and noisy fashion, and that the blow was struck on the spur of the moment. However that may be, we cannot help feeling that Mullins' immediate complaint that he had been struck in the charge room must have been founded upon fact.

Conclusions.

That practically disposes of the case. We seem to be in a position to reconstitute in a general way what actually did take place between Mullins and P.C. Morgan on this Sunday evening. Mullins being sober went up and tapped a constable whom he did not in fact know on the shoulder and said jocularly, "At the ear-hole again?" (an offensive expression meaning that he was waiting to be bribed). The constable, who at the moment was talking to two marine store dealers in a small way of business, took offence, and the moment the men he had been talking to left, he turned round and gave Mullins a blow, probably on the side, notwithstanding that Mullins apologised and explained his mistake. Mullins being with his little girl went home, and then instead of behaving prudently allowed in his turn anger to get the better of discretion, and feeling himself insulted, went out to get the number of the constable. The constable, under the circumstances perhaps not unnaturally resented it, and he too lost his temper and did what, if he had reflected a little, he would have abstained from doing. He arrested Mullins somewhat roughly —seized him by the collar and took him off to the station—and, as we believe, he was under the influence of a good deal of temper during all this time; and when he got to the charge room and put his prisoner to sit down, he gave him a final blow as a vent to his angry feelings. We are not in this kind of case able to get with certainty at the truth about every action and about every incident or phase of the affair. In this, as in many of the other cases, all sorts of side issues were raised in the controversy before us when we were taking evidence, and though one would like if one could to come to a conclusion as to every issue in dispute yet that seems really impossible. The most that any tribunal can do is to get at the leading facts in the case and find out who on the whole is in the right and who on the whole is in the wrong. In our opinion the general account which we have just given is the true representation of what happened in Oakley Street and at the station on this night; and we are now in a position to see to what extent there was misconduct on the part of all or any of the constables concerned.

As to P.C. Morgan he seems to have been in the wrong throughout. His first wrong step was to some extent excusable in view of Mullins' indiscretion, but there was no extenuation whatever for his subsequent misconduct.

Inspector Wheeler formed a wrong judgment as to the condition of Mullins, and hardly acted up to his own definition of the duty of an inspector taking a charge, but in coming to the conclusion that Mullins was drunk he acted quite honestly, and his conduct was in form courteous and correct. Inspector Wheeler was, we think, quite right in taking the charge of disorderly conduct and making use of obscene language, but not in accepting the charge of drunkenness.

Our conclusions in this case therefore may be thus summed up:—

(1.) P.C. Morgan owing to provocation innocently given by Mullins lost his temper and assaulted him.

(2.) Upon Mullins coming back to P.C. Morgan in Oakley Street and asking for his number the latter wrongfully arrested the former and took him to the police station.

(3.) In making the arrest and taking the prisoner to the station, P.C. Morgan used more force than was necessary.

(4.) P.C. Morgan wrongfully assaulted Mullins in the charge room at the police station by striking him a blow in the face causing him slight injury.

(5.) P.C. Morgan gave false evidence in support of the charge at the Police Court.

(6.) Inspector Wheeler was guilty of an error of judgment in accepting the charge of drunkenness.

XI.—BAKER'S CASE.

In this case, James Baker, ironmonger's assistant, residing at 53, Dartmoor Street, Notting Hill Gate, complained that while he was walking with a friend on Sunday evening, the 30th September, 1906, he was stopped by P.C. Pittuck, 312 F, asked for his name and address, which he refused, adding that he would give it to the proper official at the police station, and was then wrongfully arrested by the constable and wrongfully charged with being drunk and disorderly. He also complained that he asked to see a private medical man, and named one, but that owing to the negligence of the police his doctor did not attend.

The complaint was heard before us on the 22nd November and the 4th December, 1906. Lord Russell appeared for Baker, and the police were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

The case was tried before Mr. Garrett at the West London Police Court on Monday, the 1st October, 1906, when P.C. Pittuck appeared and gave evidence as prosecutor, and Baker was represented by a solicitor. The charge was dismissed by the Magistrate, who said there was not sufficient evidence to show that Baker was drunk and disorderly.

The following is a copy of the charge sheet:—

NOTE.—State below whether the prisoner was taken into custody (a) Without warrant, (b) On warrant in first instance, (c) On warrant after failure to appear to summons.

CHARGE No. 3—WITHOUT WARRANT.

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken at the West London Police Court:—

And the deponent William Pittuck on oath saith as follow:—

Police Constable 312 F. About 11.15 p.m. on 30th September I was on duty in Kensington Place. Defendant was drunk and urinating in the road. There were females about. I told him he ought to know better, and he began to shout and made a great disturbance, and I arrested him.

Cross-examined.

Defendant had a friend with him. I asked him for his name and address, and he refused to give it—if he had there would have been no occasion to arrest him. I took no notice of the friend. I said defendant was drunk.

And the deponent Police Constable Hillier 139 F on oath saith as follows:—

About 12.30 a.m. on 1st October I was at the Station, and defendant wanted to see a private doctor. I went to one who was out and to Mr. Bagram who refused to come and said defendant would have to see the Divisional Surgeon.

Cross-examined.

I said to Mr. Bagram there was a man Baker at the station charged with drunkenness who wanted to see him. I told the doctor we could not be responsible for the fees.

DEFENCE.

And the deponent James Baker on oath saith as follows:—

53, Dartmoor Street, Kensington, Ironmonger's assistant. About 10 p.m. on 30th September I went out for a walk and met a man named Porter and went to the "Windsor Castle" public house. I had two drops of unsweetened gin and Porter had ginger beer. This was the first intoxicating drink I had had that day. I came out and met two friends and spoke to them, and then went with Porter down Kensington Place. I made water against the wall—Porter was by me. I lighted my pipe and the police constable came up and said he wanted my name and address. I said, "What for?" He said, "Never mind what for." I said "I refuse to give it." He said, "Then you'll have to come with me." I said I would and give it at the station, and we walked there. There was not one word said of being drunk. I denied it and refused to have a doctor when at the station. When put in the cell I asked for a doctor. I never shouted or behaved in a disorderly manner in the street. Dr. Bagram knows me very well. The Divisional Surgeon saw me. I was perfectly sober.

And the deponent Samuel Porter on oath saith as follows:—

19, Milson Road, Kensington. I am a teetotaller. I met defendant last night. He was sober, and we went in the "Windsor Castle" public house. I had ginger beer and he had gin. We talked together and came out. Defendant saw two friends and spoke to them and we went on. At Kensington Place defendant made water by the side of the dead wall. The police constable came up and asked for his name and address. Defendant refused, and the P.C. said if he did not he would take him further down. He took defendant to the station, and I followed. Defendant was perfectly sober and made no disturbance. I never heard any suggestion he was drunk.

Dismissed.

The charges of misconduct to be inferred from the evidence given by and on behalf of Baker may be thus stated:—

1. P.C. Pittuck was guilty of an error of judgment or undue zeal in demanding Baker's name and address.
2. P.C. Pittuck wrongfully arrested him on a charge of being drunk and disorderly.

3. P.C. Pittuck falsely preferred a charge of being drunk and disorderly against Baker.

4. Inspector Mason committed an error of judgment in accepting the charge preferred.

5. Inspector Mason did not exercise reasonable care in summoning the doctors mentioned, whose names and addresses were given by Baker.

6. Inspector Mason improperly insisted upon Baker being examined by Dr. Jackson, the Divisional Surgeon, in order that a certificate favourable to the police action might be obtained.

7. P.C. Pittuck did not make a full and complete disclosure of all the relevant facts to the magistrate at the police court.

There is a considerable conflict of evidence in this as in nearly all the cases which we have investigated, though on the whole the issues of fact are not so numerous or complicated as in most of them, and the difficulty of the case lies rather in the judgment one ought to form of the treatment of the matter by the police than in the discovery of the facts themselves.

The Case for Baker.

Shortly stated Baker's story is that at about 10 p.m. on Sunday, the 29th September, 1906, he went out for a walk down High Street, Notting Hill, and turned off by the Campden Hill Road almost into High Street, Kensington. At the top of Holland Park Avenue he met a friend, named Samuel Porter. They turned into a public-house called the "Windsor Castle," at the top of Campden Hill, where Porter had some non-alcoholic drink, and Baker took "twopennyworth of gin," which, according to him was the first intoxicating drink he had had that day. He and Porter, on leaving the "Windsor Castle," met two friends just outside the public-house, and they stopped for a talk at about 11.15. Baker and Porter then turned into Kensington Place, and after proceeding a few yards Baker stopped to make water against the wall, and, having finished, he just moved away, filled his pipe, and was lighting it, when a constable came straight across the road towards him and asked for his (Baker's) name and address. Baker refused to give that information, and on the constable saying he would have to go to the station he acquiesced. He denied shouting out the words "My name and address—my name and address." He said he never spoke any louder than he was then speaking (i.e., in the box); no people collected; and there was not a soul about when the conversation was taking place. When we put some questions to him he told us that he thought Porter was lighting his pipe at the same time. He said that the constable "made straight across the road," Q. 16155 and that he knew a good many constables round there by sight, and he thought it was perhaps someone who knew him. The fact of the crossing the road did not excite his attention as being anything unusual. The constable, to use Baker's own words, "Put Q. 16158. his hand on my shoulder, and said, 'Your name and address, old cock.'" Baker saw Q. 16160 that he did not know him, and said, "What for?" when the constable said "Never mind what for." He admitted that he thought then that it might have been because he had been making water there, and added, "I did not think I had done anything Q. 16162. that he should want my name and address for late at night like that, and no one about, and against a dead wall." Further, he said that he would rather have given Q. 16173. his name and address at the station, and that he told him that. He preferred to walk by the side of the constable to the station and give his name and address there than to give it right off because he told us, "I thought I could state the case to the Inspector. If he took my name and address I do not know what rigmarole he might make up and take to the station. He might say I had had my trousers down, or Q. 16174. something of that kind. You never know what they might say." When he went to the station with the constable he thought the constable was going to mention the fact that he had been making water against the wall and "that he was going to take me in to the Inspector to give my name and address." The constable did not say a Q. 16178. word about drunkenness, and he had no idea that he was going to be charged with Qs. 16179, being drunk. Porter, a milkman, described by Baker as "country lad," was called 16180 before us and corroborated the account which Baker gave as to their movements up Q. 16188. to the time of the constable coming up, and as to what happened then. In his opinion Q. 16276. Baker was quite sober. He went with Baker to the police station and then to Baker's Qs. 16282 to 16286.

home to tell his wife of the arrest. Porter, we think, lived up to his character of "a country lad" in the witness box, but he gave his evidence extremely well, and we see no reason to doubt that he was endeavouring to give us a true account of what took place.

The main facts are not in dispute, but as the constable sought before us to give a very different colour to them by introducing various details as to the conduct of Baker, it is worth noticing how the matter looked to a third party. The impression left upon our minds is that Porter's evidence affords very strong corroboration of Baker's account of what passed. Baker admits that he was taken into custody by the constable but denies that he knew that he was being taken on a charge of being drunk and disorderly, and P.C. Pittuck admits he did not tell the prisoner what the charge was. Porter did not understand that his friend was actually arrested. There is nothing at all in the evidence to show that before Baker was in the charge room he ever imagined that he was about to be charged with being drunk and disorderly.

The only other witness called on Baker's side was Mr. John Walton, the landlord of the house in which Baker resides. He told us that Baker lived in apartments in his house, and that he knew him quite well, and that on the night in question he received a message asking him to go to the police station to bail out Baker. He went, and he got to the station about a quarter to 12. He had to wait some time while they were seeing about a doctor coming. It was five or six minutes before he saw Baker at the station. Baker came into the room (the charge room) with the Inspector. The witness did not notice that Baker was excited but he seemed annoyed at being locked up. "He told me he should like to see his own doctor." He told Baker "he had better come away and not have an altercation with the Inspector, because the constable had already given in the charge," but would not admit that he tried to persuade him to do so. He went outside again and waited for over half an hour, and ultimately Baker came out.

The Police Case.

In answer to the complaint four witnesses were examined before us, namely, P.C. William Pittuck, 312 F, P.C. Hillier, 139 F, P. C. Price, 148 F, and Inspector Mason, who was in charge of the station on that evening when Baker was brought in.

P.C. Pittuck told us he was on duty on the night of Sunday the 30th September, in Campden Hill Road. He first saw Baker just after 11 o'clock turning out of the Windsor Castle. He (the constable) was then standing on the corner of Peel Street in Campden Hill Road. Baker walked along Campden Hill Road towards Kensington Place, turned the corner, went up to the wall and "started to urinate opposite the lamp-post." He had followed Baker a few yards behind "in the ordinary way on his beat," and the place at which he made water was just opposite the lamp-post, where people could see him quite easily. There were two women and two men standing under the lamp-post and three or four passing by the top of the road. He walked across the road and told him he ought to know better as there were people about, and he said, "What harm am I doing?" The constable replied: "Give me your name and address; I shall report you for a summons under the London County Council's bye-law"—referring to the bye-law as to indecency, which we have set out above. He said, "I will give you my name and address; what do you want it for?" He continued to shout "I will give you my name and address; what do you want it for?" He shouted, and people stopped to see what was the matter. The constable then arrested him and took him to the police station, and charged him before Inspector Mason with being drunk and disorderly. It does not seem necessary to go over all the details of his cross-examination by Lord Russell, but it should be mentioned that during its course he for the first time said that Baker was staggering after he came out of the Windsor Castle. This was a somewhat surprising allegation, seeing that though he had told us in his examination-in-chief he had seen Baker come out of the public-house he said nothing about his staggering, but only that he followed him in the ordinary course of his patrol, and it looks very much like a mere after-thought in the witness box. It is true that he said he mentioned the staggering to Inspector Mason, but the latter first categorically denied that he had done so and then said he did not remember his doing so.

See above p. 32.

Q. 20408, &c.

We find further from consideration of P.C. Pittuck's evidence that :—

(1) He admitted Baker was walking quietly, though he alleged he was staggering all over the place. Q. 20176-7

(2) His intention when he went up to Baker was to summon him for committing a nuisance. Q. 20242.

(3) He refused to admit that he arrested Baker for not giving his name and address, but said he did so because he was "shouting."

(4) He said he did not think of arresting him for being drunk till he began "shouting." Q. 20366.

(5) He did not when he arrested Baker tell him he was going to charge him with being drunk and disorderly. Q. 20372.

The effect left on our minds by this evidence is that nothing occurred before he observed Baker making water against the wall which suggested that he ought in any way to interfere with him. He did not even follow him with the intention of observing him in particular, but only in the ordinary discharge of his duty in patrolling the beat. Even when he noticed that Baker had "urinated" (to use his own word), he had not the slightest intention of arresting him. His intention was to ask for his name and address with a view to a summons under the London County Council's bye-laws. We see no reason to doubt that if Baker had given his name and address the constable would not have interfered with him further. We will not at this moment discuss the question whether he acted with discretion in asking Baker for his name and address under all the circumstances, but, assuming that he was right in doing so, the question whether he was justified in effecting the arrest must depend upon the view we take as to whether there was such disorder, and whether Baker was in such a condition as to afford some ground for a charge of being drunk and disorderly. The only evidence on the police side before us as to the way in which Baker behaved during the conversation is that of the constable himself, and his evidence when examined really amounts only to the allegation that Baker was talking in such a loud tone of voice as to attract the attention of passers by.

Proceedings in the Charge Room.

With regard to the proceedings in the charge room, we think they were conducted regularly in point of form.

Inspector Mason, of course, could give us no direct assistance in settling such conflict of evidence as exists between the complainant and the constable as to the alleged disorderly conduct, but his evidence is of importance so far as the question whether Baker was drunk or not is concerned, and as to the circumstances connected with the examination of the complainant by the Divisional Surgeon. The Inspector had not quite finished with the preceding charge when Baker was brought in by P.C. Pittuck. The constable charged Baker with being drunk and disorderly in Kensington Place, and after conversation with him and the prisoner the Inspector came to the conclusion that the latter was drunk, and that there was sufficient evidence of disorderly conduct to take a charge under the Licensing Act 1872, s. 12. As to the drunkenness, he formed his opinion partly from what the constable said, and partly from personal observation of the speech, manner, and appearance of Baker, who, however, denied being drunk. According to the Inspector, he added : "I do not want to see any doctor." Baker denied having used these words, and we think the Inspector's recollection was faulty on the point. The use of such an expression is inconsistent with the proved attitude of Baker throughout the affair. Q. 20632, &c.

We have considered the evidence of the Inspector, and think he accepted the charge of drunkenness without applying his mind to the charge with a reasonable degree of acuteness, and too hastily formed the opinion that Baker was drunk. He did not attach sufficient importance to what the prisoner said as to the circumstances. That we may not be thought to be doing injustice to the Inspector let us call attention to the fact that Baker asked him, "Are you going to take a charge like that?" and his answer was, "The constable charges you with being drunk and Q. 15945.

Q. 15946. Q. 15947. Q. 20859. Q. 29860. disorderly." Baker then said, "He brought me here with the intention of my giving my name and address." The Inspector said again, "Well, he charges you with being drunk and disorderly." The Chairman asked the Inspector, "Did it not occur to you that perhaps Baker might be resenting, and justly resenting, being asked his name and address," and he said "No, it did not occur to me." He maintained that the constable had quite a right to ask the prisoner under the circumstances his name and address, but the Inspector must have become alive to the fact, if he had applied his mind to the case that the shouting which constituted in his opinion the disorder may have been caused, not because the man was drunk, but because the constable had, in his opinion, wrongly and offensively, asked for his name and address. Though it is clear that it is no part of an Inspector's duty to try a case, still he ought not to content himself with a simple parrot-like recitation by the police-constable of a form of words which constitute an offence. He ought to make some inquiry into the circumstances which gave rise to the intervention of the police, and he ought to satisfy himself that there was really disorder likely to cause appreciable annoyance to third parties. That is especially the case when the alleged disorder is also mixed up with the charge of drunkenness. The Inspector ought not to allow himself to be drawn into a vicious circle of arguing that the man was drunk because he was disorderly, and disorderly because he was drunk. We think that if the Inspector had been more upon his guard, and had taken more pains to get to the bottom of the case, he would not have come to so positive an opinion as to the condition of the prisoner. The physical symptoms of staggering or of not being quite steady on his legs, and of thickness of speech, are by no means so conclusive as the Inspector seems to think. It seems difficult to believe that the Inspector can be speaking falsely upon the matter, but we entirely distrust his inferences in regard to this particular case. We saw Baker, and we noticed that he is not a particularly strong and healthy man, and we think that when he got into the charge room, impressed, as he was, with the notion that he was only taken there to give his name and address, and not in the least suspecting he was going to be charged with drunkenness, he was greatly surprised, and probably showed signs of agitation when he realised that he was placed in a serious and disagreeable position. Of course we know a good deal about the case that the Inspector in the charge room at that time did not know, and it is only fair, in considering the Inspector's inferences from Baker's conduct, to take note of that fact. That Baker was taken by surprise at being put into the cell is perfectly clear, but this seems to have had no effect whatever upon the Inspector's mind, nor did it occur to him that Baker's undoubtedly strong desire to have his own doctor was a point distinctly in the prisoner's favour. Here we may say that as to the Inspector's statement that he asked the prisoner before he was put into the cell at all, "Would you like to see a doctor?" and that Baker replied, "I am not drunk; I do not want to see any doctor," we are entirely sceptical as to the accuracy of his recollection. We are willing to believe that when he made the statement he honestly thought that he was right, but nothing of the kind is admitted by Baker, whose conduct throughout is entirely inconsistent with any such repudiation. On the other hand the insistence of Baker upon his own doctor and the suspicion which he entertained of the Divisional Surgeon are very noticeable features in the case.

Qs. 20637, 20638.

Neither of the doctors sent for by Baker came to the station, but the divisional-surgeon, Dr. Jackson, who had been summoned by the Inspector, arrived at about a quarter to one. In consequence of illness he did not appear before us, but there is little controversy as to what passed between him and Baker. The facts as stated by the Inspector himself are these. Baker did not approve or disapprove of being examined when he found himself face to face with Dr. Jackson. He undoubtedly wrote his name upon a piece of paper which has not been preserved; and the Inspector does not say, nor has Dr. Jackson been called to say, that the writing was the writing of a drunken man. All that Dr. Jackson did was to feel his pulse and, as the Inspector thinks, look at his tongue. That is all the Inspector tells us about the examination, and the result of such examination was that Dr. Jackson thought fit to write in the Occurrence Book the words "Recovering from drink." According to the Inspector's own showing the doctor did not put Baker through the usual examination made by Divisional Surgeons, but contented himself with such a perfunctory inspection that though we assume from his position he is a man of capacity and experience in his profession, his opinion that Baker was "recovering from drink" has no value for our purpose.

Q. 20,670, &c.

So much on the question of drunkenness. It remains to consider whether there was evidence which justified the Inspector in thinking that Baker had been guilty of disorderly conduct. Inspector Mason must have known from P.C. Pittuck's statement that the occasion of his intervention was the fact that he saw a man making water against the wall, and that he crossed the road not with the intention of taking him into custody because he was drunk and disorderly but in the execution of what he deemed to be his duty in carrying out the County Council legislation. That ought to have put him upon inquiry as to all the facts. It never seems to have occurred to him that Baker might justly resent any police action on the ground that he had not committed an offence against the bye-law when properly construed and properly applied, and that P.C. Pittuck might have been over zealous. He looked at Baker, satisfied himself by hasty inspection that he was drunk, and then asked what was the disorder, and the only disorder mentioned by the constable was, "He commenced shouting 'My name and address? Oh yes, I will give you my name and address. What do you want it for?' This he repeated several times." The Inspector accepted that as sufficient prima facie evidence of disorder. No one can have known better than the Inspector that this word "shouting" is of highly ambiguous import when coming out of the mouth of a constable. Inspectors should clearly be on their guard against the use of general expressions on the part of constables, and where a word like "shouting" is used they should endeavour before accepting a charge to ascertain whether the so-called shouting was simply the somewhat loud angry retort of a man who thought that he was being unjustly treated as opposed to the riotous cries of real disturbers of the peace. Nor, having regard to the circumstances of P.C. Pittuck's intervention in the matter, did the Inspector give adequate weight to the concluding words of the constable's statement—"As he would not be quiet and give me his name and address I took him into custody." To those words the Inspector appears to have attached no significance. They are important, because they give the constable's real reason in his own words before taking the man into custody, and his refusal to give his name and address was obviously no justification at all for apprehension. If these considerations had been present to the Inspector's mind, as they ought to have been, and if he had reflected more than he did, we think he might have come to the conclusion that there was no such disorder as justified putting Baker on his trial. When we suggested to him that the case was rather a weak one, as far as the disorder was concerned, he replied, "I do not think there was any weakness in it; I was satisfied of the disorder. Shouting out and waking up people at night was sufficient disorder." Q. 20954 But when the Inspector gave us that answer he must have forgotten that he did not ask the constable whether the shouting was so loud that people in houses adjoining Kensington Place were likely to be aroused by what was going on, and he had no right at all to assume that the shouting was so loud as his reply indicated. Making every allowance for the fact that it is not the business of an Inspector to try a case, we think that Inspector Mason here acted somewhat hastily, and that he would have exercised his discretion more wisely if he had examined into the circumstances a little more closely.

Conclusion.

Looking at all the evidence together we have come to the conclusion that the story told by Baker and by Porter is substantially true, and where there is a conflict between them and P.C. Pittuck we accept their version in opposition to his. Our general view of the case is this: Baker was sober. He is a respectable ironmonger's assistant, and he is obviously a man not addicted to drink. His friend Porter, who was with him, is a total abstainer. There is not a tittle of evidence that Baker had been drinking unduly on this Sunday. He was sober when he went out for an evening walk, and when he went into the Windsor Castle public-house. When he and Porter had finished their drinks he met two friends outside, had a talk with them, walked down Campden Hill Road till he came to Kensington Place, and then turned down that turning which was the nearest way to his home. It was close on 11 o'clock at night. It was not alleged that there was any crowd of people close by, and we do not believe P.C. Pittuck when he says that there were four people (two men and two women) standing under the lamp-post. Baker made water against a dead wall. There is no suggestion of any exposure of the person. P.C. Pittuck, who was acquainted with the new bye-law of the London County Council, went up in a somewhat familiar way to Baker and asked for his name and address. Baker suspected that it was because he had made water against the wall, and, though he did not refuse, instead of giving them at once, he had an altercation with the constable. Baker, it is clear, had a good deal of suspicion about the police (witness his fear of Dr. Jackson, the Divisional Surgeon), and for the reason he alleged he thought it better to go to the station to give his name and address to the Inspector in order that the charge that was about to be made against him might be made accurately. His notion was that if he did not do that the constable would invent some much more serious case of indecency. He admitted that the constable formally arrested him by taking his arm. When he got to the station he was surprised to learn that the charge against him was not of making water against the wall but of being drunk and disorderly. That he should be discomposed at the realisation of the fact that a serious charge was being made against him which involved publicity and if successful the possible loss of his situation, seems to us extremely probable; and it is not surprising that he became agitated and very likely lost control to some extent of his limbs. His conduct in the charge room and subsequently, until he finally left the station, seems entirely consistent with sobriety. He insisted upon an examination by a private doctor; according to his view he positively refused to be examined by the Divisional Surgeon; and though it does seem that a partial examination was made by the doctor, and though Baker deemed it prudent to write his name when asked to do so he repudiated at once the validity of any conclusion to which the doctor might come. For some reason he was throughout actuated by great distrust of the police, and his whole conduct must be looked at in the light of that fact. It explains his refusal to be bailed out until one of the doctors he had sent for had had ample opportunity to come.

Looking at the whole matter broadly we have come to the conclusion that the charge made by P.C. Pittuck was one that ought not to have been preferred.

Alleged Negligence in Summoning Doctors.

We have considered the evidence as to Baker's complaint that reasonable care was not taken by Inspector Mason and his subordinate, P.C. Hillier, in delivering Baker's messages to the two medical gentlemen whose names he gave. We think both messages were properly delivered, with reasonable care and expedition.

The Examination by Dr. Jackson.

It was impliedly suggested in Baker's evidence that Dr. Jackson had rather forced himself upon the complainant. Now the Inspector was present when Dr. Jackson and Baker were in the charge room together, and it is clear that his duty was to see that Baker was treated properly. He himself told us that if the doctor insisted upon examining the complainant without his consent he would be guilty of an assault. The Inspector also told us that, in regard to what passed between Baker and the doctor Baker neither approved nor disapproved of it. That Baker wrote his name upon a piece of paper when asked to do so is clear, but, as we understand his account, when the doctor took him by the wrist he pulled his arm away. However we think that Dr. Jackson did not really commit an assault even technically upon Baker, and that probably the Inspector's phrase "Baker neither approved nor disapproved" about hits the mark. We do not think that Baker has made out his proposition that the Inspector insisted on his submitting to an examination against his will. We have only to add that we do not understand upon the evidence why Dr. Jackson inserted an entry in the Occurrence Book which suggests that he had made the complete examination of the prisoner, usual in such cases, though in fact such an examination had not been made in consequence of Baker's distrust and reluctance.

P.C. Pittuck's Police Court Evidence.

A reference to the Notes of Evidence shows that P.C. Pittuck said "I was on duty in Kensington Place. Defendant was drunk and urinating in the road." Even according to the evidence as given before us by P.C. Pittuck himself that is an entirely misleading statement of the case. The picture that it would call up before the mind of any person reading the sentence is that of a man reeling about the middle of the road and making water there. It may, of course, be said, and said truly, that the effect of P.C. Pittuck's evidence is that Baker was drunk when he was in Kensington Place, and that he did make water in Kensington Place. The words are so general that they cover the particular facts of this case; but in giving evidence before the Magistrate it was P.C. Pittuck's duty as an honest prosecutor to state his case, not in the strongest and most general language that he could employ against the prisoner, but in a perfectly fair manner, telling the specific facts upon which he relied for his opinion, that the man was drunk, and that he was disorderly. Fortunately for Baker the Magistrate was not misled, but that was certainly not due to any display of care or fairness on the part of P.C. Pittuck.

Our findings are :—

1. P.C. Pittuck was guilty of an error of judgment in demanding Baker's name and address.
2. P.C. Pittuck wrongfully arrested Baker.
3. P.C. Pittuck falsely preferred a charge of being drunk and disorderly against Baker.
4. Inspector Mason committed an error of judgment in accepting the charge preferred.
5. Inspector Mason did exercise reasonable care when summoning the doctors whose names and addresses were given to him by Baker.
6. Inspector Mason did not improperly insist on Baker being examined by Dr. Jackson.
7. P.C. Pittuck did not make a full and complete disclosure of all the relevant facts to the Magistrate at the police court.

XII.—CASE OF ARTHUR TRESADERN, COMMONLY CALLED HARDING.

Q. 21032, &c. Arthur Tresadern, of 10, Gibraltar Buildings, Bethnal Green Road, who described himself as a cabinet maker, complained that P.C. Cann, 47 HR, wrongfully charged him with having on the 12th September, 1906, at Sclater Street unlawfully assaulted and beaten him then and there in the execution of his duty as such constable. The real surname of the complainant was Tresadern, but it appeared that he was commonly known at the Board School at which he formerly attended as Harding, and has been known and called by that name ever since.

The charge of assault referred to arose out of an incident which occurred while P.C. Cann and other constables were taking one Callaghan to the Commercial Street Police Station on the evening of the 12th September, 1906. There is no doubt that P.C. Cann, while assisting in taking Callaghan to the station, was struck by some one on the left ear, and so much injured that he had to be placed on the sick list. The principal question in dispute in the case is whether or not it was the complainant, Harding, who struck the blow while the constables were surrounded by a disorderly crowd.

The complainant in a note appended to the statement which was sent in to the Secretary of the Commission on his behalf referred to the matter as "A case of disorder in the streets which throws some light on the gradual process of manufacture of criminals under the present police system in the Metropolis." We are clearly not charged with an inquiry so broad as that suggested in this note, and we do not affect to inquire into the causes which give rise to crime in general or which account for the commission of crime by any particular persons. From the questions put by Lord Russell, who appeared on behalf of Harding in this case, we infer that it was apparently intended to suggest to us that the police system, and its administration in the H Division in particular, tended to manufacture criminals, and further to suggest that Harding has been the victim of what may be described as police persecution.

Harding himself commenced his evidence before us by saying that he had been arrested on the 18th September, 1906, and taken to the police station for identification in connection with some robberies that had been committed in Bethnal Green, and
Q. 21053 that the several prosecutors failed to identify him in the presence of Inspector Wensley, and suggested that Inspector Wensley had said: "If we do not have you for this we shall have you for something else," and that thereupon this charge of being the person who had struck P.C. Cann on the 12th September was trumped up against him in pursuance of the police policy of continually harassing men who are known to them as having been once or more times convicted.

The view taken by the police authorities of Harding is contained in a report which Inspector Wright made in consequence of his (Harding's) allegation at the Police Court of police persecution. It is as follows:—

"It is quite true that Harding has been brought to the station on suspicion of having committed larcenies, but the losers have generally failed to indentify him owing to his plan of action after committing an offence of immediately going home and changing his clothing, although at the same time the police have been in possession of reliable information connecting him with some of the cases. In the particular case he mentions, the facts are as follows:—On the 30th November, 1905, P.C. 413 Putt saw Harding at Chilton Street carrying a bag on his back, and knowing him to be a thief asked him what the sack contained when he threw it down, and said 'F——g well look.' Upon inspection the P.C. found the sack contained a quantity of onions which he declined to give any further account of. He was thereupon brought to station when the case was investigated by P.C. 1 Willmott, and on inquiries being made it was found that the onions had been purchased at Spitalfields' Market by Harding's mother, when he was allowed to go. Harding's statement of being in work is not corroborated, and I very much doubt whether he can give a single instance of following any honest employment. He is well known to the whole of the C.I.D. officers at this station, also a large number of the uniform men as a most slippery and dangerous criminal. He is the leader of a numerous band of thieves, by whom he is feared on account of his various acts of violence. When he is brought before a Magistrate he invariably sets up an alibi, which in conjunction with a plausible tongue has resulted in him being discharged on several occasions. Harding, alias Tresadern, commenced his course of crime at the age of 13, and I respectfully submit herewith a list of charges and convictions recorded at this station ;—

10th April, 1901. Suspected person. Discharged.

4th March, 1902. Larceny simple. 12 months' Hard Labour.

10th March, 1903, Larceny person. Discharged.

21st April, 1903. Larceny person. 20 months' Hard Labour.

17th January, 1905. Larceny van. Discharged.

28th May, 1905. Larceny person. Discharged.

6th April, 1906. Shooting with intent. Acquitted.

13th April, 1906. Robbery. Discharged.

24th July, 1906. Assault. £5 or 1 month."

We should not have deemed it necessary to inquire into the matter with a view of determining the question how far police action may have tended to confirm Harding in his wrong course of life, or whether our existing system of criminal law and prison discipline is the best way of dealing with youthful offenders, but, as it was suggested that the case did throw considerable light on the manner in which the police deal with cases of disorder in the streets, we determined to take evidence on the matter, especially as reference had been made in the case of Emms and Norrey to this person (Harding) as the leader of what is known as "Harding's gang," and as having taken very considerable interest in the defence of Emms and Norrey. The summons against Harding was issued upon the information of P.C. Cann on the 18th September, and, being duly served, was heard on the 26th September at the Old Street Police Court before Mr. Cluer.

The following is a copy of the charge sheet against Callaghan and Williams :—

J. MONK, Chief Inspector, for Superintendent.

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken at the Old Street Police Court on Wednesday, 26th September, 1906, before A. R. Cluer, Esq. :—

In the case of Michael Cann, P.C. 47 HR and Arthur Harding.

Michael Cann, P.C. 47 HR, on oath, saith as follows :—

I was conveying a prisoner through Sclater Street on the night of 12th September, when the defendant came and deliberately hit me on the left ear with his fist. A hostile crowd prevented me from arresting him. There was a mark on my ear. I was on the sick list six days on account of this and other injuries. It was about midnight. I have known the defendant for years.

Cross-examined : This was about thirty yards from the "White Hart." You said, "You f——g well don't want to take him." I handed my prisoner to P.C. 217. I was fagged out. There were five or six officers there at the finish. There was a big crowd. On the Saturday a soldier was being got away by me and you did take him away. Tresadern is your right name, but I know you better as Harding. You were not in the station when I summoned you.

John Filbee, P.C. 164, H Division, on oath, saith as follows :—

About midnight on the 12th September I was helping to arrest a prisoner with P.C. 47 and others. The crowd tried to rescue him. Defendant tried to get the man away, but failed. He left go of the prisoner and hit P.C. 47 on the left ear with his fist, saying, "You don't f——g well take him." He then ran away.

Cross-examined : You came out of the public house. This took place just round the corner from Cygnet Street. You hit him with your left hand. I noticed you particularly because I knew you. I have known you about twelve months.

By the Magistrate : P.C. 47 HR had the prisoner in custody and defendant tried to rescue him. At the time of the assault he handed his prisoner over. The defendant tried to part P.C. 47 and his prisoner. He got in between them.

Edwin Ashford, P.C. 207 H, on oath, saith as follows :—

About 12 midnight on the 12th I was in bed at No. 52, Huntingdon Buildings. I heard a police whistle. I got up and ran towards Sclater Street, where I saw P.C.'s 47 and 164 on the ground with the prisoner Callaghan. I released P.C. 47 and took Callaghan's arm. Defendant came up and hit P.C. 47 on left ear and then ran away. He said : "You are not f——g well going to take him."

Cross-examined : It was near Cygnet Street. You hit P.C. 47 as he had hold of his prisoner. Then he handed him over to me. I did not see you try to rescue the prisoner.

John Filbee, P.C. 164 H (recalled) : There were two other officers there afterwards after the assault.

Edwin Ashford, P.C. 207 H (recalled) : I took hold of Callaghan's arm and released P.C. 47.

Cross-examined : You had on a collar and a tie and a cap.

For Defence.

Arthur Tresadern (defendant), on oath, saith as follows :—

I am a cabinet maker and live at No. 10, Gibraltar Building. From about 9.30 to 12 on this night I was in the "King's Arms" in Sclater Street. I heard a row outside. I went out and saw five or six constables taking a man who was struggling. There were 200 or 300 people round. Things were being aimed about and people were shouting out. I shouted, "Don't kill the man." An officer (not here) shouted,

"All right, Harding, we'll have you for this." Other officers were arriving, so I went into the public house and finished my game of darts. I did not strike or attempt to strike any of the officers. I shouted because they ill-treated him. I know P.C. 47 HR by sight. I did not see him on the ground with Callaghan. I saw P.C.'s 47 and 164 there.

Cross-examined: I did not know it was Callaghan at the time. I have been arrested fifteen or sixteen times. (Defendant says this voluntarily.) I have often been released again.

By Magistrate: On the next Saturday I saw P.C. 47 HR in Gibraltar Walk. A man wanted to fight a soldier. P.C. 47 interfered and the man wanted to fight him. I took the man away.

John Miller, on oath, saith as follows:—

I am a dealer, and live at No. 27, Gibraltar Gardens. I was in the "King's Arms" playing darts with defendant. When we heard hollering we went to the door and stood there. Defendant said "Don't murder the man." He never moved away from the door of the public house. I did not know who was being arrested. I knew Callaghan by sight only. They were eight or nine yards away from the "King's Arms." I saw no police badly treated at all. I had been in the "King's Arms" from about 9.30. Defendant had been with me one and a-half hours I daresay.

William Andrews, on oath saith as follows:—

I am a glass beveller, and live at 11, Walkley Street, Old Ford. I was in the "King's Arms" playing darts. I heard a noise outside. I went to the door. Defendant came to the door and never left my side. He said to the constable, "Don't kill the man." The officer said: "All right, Harding, we'll have you for that." They were ten or twelve yards away. The street was crowded. There were seven or eight police officers there. We were not out there five minutes. Defendant did not push into the crowd at all.

Frederick Smith, on oath, saith as follows:—

I am manager of the "King's Arms." On the 12th September defendant and four others were playing darts. I went to the door to see the row. Defendant and two others stood there. Defendant stood by me. Then he came back into the house. He called out, "Don't hurt the man," or something. Some man called back, "I'll have my own back." Defendant came back and finished his game.

Discharged.

Mr. Cluer dismissed the charge, saying that there could be no doubt P.C. Cann was assaulted but the defendant Harding's witnesses, and particularly the manager of the tavern, proved conclusively that he never went to the crowd or the constable. The defendant then said, "May I ask what protection I have against the police?" And Mr. Cluer replied, "Your best protection is a magistrate at this Court."

We heard the case on the 4th, 5th and 6th December, 1906. Lord Russell appeared for Harding, and Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir appeared for the police concerned.

We examined the following witnesses:—

Frederick Smith, William Andrews, and John Miller, in addition to Harding himself, in support of his complaint; and in defence of the police, William Williams, William Southey, Henry James Gellender, Frank Rayner, Inspector Wensley, Inspector Wright, P.C. Cann, 47 HR, P.C. Filbee, 164 H, P.C. Ashford, 207 H, and P.C. Deller, 173 H.

Observations.

The main issue, as will be gathered from what has been stated above in this case, is whether it was Harding who struck P.C. Cann in Sclater Street whilst he with other constables was conveying Callaghan to the police station. This constable, at half-past 11 p.m. on Wednesday the 12th September, 1906, was on duty in Bacon Street, and under circumstances which are given more in detail below he arrested two men, Williams and Callaghan, for disorderly behaviour; Williams was taken by a constable to the police station by one route, and Callaghan, who was violent, was taken by P.C. Cann and others from Bacon Street into Brick Lane and then into Sclater Street, and when the prisoner had been taken just past the "King's Arms" public house P.C. Cann was undoubtedly struck on the left ear with great force. Harding's case is that while the prisoner Callaghan was being taken to Sclater Street, he was at the door of the "King's Arms" public house in Sclater Street, and did not move therefrom, and that, therefore, the blow was struck by some one else.

The police case is that in Sclater Street they were surrounded by a very large, hostile and disorderly crowd with which they coped with difficulty, and that a short distance from the "King's Arms" Harding, who had left the public house and rushed into the crowd, struck the constable the blow which caused his injuries.

General Evidence.

In addition, however, to the evidence of the constables and of the two Inspectors' evidence of a general kind as to the character of the locality and of Harding himself was tendered by Mr. Eldon Bankes on behalf of the Police, and received by us. If we had had to determine the issue raised with a view to the punishment of Harding himself, we should have rejected that evidence as being not relevant to the particular assault into which we are inquiring, but, having regard to the fact that we are inquiring into the manner in which the Police deal with certain street offences, and to the fact that we are only investigating Harding's complaint in order to enable us to report upon the general question, we thought it right to receive the evidence of some of the residents in this Police district who, at the instance of the Police, had attended before us. We accordingly took the evidence of three of the suggested witnesses.

It is unnecessary to give this evidence at length. That of Mr. William Southey, who carries on the business of a hosier at 123, Brick Lane, may be taken as a fair example of this class of evidence. He said he had been connected with the business for twenty-five years, and during that time had never known him do any work. He himself had seen Harding rob many people and vans as well, and on one occasion he had seen him and Andrews (who gave evidence before us, as appears above) steal a box of tea off a van and take it up a court with a man whose nickname was "Dido." He called the attention of the Police to the fact, and the Police went and fetched the tea away and took it to the Police Station. He remembered that one Saturday night he had a stall outside his shop at 190, Brick Lane (he carried on business there as well as at 123 in the same street), and Harding, "Dido" and someone else, whom he did not recognise, came to the stall and tried to steal a watch from a man. He called the attention of the crowd at the stall to the fact that they must look after their watches and purses. Harding and the others went away, and in a little while they came back and tried to set light to some paper under the stall. On another Saturday night he said they (and among them Harding) assaulted a man outside his shop and attempted to rob him. The victim was a Jew, and a boy connected with "Harding's gang" (as he called them), who is a Jew, stopped them when he saw they were maltreating another Jew, and he (the Jew man) was then thrown through his (the witness's) window, smashing the window to pieces. He told us the gang is known as "Harding's gang." Qs. 23074, 23075

In cross-examination he further said that the gang interfered with the tradesmen of Brick Lane to a terrible extent. Sometimes they stand outside his shop thirty strong. He said that he went in bodily fear of them, because they are a dangerous gang. They have never done him any actual harm, but they have threatened him. He said they have stood outside his shop and kept people from coming into it; and Q. 23077 Q. 23080, 23081 Q. 23083

Q. 23084 he referred again to the occasion on which they threw a man through his window.
Qs. 23097, 23098, 23099 He was pressed as to why, having seen Harding take watches, he had not reported the matter to the Police, and he replied, "Is it my business to report these things to the Police? A business man cannot be away from his business always." He said
Q. 23109 he did report about the tea to a policeman, and he also said that he had been to the
Q. 23111 Police score of times about Harding and his gang to ask the Police to protect him
Q. 23115 against the gang. Harding was the captain of the gang. On Lord Russell saying, "And the Police do not help you," he replied, "The Police do help me, but the Magistrates do not. A man like Harding ought not to be at large. He is a danger to respectable people. That is what I have got to say, and I say it in front of Harding. If the Police take Harding to the station, and there is a charge brought against Harding, and it is taken before the Magistrate, he does not get convicted;
Q. 23117 but that is not my business. I say Harding is a most dangerous character, and the
Q. 23118 gang he mixes with is as dangerous as he is. I have known Harding ever since he was a little boy. While Harding was doing twenty months we had no trouble." He admitted that Harding had bought things at his shop, and said, "The door is open for
Q. 23123 anyone to come in and spend money." In answer to the Chairman he repeated his views of Harding and his associates in the following words: "There is a gang of lads and young men that hang about the corners in Brick Lane, and my corner unfortunately is a very convenient corner for these young men because they can see four ways. They are like a regiment of soldiers; they throw out scouts in every direction, and they use dumb motions; they do not talk to each other, but they use dumb motions. If they were going to rob a man and they saw it was convenient to take his watch they would use their fingers, their head, and movements of their body. Harding is the captain of that gang, and has been for many many years. And
Q. 23124 not only that, but the big boys get goods off a van, they put them in convenient places, and then they get small boys that have not left school to go with a barrow and take the parcels or the boxes that they have stolen away, and they are taken in different directions, mostly down Cygnet Street or down Hare Street, or the first
Q. 23125 turning on the left—I forget the name of the street for the moment." He added that the maintenance of order in that part of London is very difficult, and it is very difficult for tradesmen to carry on business as they should. "Brick Lane, of course, has got a very bad name, but it is men of Harding's class that give the neighbourhood a bad name. A respectable man is in danger in walking through the street." The Police have a very difficult task. Asked what judgment he had formed of the general conduct of the Police in the maintenance of order in the streets in his neighbourhood,
Q. 23127 he replied that he had nothing whatever to say against the Police. "They do all they can do, but when the Police come they have their buttons and their uniform on, and they come down the street, and when these men see them coming they go away, and as soon as they are gone they come back again." Further asked whether he had
Q. 23121 observed an instance of a Police-constable treating a man more roughly than he ought to do, he said: "Many years ago I have, but for fifteen years I have not. The Police are conducted differently, to my way of thinking, now to what they were twenty years ago."

We received further evidence to the same effect from Mr. W. Gellender and Mr. F. Rayner. After Mr. Rayner had been examined, Mr. Eldon Bankes informed us that there were several more gentlemen from the neighbourhood there, and they asked him to say that they had come before us voluntarily.

The Issue.

Such being the evidence given in support of and against Harding's complaint against P.C. Cann, the first and most important question raised is the question of fact whether the blow which the constable received at a short distance from the "King's Arms" in Sclater Street was given or not by Harding. In deciding that question we have practically no assistance from any documentary evidence. The story told by Harding, supported by the testimony of his three witnesses, is in direct conflict with that of P.C. Cann, and the officers and constables called to confirm his version. But for the fact that so experienced and painstaking a Magistrate as Mr. Cluer had dismissed the summons against Harding we think that we should have felt no difficulty about the matter at all, and contented ourselves with saying that having observed the witnesses in the box, and considered their evidence, we had come to the conclusion that Harding and his witnesses could not be trusted.

Having regard to the circumstances under which the matter comes before us, it seems to be better to state briefly how the case presents itself to our minds, and the reasons which induce us to believe that P.C. Cann is right in his allegation that it was Harding who, in the crowd in Sclater Street, struck him on the ear. Let us observe that the issue is presented to us in a different form from that which it assumed at the Police Court. There, Harding was a defendant in a criminal court, and the Magistrate was bound by the properly strict rules of law applicable to the proof of the charge against him, and it was the Magistrate's duty to give him the benefit of any reasonable doubt. As we have explained above, we do not feel bound to limit the material for forming our judgment within the range to which Mr. Cluer was necessarily confined. In forming an opinion on this question of fact different from his, it will be understood that it cannot be fairly suggested that the opinions we form in the slightest degree reflect upon the administration of justice in his Court by this Magistrate.

We have stated above our reasons for receiving the evidence given by the inhabitants who spoke about the general condition of things in their locality, and as to the difficulties under which the police labour in the discharge of their duties. We may say, however, that our judgment in the matter would have been quite the same if this evidence had not been taken.

Dealing then with the case upon the basis that we are taking into account only the evidence relevant to this particular case, how does the matter present itself? The case stands thus: Harding, who admits that he had been convicted several times, and acquitted several times, for various crimes, called three persons, as to whose character we have no information, to say that he was standing on the step of the "King's Arms" at the moment when the blow received by P.C. Cann was delivered. On the other hand, we have the testimony of P.C. Cann and other constables that it was this man Harding who rushed into the crowd, struck the constable, and then disappeared. There is no impossibility in either version. The fact that Harding was a criminal probably smarting under the punishment which he had several times received in consequence of the action of the police, and that he was fully conscious that he and others with whom he voluntarily associated were under constant observation by members of the Force, does not of itself make it probable that he would at great risk to himself attempt to rescue a prisoner or assault a constable with whom he had never been in hostile contact. But here we know that Harding was acquainted with, and probably friendly with, Callaghan, as he was sufficiently interested in him to accompany his wife later in the day to the Police Court, though he himself did not attempt to enter its precincts. The circumstance, too, that the policeman and the prisoner, when they had passed the "King's Arms" in Sclater Street, were surrounded by a very large and excited crowd of something over 200 people who were making a hostile demonstration and rendering the discharge of their duty very difficult, diminished the risk involved in Harding's rushing into the crowd and creating a diversion that might enable Callaghan to escape, or, at any rate, Harding to vent his indignation by striking a blow without being perceived in the noise and confusion of the moment. Seeing that it is admitted that P.C. Cann was struck there does not appear to be any improbability in his being able to recognise his assailant, or in the fact that P.C. Filbee and P.C. Ashford, who knew Harding's features, should also be able to identify him as the man who came into the crowd and struck the blow. Assuming that they were in any doubt about the matter, and did not know, in fact, which of the men around struck the blow, there does not seem to be any reason for P.C. Cann's fixing the guilt upon Harding in particular. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that either P.C. Cann or P.C. Filbee or P.C. Ashford had any particular spite against Harding, and it seems odd that they should have conspired against him if in fact Harding never stirred from the public house where he stood in no very conspicuous position in a crowd of other interested bystanders, as he alleges.

Qs. 21409, 21410, 21411, 21412

It may of course be said that all the witnesses on the police side are constables or superior officers, and therefore by no means independent witnesses. It must be admitted that there is some force in the suggestion, and it must be conceded that as a general rule where a body of witnesses are closely connected by common employment, and they are called to support a particular view of what has taken place on some occasion as to some matter affecting the conduct of some or all of them in reference to their business, their united testimony ought not in general to be accorded the same weight as that which would be properly allowed to that of the same number of witnesses absolutely unconnected with one another. It manifestly would have been of great advantage to Mr. Cluer and to ourselves if some respectable person, not acquainted with any of the persons concerned in this affair who was a witness of the scene in Sclater Street on this night, had been called in order to tell him and us what he saw and heard, and there might be circumstances under which the fact that no such observer has come forward might be forcibly used against the Police version of some occurrence, but the conditions existing in a great city like London when the police intervene to put down disorder, as we know from what has come out in other cases, for instance those of Altfuldisch and Maurer, and of Gerothwohl and Lavalette, are such as often to preclude them from having any opportunity of getting the names and addresses of independent witnesses. Where, as in this instance, the crowd around a constable and his prisoner is hostile, the difficulties in which the Police are usually placed are naturally greatly increased. It may be mentioned, too, that the general evidence leads us to believe that in this locality tradesmen are reluctant to come forward as witnesses for the police, and incur the displeasure of young men of the class to which Harding belongs with all its unpleasant consequences. The fact, however, that no independent testimony is brought forward in a particular case in support of the police is one of which it is right to take notice, but not one to which conclusive importance should be attached. The right course seems to be to consider the character of the constables, and the way in which they perform their several parts in the whole operation of arresting, conveying to the station, and preferring a charge, and, if nothing comes out which affords reasonable indication that the story as told discloses impropriety of action, or incidents that lead one to infer that they are distorting or suppressing something material, to accord the same weight to the case made by the testimony of several Police officers as one would accord to a case made by the consistent evidence of any other set of presumably trustworthy men speaking as to matters connected with their avocations.

The Ascertained Facts.

In this case the story told by the Police officers concerned in the arrest of Williams and Callaghan, and in the conveying of the latter to the police-station, and as to what took place in the charge-room, is almost entirely uncontradicted or varied in any sensible degree by the evidence of Harding or his witnesses.

As to the main facts there is absolutely no doubt whatever. P.C. Cann's statement as to the conduct of Williams and Callaghan, their attack upon him, and their grossly disorderly and violent conduct during and after their arrest in Bacon Street, is quite unquestioned. Williams and Callaghan were tried before Mr. Cluer, and the sentences, serious though not severe, which he passed upon them show that he (Mr. Cluer) fully accepted the account given by P.C. Cann. Williams was taken from Bacon Street to the Commercial Street Police Station without incident. Callaghan was taken by P.C. Cann and P.C. Filbee through Sclater Street. After passing the "King's Arms" Callaghan became violent and threw himself on the ground. In response to the police whistle P.C. Ashford and P.C. Deller first, and other constables afterwards, came to the assistance of P.C. Cann and P.C. Filbee. P.C. Deller took hold of Callaghan while he was struggling and relieved P.C. Filbee, while P.C. Ashford, who, with commendable zeal, rushed up only partially dressed, relieved P.C. Cann, who was exhausted, and P.C. Filbee and P.C. Cann then fell back somewhat and proceeded to try to keep the crowd from closing in upon the constables and the apparently desperate prisoner, and it was just after he (P.C. Cann) had let go of Callaghan that he (P.C. Cann), turning his head suddenly, received a very severe blow on the left ear, which caused considerable bleeding. The small variations to be discovered in the Police account are such as, in our view, go to show the honesty of the witnesses, and that they are not telling a story agreed upon, but each giving his independent version of what he saw of the affair, and of the part he himself played in it. It should be noticed that P.C. Deller candidly told us that he saw nothing of the assault, though, if he had been disposed to mislead us, there was absolutely nothing to prevent him from saying that he, too, recognised Harding as the man who struck the blow. These facts alone would give an inadequate idea of the scene which we are persuaded was witnessed by any onlooker in Sclater Street. The crowd actively following, and more or less taking part in a hostile demonstration against the Police, was large even for that locality and for such an occasion. None of the witnesses who gave us an estimate of the number of the crowd placed it at less than 200, and the usual answer was: "From 200 to 300." That the temper of the crowd was dangerous, and that there was a real probability that the Police might be overpowered is, we think, clear. The burden of the shouts shows that somehow the notion had spread among the crowd that Callaghan was being very badly treated by his captors, though it is practically certain that there was no foundation for any such belief, since there is no suggestion that he was not quite sound, unhurt and unwounded when he got to the Police Station. It is true that two or three persons did come to the Police Station to make some complaint about Callaghan's treatment; they were civilly received by Inspector Wright, and they had every opportunity of making any statements upon the matter at the Police Court, but in fact no representation as to the exercise of undue force by the constables against Callaghan was made by anyone before Mr. Cluer. Everyone knows how rapidly quite erroneous notions as to what is going on in the centre of the crowd pass from one to another, and from end to end of a street, and sometimes through a whole neighbourhood. That such a belief spread in Sclater Street on this night is very likely, but that it was quite unfounded seems beyond doubt. The importance of all this for us here is that it does afford us some ground to start from in asking ourselves whether Harding's story is true.

The Alleged Police Threats.

Harding, in stating his version before us, appeared to attach very considerable importance to two statements which he alleged were made by the members of the force to him, and which he advanced apparently as showing that threats had been uttered against him by the Police before proceedings were taken against him in respect of an assault on P.C. Cann. The first is a statement alleged to have been made by Inspector Wensley, when persons who had lost property failed to identify Harding as the thief on the 18th September, which was to this effect—"If we do not have you for this, we shall have you for something else." The other statement was that one of the constables (he did not know which of them exactly) called out while they were in Sclater Street, and he was standing on the steps of the "King's Arms" public house, "All right, Harding, we will have you for this."

As to the first of these statements, we suppose that the point that the complainant had in his mind was that, disappointed at the result of the indentification proceedings, Inspector Wensley maliciously determined to see whether he could not proceed against Harding for something else, and, having heard that Harding was in Sclater Street when P.C. Cann was struck, determined to take advantage of that fact to trump up a charge of assault against him. As a matter of fact, Inspector Wensley absolutely denies that he said anything of the kind. However, even supposing that he did say something of the kind, or even used those exact words, there is really nothing whatever in the point, because the summons had already earlier on the 18th been issued under Mr. Biron's signature, and the application for the summons had been determined on two days earlier and had been delayed by the fact that it had been necessary to obtain the sanction of the Commissioner.

The other statement is that one of the constables called out, "All right, Harding, we will have you for this." The witnesses Williams, Andrews, and John Miller, confirm Harding's allegation as to the use of these words, though Frederick Smith was not certain as to the exact words. The constables deny that anyone of them used the expression. We are inclined to see in those words, "All right, Harding, we will have you for this," the concoction of a conversation for tactical purposes. What we are asked to believe is that P.C. Cann and P.C. Filbee, after they had got about twenty yards from the public house, when surrounded by a large, hostile and noisy crowd in such a way that it would have been only by the merest chance that they could possibly have seen Harding if they had looked back, and at the very moment when the prisoner became more violent than before, distinguished among discordant voices across a surging mass of people that of Harding shouting out, "Don't kill the man," and that Harding and the people round him heard rising above all the din of popular disorder the words, "All right Harding, we will have you for this," from such a considerable distance. The thing does not seem to us at all probable. It would indeed be not improbable if Harding were the man who struck P.C. Cann, that P.C. Cann or P.C. Filbee might have then said: "All right, Harding, we will have you for this," and he would have been quite near enough to hear the words in that case; but it seems idle to pretend that his (Harding's) name should, the moment one of the constables was struck, be that which first occurred to him or to one of his comrades on the spot, if, in fact, Harding was not there, but was on the step of the public house. It is difficult to believe the evidence of Harding and of his witnesses upon this point.

We may add here that we have visited Sclater Street, observed the position of the King's Arms, and inspected the steps on which as Harding alleges, he stood.

Cross-Examination of Harding.

Further, we were very dissatisfied with the manner and the substance of Harding's answers in cross-examination. There are many points disclosed in them which invite damaging criticism of his accuracy and good faith. We will
Q. 21108 content ourselves with one. Harding was asked by Mr. Muir: "Who was the man in custody going along Sclater Street?" Harding replied "A man named Callaghan I heard afterwards." No one would have imagined from that answer that he
Qs. 21109 (Harding) knew Callaghan well. He immediately afterwards said "by sight" he 21110 knew him, and then he said that he certainly knew him by name. In these answers he went perilously near denying a friend, and we say "a friend" because it came out later on in his cross-examination that he had known Callaghan for twelve or fifteen months, and that he was so much interested in him, that he accompanied Callaghan's wife to the Police Court later in the day, and waited in the public
Qs. 21409 house opposite while the case was being tried. We also have it in Mr. Rayner's to 21412 evidence that he had seen Harding with Callaghan "scores of times." Harding's disclaimer of acquaintanceship with and of a somewhat closer knowledge of Callaghan than is implied in knowing him "by sight and name," is not a thing that commends itself to us.

Looking at Harding's evidence as a whole, and bearing the points to which we have just adverted in mind, we have no doubt at all that Harding's evidence in this case is thoroughly untrustworthy as to all material points.

Harding's Witnesses.

Harding and the three witnesses whom he called had been for some time in the bar of the "King's Arms" public house with four or five other persons, and it appears that facilities are given in the bar for playing at a game called "darts," which is an entirely harmless recreation. Harding and one or two of the other persons in the bar were in the middle of a game when it was stopped by the noise made by the arrival of Callaghan and the constables with the crowd outside in Sclater Street. As we gather from the evidence, all the people in the bar rushed to the door. Some of them got on to the pavement or into the road, and Harding, Smith (the manager) Andrews and Miller stood on the step, Miller not being allowed by his "intended" (a young woman who was with him in the bar) to go further. They all stood on the steps until the prisoner and his captors and the crowd had gone up the street, and seemingly during the time when Callaghan was struggling on the ground and the procession was therefore stopped, and afterwards, all, except two or three of the persons who had been in the bar, returned there, and Harding and others continued the interrupted game. Smith (the manager) Andrews and Miller all swear positively that Harding never left the doorstep, but no one can suggest any plausible reason why they should be so certain that Harding did not go away for a minute or two, and in some of the answers given by the three witnesses there is great vagueness as to what became of the persons other than Harding and themselves. There is absolutely nothing to indicate that anyone in the bar connected Harding in any way (if indeed they knew as little about him as they say) with what was going on outside. There was no reason whatever for their keeping any kind of observation upon Harding's proceedings, and the general rush to the door was sufficiently sudden to distract, and the noisy and turbulent drama that was being enacted outside was sufficiently interesting and exciting to absorb the attention of those who hastened to witness the scene. If Harding did, as is stated by the Police, rush into the crowd, which consisted of people many of whom would readily recognise and make way for him and did get right into the centre of the crowd, perhaps touch Callaghan, and deal a passing blow at P.C. Cann, and then dodge and retreat to the public house, his rapid and well-executed movement may well have escaped the notice of those members of the company in the bar who, after rushing to the door, remained on the step as onlookers. Their failure to see that blow indirectly tends to contradict Harding's statement that he actually saw from the doorstep the constables ill-treating Callaghan, and it shows that the density of the crowd, and the distance where the occurrence in question took place, was too great for them to see as much as Harding himself affects to have noticed from the same spot. Even if we give these three witnesses the credit of not going to the Police Court with the deliberate intention of misleading the Magistrate, it may well be that they are by common mistake treating the fact that they do not remember that Harding did rush into the crowd and then come back, as amounting to proof that he did not leave the doorstep. That there was considerable bias in Harding's favour on the part of Andrews, and, to some extent, on the part of Smith (the manager), was, we think, noticeable. The result of cross-examination was, in our opinion, unfavourable to all three witnesses, and they did not convince us that we ought to accept as accurate their statement that Harding did not leave the doorstep.

The Police Case.

The Police case appears to us particularly strong, inasmuch as P.C. Cann, P.C. Filbee, and P.C. Ashford separately informed Inspector Wright that Harding was the person who had struck the constable. Reports were called for in consequence of the allegation that Callaghan had been ill-treated; these reports were prepared the same night, and in each of them Harding's name appears as having been observed to strike P.C. Cann. The charge against Harding was clearly no afterthought. P.C. Cann, though acquainted with Harding by sight and by name, had never had occasion to arrest him, and had no apparent reason for picking Harding out as his assailant from among the numerous youthful criminals who were known to the Police, and some of whom must have been in and about Sclater Street on the night in question.

Further, there is is nothing in what is shown to have taken place on the way to the station after the assault on P.C. Cann was committed, or at the Police Station itself, or subsequently, which ought to lead one to think that the decision to lay an Information against Harding was arrived at as the result of combination between Inspector Wensley and the three constables. The conduct of each seems quite natural and explicable without having to resort to the suggested conspiracy. P.C. Cann, when he charged Williams and Callaghan at the Police Station, at once told Q. 23672
Inspector Wright that it was Harding who struck him a blow on the left ear. This was said not after he had finished the charge against the two prisoners, but as part of the statement which he gave the Inspector when the prisoners were in the dock at the station, and before the charge was read over to them. It is extremely unlikely, having regard to the great excitement amidst which Williams and Callaghan were brought to the station, and when P.C. Cann had only just been violently struck, that he (P.C. Cann) could have had any conversation with P.C. Filbee and P.C. Ashford as to Harding, and it seems certain, from the evidence before us, that the charge against Callaghan was made to Inspector Wright before any such conversation took place at the station. P.C. Filbee described the assault to Inspector Wright on the same night, and named Harding as the person who had committed it. Q. 23222
P.C. Ashford also reported that Harding was the assailant. It is, of course, possible Q. 23751 that the constables may, after Williams and Callaghan had been removed from the dock to the cells, have talked about the matter, but there is nothing in the evidence which clearly indicates that that was the case. We infer, with very great confidence, that each of the constables spontaneously gave Inspector Wright Harding's name as that of the man who struck the blow, and that there is no substantial foundation for for the suggestion that there was here any improper combination on the part of the three constables mentioned to bring a false charge against Harding.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that all the constables concerned in the arrest of Callaghan and his conveyance to the Commercial Street Police Station did their duty remarkably well under very trying circumstances.

The result of the inquiry, therefore, is that the accusations made by Harding against P.C. Cann of having falsely and maliciously instituted proceedings against him wholly fail, and that, in our judgment, Harding was guilty of the assault and battery for which he was prosecuted.

XIII.—Mrs. X's CASE.

In this case Mrs. X. the wife of Mr. X, a member of a respectable profession, living in one of the suburbs of London, which for the purpose of this case we will call "Alpha," complained that she had been wrongfully arrested at Regent Street on the (——), 1906, by P.C. Cole, and charged at Marlborough Street with soliciting.

Mrs. X expressed a wish that the case should be heard in private, and we thought it expedient to comply with her request.

A written statement on her behalf was forwarded to the Secretary of the Commission, together with a note in which it was stated that Mr. X had been seen and stated that he was an extremely busy man, and had just then to go to (——) and then on to (——). His wife would have to accompany him and might be absent for some months, possibly until after the Commission had ceased their work. He therefore could not see his way to consent to the case being taken in hand until he returned, which was uncertain. He appears to have returned before the end of November, and we, having decided to inquire into the case, proceeded to do so on December 5th.

Mrs. X's statement, which it is expedient to set out as there are variations between it and her evidence in chief, is as follows :—

I am Spanish by birth, and am a married woman, living with my husband at the above address.

My husband is a (——), and is engaged at his work most of his time, and when he goes away to (——) and other places I am left much alone and am forced to go about such business as I do, and to any amusements that I fancy, by myself.

I teach Spanish to a lady at (Omega), and go to her house twice weekly when she is at home.

I always go to Oxford Circus by motor-'bus, and then take a 'bus to (Omega), returning in the same manner.

I knew by sight P.C. Cole, and after my affair at the police court I called to mind the fact that he had spoken to me once some months ago when he was in plain clothes off duty. He said he was a detective. He asked me to have a glass of wine with him. I refused this. I was merely waiting for a 'bus one afternoon.

On the night of the ——, 1906, I had just alighted from the (Omega) 'bus on my way home, and was waiting for the motor-'bus. I had with me a large cardboard box containing my evening shoes, some blouses, and other things, which I had been wearing at a party that evening at the house of the lady I have mentioned.

My insurance agent, who lives near me, met me and said he was riding home by cab and would give me a lift. I declined this, and he bowed and left me.

It was a wet night, and I had my umbrella and was holding my skirt up, and my hands were full. I had also my purse in my hand.

The police constable I have mentioned was on duty near where I was standing, and as soon as the gentleman had left me he came up to me and said, "I saw you leave that gentleman. I suppose you wanted too much from him. You fly too high. I suppose you want £10; you won't get that." I told him to go away; I was a married woman. He said, "Yes, I know all about that; your husband is a bully or a ponce." He went on to ask if I had any children. I said I had not. He told me if I had a big fellow like him he would soon make me a baby or perhaps twins.

I turned to go away, and he remarked that I had a fine fat purse, and that I never did anything for him. I took this to mean that I gave him no money at any time.

My 'bus then came up, and I made a move towards it saying "Here is my 'bus." He seized me by the arm and said, "You are not going that way; you are going with me." He then dragged me to the station.

I do not know what I was charged with—I was too ill. My dress was muddied and my parcel also.

I told the Inspector I was a married woman and gave my address, and told the policeman he was a dirty rascal.

Whilst I was waiting to be charged, another policeman came in and walked round me, and called out, "Yes, I know her well; she is in Oxford Circus every night." They said the parcel I was carrying was an old trick and too well known.

I was put back in the cell.

There were several other women there. They told me the policeman who had locked me up had locked them up also. They said that he was a dirty dog, and that I ought to have given him half a crown, that he would take anything from a woman, even a shilling and that I ought to have run away when I saw him coming. They said he wanted money every week from every one of them. If one gave him 5s. at first they would have to continue that amount every week.

The policeman afterwards came in to me and told me that if I said anything against him he would lock me up and my husband too, or would tell some of the others to do so.

This was some hours after I had been taken into custody, when I think he heard my husband was coming to bail me out.

The next morning, when I went to court, with my husband I had to leave him and go with the policeman who had locked me up and stand with the prisoners.

The policeman said to me, "What you have to do, Mrs. X, is to tell the Magistrate you are very sorry. Don't listen to what he says to you or it will be the worse for you."

He told me that the law is that no single woman can be out after half-past ten.

When I went into court I came over ill and cannot say what happened. I could not speak. My husband was there.

The Magistrate said, "I believe a mistake has been made." I was discharged.

T. M., Superintendent.

Mrs. X was brought to the Great Marlborough Street Police Station at 10.55 p.m. on the (——), 1906, and on the following morning was let out on her husband's bail at 2.50 a.m. The case was tried by Mr. Denman, who dismissed the charge under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879.

The following is a copy of the notes of evidence taken at the police court on the (——) day of (——), 1906, before G. L. Denman, Esq., when Mrs. X was charged with "Insulting behaviour."

(Police Act).

Arthur Cole, 81 C, on oath saith as follows :—

At 10.50 p.m. on (————) I was on duty in Oxford Street. Prisoner went up to a gentleman outside the Tube Station and spoke to him. He seemed annoyed and walked away. He spoke to me, saying "That lady is annoying me." She went further down Oxford Street and spoke to two more men. She is up there every night about 10 or 11 p.m.

Henry Keeble, 91 C., on his oath saith :—

About 10.30 p.m., on the (————), I saw prisoner standing about at the Circus for half an hour. I did not see her the week before last.

Mr. X on his oath saith :—

Defendant is my wife. Married five years. I was called to bail her at the police station. I found that she had a large box with her. She had been to London on some business. Not with her when arrested.

Discharged.

We inquired into the complaint in private on the 5th, 7th and 10th December, 1906. Lord Russell, Mr. Cockle, and Mr. Graham Mould appeared as counsel for Mrs. X. Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir appeared for the police concerned.

The complainant, who described herself as Spanish by birth, spoke English well. She was a voluble and excited witness, and she spoke so quickly that it seemed almost impossible for the shorthand writer to follow her, but in fact he was able to cope successfully with the difficulty.

She was the only witness, and practically the only possible witness who could be called as to the exact circumstances of the arrest, except a gentleman to whom she referred in her statement as an insurance agent, and he was not called. Mr. X did not appear before us, and as the lady was represented by counsel we did not think it necessary to summon him to give evidence.

On the Police side we took the evidence of P.C. Cole, 528 V ; P.C. Keeble, 91 C ; Sergeant Shepherd, 39 C ; Sergeant Mead, 27 C ; Inspector Remfry, and S.D.I. Mackay.

We propose to summarise the evidence given in chief by Mrs. X on her side, and the relevant portions of the evidence given by the police concerned.

Mrs. X's Case.

Mrs. X told us that she was a married woman of Spanish birth, and that her husband was a (————), and had often to be away on business. On the night of (——), 1906, she had been paying a visit to a lady to whom she gave French lessons. She had to change at Oxford Circus, and had got off the 'bus at Peter Robinson's on the south side of Oxford Street. It was about 10.30, and a very rainy evening. She had a big box containing the things she had been wearing at her friend's. While she was waiting she saw two gentlemen one a friend and one a stranger. She dropped her umbrella, and the stranger picked it up. He said, "Madam, your umbrella." She said, "Thank you." He said, "Will you allow me to help you with your box?" She refused his help, and said that she was waiting for a motor-car. Her friend said, "Where are you going to, Mrs. X? Will you come in a cab?" She refused, and said that she preferred a motor-car. He said, "There is no motor-car; it is awfully late for you; it is 10.30." She said, "Never mind; the motor-car cannot be very long." He kept a draper's shop near where she lived, Q. 24, &c.

He said, "Oh, you did not go in the cab with him." She said, "No, I want a motor-car." He said, "Never mind; it is rather late—it is half-past ten." He said, "What are you doing here? It is half-past ten." She said, "I know it is half-past ten." He said, "Come with me." She said, "Where?" He said, "Come with me. What country are you?" She said, "I am foreign." He said, "Come with me." She said, "No; do not be silly. My husband will be here to night; he has come from abroad. Let me alone." He said, "Give me your address, and I can come and see you." She said, "No, I do not want you to know Q. 53.

She said, "Five or six years. Why do you ask?" He said, "Your husband is no good." She said, "Why is he no good?" He said, "You have no baby." She said, "My husband is an Englishman; he is the same as you are." She said, "You dirty rascal, let me go." He said, "Why are you rushing me like that? Inside!" She looked at him and said, "What are you doing to me." He said, "Why are you rushing me like that?" She said, "Leave me alone. If I have no baby that is not your business." She told him about her husband, and said, "You must let me go." He said "No, you will be sorry." He said, "You are rushing me, you are pushing me. You are not a nice girl! You are not kind to me." All the time he was speaking he tickled her. He said, "Give me your arm, like two sweethearts." She told him to let her go and keep his place. "You do not keep your place of a policeman." Police Case.

On the Police side the first witness called was P.C. Cole, 528 V, formerly of the C division. He said he had been recently removed from the C division on
Q. 468, &c. account of his wife's health. He told us that he first saw the complainant on the night in question at the junction of Oxford Circus and Regent Street at about 10·25 p.m. She was standing there, looking up into gentlemen's faces and smiling at them. She then went eastwards towards Oxford Street, and then to the Oxford Circus Tube Station. She there approached a man, looked up into his face, and smiled. She said something. The man said to her, "Go away; I do not want to have anything to do with you." He entered the Tube Station as if to avoid her, but on seeing witness he came out again. He said to witness, "These women are a nuisance." Witness then crossed to the opposite side of Oxford Street, by Peter
Q. 475, &c. Robinson's. He then saw her stop a man by Hills Place. The man got a yard or two past her, but he came back to her, and after a short conversation they walked
Q. 487. on together to Berwick Street. There they parted. She then went on to Wardour Street. She there stepped in front of another man, but he stepped aside. She again stepped in front of him, and he then said something to her and gave her a slight
Q. 488, &c. push. This man then crossed to the north side of Oxford Street. The witness had cautioned her at the Tube Station after the man spoke to him. He told her "You must behave yourself and not molest people." She said, "You mind your own business. That was my friend." After the third man had crossed to the north
Q. 492, &c. side of Oxford Street the witness crossed back to the south side of Oxford Street from Wells Street. He was behind the complainant the whole time. He saw Sergeant Shepherd while crossing the road, and said something to him about the complainant.
Q. 500. At Wardour Street witness told her he should arrest her for using insulting behaviour.

Q. 504. he had made a mistake. At the station he stated the fact in Mrs. X's presence to
Q. 505. Inspector Remfry. The complainant said, "The constable has made a mistake, I did not insult him. He was my insurance man, and the other man spoke to me." At the Sergeant Shepherd, 39 C, was patrolling from 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. on the night in question between Berwick Street and High Street, Bloomsbury. At Oxford Circus

Q. 1062. P.C. Keeble, who was on point duty, came across to him and said "All right, Serjeant, there is a woman gone along Oxford Street East, which I have seen several nights in the Circus speaking to gentlemen, and I should like you to see whether you know her. She is dressed in red carrying a card-board box in her hands." He then went into Oxford Street and saw a lady (identified as Mrs. X) hovering about the Tube
Q. 964, &c. Station at Oxford Circus. She was not there a minute before she walked away eastwards along Oxford Street. He saw her stop a man at Hill's Place. She and the man whom she stopped walked together as far as Berwick Street,
Q. 972, &c about 200 yards. Witness saw P.C. Cole between Poland Street and Berwick Street.

He (P.C. Cole) spoke to him (Sergeant Shepherd) and said, "Have you seen that woman stop anyone?" He (Sergeant Shepherd) said, "Yes, I saw her stop a man at Hill's Place." P.C. Cole said, "I have already cautioned her, and I am going to take her into custody; I have seen her before," and he (P.C. Cole) then walked past the witness (Sergeant Shepherd), who remained at Berwick Street. P.C. Cole walked on towards Wardour Street. About two or three minutes afterwards, he (P.C. Cole) came back with Mrs. X in custody walking towards the station. Q. 975. Q. 977.

In cross-examination by Mr. Cockle he said he had been on duty walking round about there for a whole month, he thought, but he had never seen Mrs. X before. Q. 982, &c. Q. 988.

P.C. Keeble, 91 C, said that he was on point duty at Regent Street on (——) from 9 p.m. until 1 a.m. He had seen Mrs. X for the first time round Oxford Circus during the week ending (——), between 9 and 12 at night. He had seen her looking into men's faces, smiling. He saw her speak to two men one night, and then cross the road and get into a motor-'bus for (Alpha). He remembered that she usually wore a red dress, and that once or twice she was carrying a small cardboard box. On the night in question he saw her on the west side of Regent Street, and she was in his sight for about a quarter of an hour. She was walking about the Circus looking into people's faces. This was between 10 and half-past 10 as far as he could remember. He saw her cross the Circus towards the Tube Station. He then lost sight of her for about a couple of minutes. He then saw her turn out of Regent Street to go towards the Tube Station. He saw Sergeant Shepherd coming out of Regent Street and he crossed over to him and reported to him. He said, "A woman has been going down here wearing a red dress and carrying a cardboard box. I should like to see if you know her." He next saw Mrs. X at the police station the same evening in the charge room. He was sent for by the Inspector in connection with the case, and he told the Inspector what he had seen of her that night and previously in her hearing. He could not remember whether she said anything. Q. 1277. Q. 1280. Qs. 1281 1282 Q. 1283, &c. Q. 1287. Q. 1288. Q. 1289. Q. 1290. Qs. 1292 to 1301.

P.C. Henry Keeble gave evidence at the Police Court, and it appeared from the copy of the notes of evidence put in that he had said he had not seen her the week before last; and, if so, that would be in direct contradiction of the statement which he had just made to us that he had seen her during the week ending (——) round Oxford Circus. But subsequently the original note of his evidence, and a letter from Mr. Savill, the Chief Clerk of Marlborough Street Police Court, were produced, the effect of which was to show that the copy of the original note was not accurate, and that the original note did not contain the above statement, "I did not see her the week before last," which was arrived at by putting together in the copy two uncompleted sentences in the original, and supplying a word. See Q. 1277.

In cross-examination by Mr. Cockle, he said that he had seen complainant three times during the week ending (——). He did not see her do anything improper on the evening in question. He had never spoken to her. He could not say whether she had a parcel with her on the night before he saw her getting into the 'bus; nor could he remember whether she had a cardboard box with her on any of the three prior occasions. Q. 1304 &c. Q. 1373. Q. 1489 Q. 1515. Qs. 1516, 1517.

Sergeant Henry Mead, 27 C, was called and said that he was on night duty from the 5th (——) for the remainder of that month. He saw Mrs. X frequently, the first time being about the second or third night of his duty. She was opposite Jay's accosting gentlemen. She was dressed in red with a white furry hat. She generally carried a cardboard box about a foot square. P.C. Cole said to him, "There is a woman here accosting gentlemen over against the 'buses, Sergeant." He (Sergeant Mead) said, "If you see her commit herself take her into custody, but mind you caution her, and be careful and do not make any mistake." He described her as a woman carrying a cardboard box and dressed in red with a white hat. The first time he himself saw her was after P.C. Cole had described her. He saw her at Jay's, close to Swallow Passage, and, besides seeing her on that night, he saw her several times during that week and the week after, between 10 and 12 in Oxford Street—generally on the Swallow Passage side. On the night in question he saw Mrs. X go up to a gentleman and look into his face, and she got into conversation with him, and then they walked into the "Dolphin" public house together. P.C. Keeble also spoke to him during the same week about the woman following and accosting gentlemen. "He gave me the same description as P.C. Cole." Q. 1556, &c. Q. 1567 Q. 1572. Q. 1573. Q. 1569 to 1577. Q. 1579. Qs. 1580. 1581.

In cross-examination by Mr. Mould he said that between the 6th or 7th and the night in question he saw her accosting gentlemen, but no one complained, and no one seemed to him to be annoyed. He had never known a prostitute carry a box of the size that she carried.

Qs. 1611, 1612

Inspector Remfry, who took the charge, was also called. He told us that he had made a report in the case on the (——) in which he stated that he had had a conversation with Mr. X at the Police Court on the morning of the (——) while he was waiting for his wife to appear before the Magistrate. He (Mr. X) informed the Inspector he was employed by a firm of (——), and that he was very often away from home for several days at a time, but usually came home for the week end. He could not understand why his wife should have been in Oxford Street on the previous night, as he expected to find her home, as he only arrived that evening from (——). But his wife had assured him that she had been to see a lady friend at (Omega), and that she was on her way home when arrested. He assured him that he did not know who his wife's friend was, as she (Mrs. X) declined to disclose her name, but he was sure his wife would not come to Oxford Street again at night. The Inspector added in his report that Mrs. X was a French woman, very excitable, and that she did not deny the constable's evidence as to his having seen her speaking to men, but she said they spoke to her first. She said that she had a very great difficulty to explain her conduct to her husband, and when she came into court and saw him she felt faint. She made no complaint against the police. The learned Magistrate asked the police constables if they knew her as other than what she represented herself, and they assured him that they did not. The charge sheet was marked "Discharged."

Q. 1800, &c.

The Inspector was examined by the Chairman as to what was the evidence of "insulting behaviour," and he replied, "The P.C. stated that he saw the woman stop three men and speak to them, which action was resented." He (the Inspector) thought it was proper on the evidence before him to take the charge under the section as to insulting behaviour, Sub-section 13, Section 54, of the Police Act, 1839. There had been many convictions of that kind at Marlborough Street Police Court.

Qs. 1815, 1816

Inspector Remfry was subsequently recalled, when he stated that no complaint was made in his hearing by Mrs. X of the behaviour of P.C. Cole towards her. After he read the charge over to her she said what he had stated in his report. He had more of a conversation with her after she was in the cell, when she gave him a wrong address (wrong number), and told him particularly of her husband, but he did not remember her making any complaint against P.C. Cole.

Inspector Francis Mackay produced the note books of P.C. Cole, P.C. Keeble, and Sergeant Shepherd. There was no entry in the note book of either of the two latter, but there was an entry of the case in P.C. Cole's note book, and the Inspector had duly initialled it at the time. He told us there was not a man in the force with more experience of dealing with prostitutes than P.C. Cole. He also explained the origin of the practice of charging women under the "insulting behaviour" section. There had been difficulty in proving women to be prostitutes, and the Magistrates would not convict, so they fell back, with the Magistrates' assent, on Sub-section 13. They had found it of great service. "A number of women—in fact, I believe more than three-quarters of them—we do not see now. They have left the streets; they saw the folly of it. . . . . With regard to a number of these cases of insulting behaviour, the Magistrate discharges them under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, and I am glad to say it has been very useful in that way, because these women have gone back to their employment, or have left off coming to the streets. A great number of them have been in employment."

Observations.

If the evidence of the constables and the sergeants which we have just summarised is true, it seems to us clear that the arrest was justifiable, though the case raises once more the question as to the practice which has arisen at Marlborough Street Police Court of treating cases which are to all intents and purposes cases of solicitation under Sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act, 1839. If Mrs. X did in fact behave in the manner described by P.C. Cole he was amply warranted in arresting her under the circumstances. P.C. Cole's account is confirmed in material particulars by Sergeant Shepherd, who saw Mrs. X stop a man at Hill's Place. P.C. Keeble does not say that he saw Mrs. X actually accost anyone on that night, but he had seen her walking about the Circus looking into people's faces. Seeing that the police did not allege that she was a prostitute, her behaviour on nights preceding the one in question appears, strictly speaking, to be irrelevant; but the Magistrate to some extent accepted evidence on that point, and we thought it right to receive it, as for our purposes it was necessary to learn as much as possible with a view of testing the complaint and thoroughly investigating the method in which the police deal with these cases.

The weight of the evidence is prima facie very strongly in favour of the police, and unfortunately for Mrs. X, our confidence in her veracity and accuracy was much shaken by the very damaging points made against her in the course of her cross-examination by Counsel and examination by the Commissioners. Her own account of her behaviour, when considered in the light of all that we know about Oxford Circus, and about the number of women frequenting that place, seems open to unfavourable construction by an impartial onlooker, even if he did not know that Mrs. X had often been observed at Oxford Circus before. Still, seeing that a very large number of omnibuses stop at the corners of the circus, and that ladies frequently have to change from one omnibus to another, there would not seem, if her account be true, to have been any adequate justification for any interference by P.C. Cole. Ladies waiting for public conveyances are, no doubt, often exposed to improper accosting by men, and the mere fact of Mrs. X's conversing with a gentleman or gentlemen was quite capable of explanation on the ground that she was a victim of such unpleasant attentions, or on other grounds not involving any impropriety on her part. We were very sorry that it was necessary that Mrs. X should be subjected to a close and searching examination, especially as the result disclosed conduct on her part from which it is difficult to draw anything except an inference unfavourable to her character, though it does not afford sure ground for believing that she could be properly described as a "common prostitute." In her attempt to explain her presence and her conduct at Oxford Circus on this night, and the fact that she had been there on other occasions rather late in the evening, she involved herself in many contradictions, and landed herself in difficulties, from some of which she could not extricate herself.

Cross-examination of Mrs. X.

She told us, for instance, that she had never seen P.C. Cole before; she did not know his face before. In her original statement she said, "I knew by sight P.C. Cole and after my affair at the police court I called to mind the fact that he had spoken to me once, some months ago, when he was in plain clothes off duty." Possibly what she meant to tell us was that she did not recognise him when he spoke to her on the night in question as the plain clothes constable who had spoken to her once before. But that is hardly a satisfactory explanation; for later on in the cross-examination, when she was asked if she was quite sure she had never seen him before, she replied, "I do not remember," and when the sentence in her original statement was put to her by Mr. Eldon Bankes, she said, "I never said this 'police constable.'" She seemingly meant that she had not used the words "police constable," to the gentleman who took the statement. "I know nothing about that word. I know I said that a policeman one afternoon at four o'clock insulted me the same as that man. When he took me in charge, I said, 'That is the man I met a month or two before.' He said, 'Madam, will you have a glass of wine?' I said, 'No thank you.'" Then she said he looked exactly the same man. Being asked by the Chairman whether she still thought that P.C. Cole was the man who asked her to have a glass of wine she said, "Yes, I think it is the same man. He has the same moustache and the same physique, only when a man is in policeman's dress he is quite changed. Never one policeman in London has spoken to me before"; and she added some further details about the conversation when the policeman spoke to her on one occasion.

Q 3. 172–173.

Q 409.

Q 410.

On being asked how long she had been married she replied "Six years"; but on a copy of the certificate of her marriage, dated the 1st April, 1902, being handed to
Q. 187. her, she admitted that it was on that day that she had been actually married, but that she had been living with Mr. X two years before that time, that is to say, she had been living with him for six years. To this contradiction we do not think, under the circumstances, it would be fair to attach any great importance.

One of the most serious difficulties in which the witness became placed as the result of further interrogation was as to the name and address of the lady friend living in (Omega), to whom she was in the habit of giving lessons. In her original statement she said that she taught Spanish to a lady at (Omega), and went to her
Q. 7. house twice weekly when she was at home. Before us in the examination in chief she said that she went to give her French lessons. In cross-examination, having said that the lady at (Omega) was a French woman that her Christian name was (——), that she was a Madame (T), and that her address was (Omega), she was asked:
Q. 230. "I understand you to suggest you went there to give her lessons? (A) Yes.
Q. 231. (Q) Lessons in French? (A) Yes. (Q) Although she was a Frenchwoman—Madame
Q. 232. (T)? (A) Yes. (Q) So you went to give a Frenchwoman lessons in French at
Q. 233. (Omega)? (A) No, not in French. (Q) But, Madame, you said in French? (A) That
Q. 234. is my mistake; that was all." She was a good deal questioned as to the address.
Q. 218. Asked in what street the lady's house was, she said "I forget." Later on she was asked again about Madame (T). Mr. Eldon Bankes said, "I must press you to give
Q. 129 some indication of where I can find the house where Madame (T) lived." The witness replied, "At (Omega)." Being asked what 'bus she went by to it she replied
Q. 430, &c. that she went "by a 'bus near a big shop called (——) Furniture Shop, and on the opposite side there is a public house and 'buses." They went right up to (Omega), and she got out right at the top of (Omega) as far as the 'bus went, and then she walked. The 'bus stopped right at the top of the hill—it is a big hill—after passing all the shops. It is a little street down there. She then walked about ten minutes. She further described the place where Madame (T) lived as a little house by itself, but
Q. 443. almost immediately afterwards said "I do not mean a little place. The place where she lived, right where the 'buses stopped, has big grounds with little streets all
Q. 444. round." She did not know the name of the street. She was asked by Mr. Eldon
Q. 440. Bankes whether she only went there when her husband was away from home, and she replied, "Yes, the day is too long for me. I have no children." She described
Q. 446. the way in which she met the lady thus:—"I knew her before in Paris—in France. She said, 'One day come and have tea with me; I am very pleased to meet you. Where are you living?' I said I live down (Alpha). She said. 'Come in and see me and keep me company—come with me; if your husband goes out, and he is not
Q. 450. here, come in and see me.'" Being asked how she got there she replied, "By 'bus," but that Mrs. (T) met her at Queen's Hall or the Langham Hotel opposite the Queen's Hall, and she said, "Come with me." Ultimately she said that the first time she
Q. 453. met Mrs. (T) was in Queen's Hall. "She said, 'I will be here to-morrow afternoon shopping in town; I will meet you here at the Langham Hotel to-morrow afternoon.
Q. 459. You can come with me and get a cup of tea at my place.'" She also said that she refused to tell her husband the name of her friend.

Mention has been made in the evidence of the fact that Mrs. X was, on the night in question, carrying a cardboard box. It was one of rather large size (2 feet by 1) and certainly it was a larger box than one would imagine that a woman engaged in solicitation would be likely to carry, though it appears, and there is no reason to doubt the statement, that women of that class do often carry boxes or parcels for the purpose either of misleading the police or of affording a colourable answer to a charge of solicitation. Mrs. X had on this occasion undoubtedly a cardboard box in her hand. In her original statement she said, "I had with me a large cardboard box containing my evening shoes, some blouses, and other things which I had been wearing at a party that evening at the house of the lady" (i.e. Mrs. T.) "I have mentioned." In cross-examination she was asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes whether she took this box with her from her home (Alpha), and the witness replied "Yes." Mr. Eldon Bankes then said, "You took an evening dress with you for the purpose of giving her a lesson?" and the witness replied, "No, not for that. She gave it to Q 240 me like a friend. She said, 'It is good for you.'" It is not clear why Mr. Eldon Bankes referred to an evening dress because in the statement Mrs. X only refers to evening shoes. Probably the learned counsel meant to refer to evening shoes and not to an evening dress; but, however that may be, the witness replied, after a further reference by Mr. Eldon Bankes to the evening dress, "She" (i.e., Mrs. T.) "gave it to me friendly, she never used it herself. She said, 'If you like to have it you can.'" Q. 241.

The witness being further questioned, and it being pointed out to her by Mr. Eldon Bankes that he had asked whether she had not taken the box from her address (Alpha), and she had said, "Yes," she then said, "No, from her," (Mrs. T's) "house; she gave it to me." Q. 242.
She said that she had never taken that box into Oxford Street at night before that occasion, but that she had been about Oxford Street three weeks before with a box, but it was one not so big—a little box. As a matter of fact, the cardboard box, which was opened at the police station, contained neither an evening dress nor evening shoes, but a blouse, some under-linen, and a pair of stockings. Q. 566.

Upon another point she gave in her cross-examination evidence which contradicted another allegation in the statement which she sent in to us. In the statement she said, "My insurance agent, who lives near me, met me, and said he was riding home by cab and would give me a lift. I declined this, and he bowed and left me." In her examination-in-chief she told us that one of the two gentlemen who spoke to her on the night in question asked her "Where are you going Mrs. X? Will you come in a cab?" but she said she preferred a motor-car, it was quicker. She told us that she did not know his name, but that he was at (Alpha) and a gentleman in business whom she saw very often. He always said, "How are you, Madame?" but he was not a friend of hers, and subsequently she said that his business was in a linendraper's shop. In cross-examination she said that she often saw him in (Alpha), where she did her shopping, and that he sold her things in a draper's shop but that he was not a friend of hers. Asked why she had referred to him as her "insurance agent," the explanation she gave was that he said, laughing, "What are you doing? I am an insurance agent." He said, "I am an insurance agent" for fun, but she denied that she had ever said that he was her insurance agent. The other gentleman who spoke to her after picking up her umbrella was, according to her account, a complete stranger. He said to her, "Madame, you look awfully embarrassed," and she said that at the time when this stranger spoke to her she was standing close to the Tube Station at the corner. Q. 268. Q. 272. Q. 275. Qs. 276, 277. Q. 280.

Mrs. X was also cross-examined on a paragraph in her original statement to the following effect:—"The P.C. I have mentioned was on duty near where I was standing, and as soon as the gentleman had left me he came up to me and said, 'I saw you leave that gentleman; I suppose you wanted too much from him. You fly too high. I suppose you want £10. You won't get that.' I told him to go away, I was a married woman. He said 'Yes, I know all about that; your husband is a bully or a ponce.'" On being asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes whether the policeman on the night he took her into custody said anything about £10, she replied, "He never told me about £10. He said 'You are not very kind to me; I shall not let you go.'" Q. 425.
She was asked categorically whether the policeman said to her, "I saw you leave that gentleman; I suppose you wanted too much from him; you fly too high; I suppose you want £10; you will not get that," she replied "No." She admitted that he did say, "'I think you are too dear, good lady; you are too proud, you are rushing the men.' He said I was very proud or rushing the men. 'A man comes to you very nice, and you are awfully proud.' I said, 'I am a married lady; I live in a small house, and I do not make money in this way.' That is what I said to him." Q. 427. Q. 428

There are several points to which reference might be made in regard to which it was shown that the witness had made contradictory statements, but we think the matters we have mentioned are sufficient to show that Mrs. X is not a trustworthy witness, and that her story cannot be accepted in preference to that of P.C. Cole where there are material differences between the two versions of what took place on the night in question.

Mrs. X did not deny that she had been at Oxford Circus on several other nights before the (——), 1906. Indeed it follows from her own explanation that she had been in the habit of visiting a lady friend at (Omega) in the evening when her husband was away, that she came back by 'bus, that she had in fact been at Oxford Circus on several evenings, and that therefore the constables had had the opportunity of seeing her before. It should be noticed in her favour that none of the constables except P.C. Cole speak to acts or conduct on occasions before the one in question which would afford any certain ground for inferring that she was a prostitute in the sense that she was there for the purpose of soliciting men to go away with her to have connection for a monetary reward. Sergeant Shepherd, though he had been on patrol (which appears to have included Oxford Street) from High Street, Bloomsbury (eastern end) to Oxford Circus, had never seen Mrs. X before this night. P.C. Keeble saw her for the first time during the week ending 11th

Q 1279. (——) round Oxford Circus between 9 and 12, and what he had noticed was her "looking in men's faces smiling"; and on one night he saw her speaking to two men,
Q. 1280. and that then she crossed the road and got into a motor 'bus for (Alpha). It is obvious, even assuming that he was not making a mistake in identity, that that is not strong evidence of soliciting, and her conduct may be explained by gaiety of disposition or a general levity of nature. Sergeant Mead told us that he had seen Mrs. X frequently,
Q. 1556. first about the 6th or 7th (——), and that he had seen her accosting gentlemen.
Q. 1561. That of course is stronger evidence than P.C. Keeble's, but the word "accosting" is a word that contains the suggestion of soliciting prostitution, although in fact what he may have observed was innocent, though it may have been indiscreet conversation. He remembered, however, that on one particular evening he saw her go up to a gentleman, look into his face, get into con-
Q. 1579 versation with him, and that they then walked into the "Dolphin" public house, but he very frankly said that he did not at that time conclude that she was a prostitute. Really the evidence only comes to this, that on several occasions P.C. Cole, P.C. Keeble, and Sergeant Mead, had seen Mrs. X, or, at any rate, a lady in a red dress, and sometimes with a cardboard box, on several occasions before the night in question walking at or near Oxford Circus, and had observed her talking to and smiling at gentlemen, and on one occasion going into a public house with one. The case does not strike us as a very strong one, though no doubt the conduct of Mrs. X was such as to induce the supposition that she was a woman of light character and perhaps a regular prostitute.

Upon the whole, we see no ground for disbelieving the story told by the constables that they had seen Mrs. X in the neighbourhood of Oxford Circus on several occasions before the night in question, and that she was conducting herself in such a manner that an impartial onlooker might think that she was speaking to men for an improper purpose.

Conclusions.

The true facts of the case, therefore, seem to to us to be these. Mrs. X is the wife of a person in good employment, whose business takes him away a good deal from home. She is left to reside in a house in a dreary suburb, and, to use her own
Q 440. words, she finds the day "too long for her." She seems to have made the acquaintance of some one whom she chooses to describe as a French woman who lives in a suburb which we have called (Omega), in a house the number of which she does not know, in a street the name of which she does not remember. On the (——) she had paid a visit to this friend in (Omega), and took with her from home a cardboard box which, when she was returning, contained a blouse, some underlinen, and a pair of stockings. Whether she was actually on this occasion returning from visiting a friend in (Omega), whether the friend exists at all, or whether it was really a French woman or some male acquaintance are questions which the evidence does not enable us to answer with certainty and are only relevant so far as they affect her credibility and the probability of her behaving in the way described by the police witnesses. It was she herself who volunteered in her statement and in her evidence before us an explanation of her presence at Oxford Circus. Whether she was, in fact, coming from (Omega) or not, Mrs. X was undoubtedly about half-past 10 on the night in question at or quite near the place where P.C. Cole saw her. She had been on several occasions noticed by policemen in or near to Oxford Circus behaving in a manner which suggested to them that she was there for the purpose of prostitution, and which, whether their inference was true or not, was of a compromising and highly indiscreet character. On the night in question she approached
Q. 474. a man who was standing outside the Oxford Circus Tube Station (near which she herself admits that a man spoke to her), she looked up into his face, smiled, and said something that P.C. Cole could not hear, but, according to the constable, the man said to her, "Go away, I do not want to have anything to do with you," and the man then went into the Tube Station as if to avoid her, but, upon seeing the constable, he came out and said, "These women are a nuisance, constable." He then said to Mrs. X, "You must behave yourself and not molest people." She said, "You mind your own business ; that was my friend." P.C. Cole says that on the same evening, within a few minutes after that, he saw her stop a man by Hill's Place. The man got past her but he went back and had a short conversation with her, and then she and the man both walked together eastward as far as Berwick Street, where the man left her. P.C. Cole says that Mrs. X then proceeded towards Wardour Street, where she stopped in front of another man who stepped aside as if to allow her to pass, but she again stepped in front of him, and the man then said something to her and gave her a slight push, and then crossed to the other side of Oxford Street. P.C. Cole then went to Mrs. X and said, "I shall arrest you for insulting behaviour." She herself admits that she had spoken to two men. The constable, however, says that it was her action that stopped the gentlemen, while her account is that one of the men was a draper's assistant whom she knew from having done business in a shop at (Alpha) and that the other was a courteous stranger who picked up her umbrella when she accidentally dropped it.

Q. 495.

P.C. Cole, it should be observed, is a constable of great experience in regard to these cases, and has earned the confidence of his superior officers. Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay told us he did not think there was another man in the Metropolitan Police Force who had more experience of dealing with prostitutes than P.C. Cole. He has had facilities for knowing prostitutes more than any other man, because he has been employed to keep observation on disorderly houses and brothels, and he has had opportunities of getting acquainted with them more than any other men who have not been employed on that duty.

Q.1902.

Q. 1904.

Those being the facts of the case as proved to our satisfaction, we think there can be no doubt that P.C. Cole acted rightly in arresting Mrs. X, and, under the special circumstances, it appears to us that he was right in preferring the charge under Sub-section 13 because there was some evidence of "insulting behaviour" on the part of the prisoner whereby a breach of the peace might have been occasioned. Mrs. X annoyed by her behaviour one man who complained to the constable that these women were a nuisance, and it seems to us that her stepping in front of another man who gave her a "slight push" is also some evidence of insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace might have been occasioned, and her doing the same to a third gentlemen, notwithstanding the caution she had received, afforded additional ground for the charge that she was behaving in such a way as to insult passers by. But still the case made by the police seems to amount to a prima facie case of an offence under Sub-section 11, because the conduct of Mrs. X on this particular night, coupled with what was proved against her as to her behaviour on other occasions, amounted to some, though of course by no means conclusive, evidence that she was a "common prostitute."

The result is that the complaint of Mrs. X fails, and that the action of the constables concerned was, in our opinion, correct.

We should like to add that the case is one of a painful character, in which we have felt the responsibility of decision, especially having regard to the fact that Mrs. X is a married woman. We do not think the evidence warrants us in coming to the conclusion, even if it were necessary for us to do so, that she was a "common prostitute" in the sense that she was frequenting Oxford Circus with a view of soliciting men in order to obtain money. Her statement to P.C. Cole, "I do not make money in this way," is very likely true ; and P.C. Cole's evidence as to the conversation at the Police Court in which, according to him, she said, "You know my husband gives me plenty of money, I only did it for love," tends to confirm this view. Whether her representations that her visits to Oxford Circus were merely incidental as being a place in which she had to stop in going home from a friend with whom her relations were entirely innocent be accepted or not, that is a question as to which we need say nothing. Her conduct justified the belief which P.C. Cole came to entertain that she was a prostitute, and her behaviour on the night in question amply justified the action which the constable took. It is she herself, even if we accept her explanation, who is to blame in the matter, and, assuming that she is a respectable and faithful married woman, no one, we think, however willing to make allowance for gaiety of disposition, could approve of a course of conduct so compromising to herself, and inconvenient to the passers by with whom she interfered.

It should be observed that Mr. Denman found that the charge preferred under Section 54, Sub-section 13, of the Police Act 1839 was proved, though he very properly discharged the prisoner under the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, Section 16.

In conclusion we have only to add that in our opinion the police exhibited prudence and circumspection in dealing with this matter, and their action was correct and fully justified.

XIV.—EMMS AND NORREY'S CASE.

Edward Emms, who described himself as a flower-seller, residing at 10, Gibraltar Buildings, Bethnal Green, complained that without justification he was, on the early morning of the 23rd of October, 1906, assaulted and beaten by P.C. Harry Jeffery, 369 H, with his truncheon in Brick Lane, E., and wrongfully arrested and charged with being concerned, jointly with one Norrey, in assaulting P.C. Jeffery "whilst in the execution of his duty at Brick Lane," and also of further ill-treatment by members of the Force. Q. 23794, &c.

John Norrey, who described himself as a labourer, residing at 4, Poyser Street, Bethnal Green, complained that he was wrongfully arrested on a warrant obtained upon a false Information and charged jointly with Edward Emms, "For that he did on 23rd October, 1906, unlawfully assault and beat one Harry Jeffery, a constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police Force, at Brick Lane, E., then and there in the execution of his duty as such constable."

The details of these complaints sufficiently appear from the summaries of the evidence of Emms and Norrey, which are given below.

Edward Emms was arrested by P.C. Jeffery about half-past 12 on the morning of the 23rd October, 1906, and was brought in to the Commercial Street Police Station at 12.55 a.m., where he was detained. The charge against him was called on before Mr. Cluer at Old Street Police Court later in the day, and the case was remanded by the Magistrate to the 30th October, the prisoner being allowed out upon his own recognisances in the sum of £5.

The following is a copy of Notes of Evidence taken at the Old Street Police Court on 23rd October, 1906, before A. R. Cluer, Esq., in the case against Edward Emms.

HARRY JEFFERY, P.C. 369 H, sworn, saith :—

In Brick Lane, at 12.30 a.m. on the 23rd inst., I saw prisoner and another man quarrelling with a woman. Prisoner said it was his wife, and it was nothing to do with me. She went away. The man attacked me. Prisoner hit me in the mouth, and they got me against the wall. The other man also assaulted me. Being overpowered, I drew my truncheon and hit prisoner on the head. Prisoner knocked one of my teeth out.

ALBERT ANDERSON, sworn.—Sergeant H. :—

Last witness brought in prisoner. He seemed weak. His tunic was torn and his lamp damaged. He said Norrey hit him in the face, then prisoner hit him, and the two got him against the wall and hit and kicked him. Doctor saw prisoner and constable. P.C. did say that prisoner knocked his tooth out. He showed prisoner.

Copy of Notes taken on 30th in the case of Emms and Norrey

HARRY JEFFERY, P.C. 369 H, sworn :—

At 12.30 a.m. on 23rd in Brick Lane I saw the two prisoners and a woman. I knew Norrey for about twelve months before, and Emms by sight for about eight months. The woman was crying. I asked what was the matter. Emms said, "She is my wife. He is my brother-in-law. It does not matter to you." I said, "Why not take her indoors?" The woman and Norrey walked away a few yards. Norrey at once returned and hit me in the face with his fist violently. Emms hit me in the mouth, breaking a false tooth. I was partly dazed. I went against the wall. Emms seized my throat, and Norrey knocked my head against the wall. Norrey kicked me below the left knee, and beat me about the body and chest. They were pinning me against the wall. I was feeling nearly overpowered. I got clear, drew my truncheon, and hit Emms on the head with it, making him leave go. Norrey kept out of my reach, and said to Emms, "Get away if you can." Norrey ran away. I lost my whistle; Norrey took it; and he tore my armlet and my sleeve. My lamp was damaged. P.C. Death came on the scene and took Emms. I came to the station by myself. The Divisional Surgeon put me on the sick list. I am still on the sick list. I had done nothing to either men to call for this. I am certain of their identity. Emms never left my sight.

Cross-examined for EMMS.

I should not know the woman again. I have not been to Emms' house. I know Emms' wife, and this woman was not Emms' wife. Till this night I did not know that Mrs. Emms was the wife of the prisoner Emms. I told the Magistrate last week that I was kicked. I threw the two prisoners away from me, and hit Emms, making him release his hold, but Emms did not fall then. He ran a few yards and then fell. I followed him, but did not hit him again. I hit Emms twice at first. I made a very small mark. If I had had a good hit at him I should have found one blow enough to make him let go. I did not hit him while he was on the ground but while he was standing up. My arm was numbed by being pinned against the wall. It was not injured. It was my right arm. The first blow had no effect. Emms went on struggling. I had Emms by the throat with my left arm. Norrey had my right arm. I threw Emms clear of me. That was all. Norrey took my whistle at the beginning of the struggle. I have not got it back. A private person called P.C. Death. Emms was taken on the ambulance. He was left in the road perhaps three or five minutes. I did not see the blood in the road. I had nothing to do with the ambulance. I followed to the station. Emms was lying on the ground. I heard Emms say he did not want to see a doctor. I did not hear him say he wanted a private doctor. There was no provocation on my part.

Re-examined.

The first blow had no effect, hardly touched him. The second caused him to fall after going a few yards. Emms was found by the P.C. where he dropped down. I had as much as I could do to get to the station. I could not stand when I got there.

By Magistrate.

I identified Norrey by his general features and dress. I knew him as "Ginger Norrey" for about twelve months. The place was quite dark—just by a railway arch. I had never spoken to Norrey before. He had on a dark suit.

William Death, P.C. 409 H, sworn :—

At 12.30 a.m. on 23rd October I was at Sclater Street and received information from a private person who had a P.C. helmet in his hand. I went to Brick Lane, and at the entrance to Pedley Street I saw Emms lying on the pavement. The P.C. was about three yards away leaning against a fence, appearing dazed and exhausted, his left eye was swollen, mouth bleeding, his whistle gone and lamp broken. Emms seemed injured, so I sent for ambulance. I tried to pull him up, but he could not get up. I and P.C. Wood took Emms to the station on the ambulance.

Cross-examined for Emms.

There were not many people there. I have been at Commercial Street about two and a half years. As a rule crowds gather there quickly. This spot was a quiet one. There is a public-house within about 100 yards. I saw that Emms had a cut on his head. He was bleeding. There was not much blood about, though I said nothing to Emms. I was present when Divisional Surgeon examined him. He said, "I don't want to see a doctor." That was all. There were no women at the station. I did not help to push any out. I did not hear the inspector asking Jeffery what was the matter. At Pedley Street the P.C. told me that Emms and Norrey had both assaulted him and that Norrey had run away. I said I would see to the prisoner Emms. The inspector was there just as we took Emms away. I did not hear him speak to Jeffery.

Re-examined.

It was Inspector McMillan.

Albert Anderson, Station Sergeant 41 H, sworn —

I was in charge of station at 12.55 when Emms was brought in on the ambulance. Jeffery came in soon after. I investigated the charge. The P.C. was very exhausted. He seemed to have been roughly handled. His mouth was bleeding. Emms had a wound on the head. I sent for the doctor. Emms said, "I am not going to have no b——y doctor. I am going to Court as I am now." But I sent for the doctor. Then Emms was put in a cell. At the time Emms did not say that he had done nothing. Afterwards two women came to the station and asked for bail, and I said it would be accepted. Two or three men came to bail him. Emms was not bailed, as it was not forthcoming. I required £5. Emms made no complaint.

Cross-examined for Emms.

I think Emms came into the station first. The ambulance had to go in at the back. Emms had blood on his head, but he did not seem dazed. The P.C. told me Emms had been hit by him with his truncheon. I did not push the women out of the station. One did not ask to speak to Emms. I daresay she could have done if she wanted. It would not have been refused. I don't know Mr. Kemp. A man did not ask to see Emms or make any statement to me. I did not ask any of the men or women if they knew anything of the circumstances. They came in about ten minutes after the prisoner. I never asked them if they knew the facts of the case. The officers sent in reports which went to the Commissioner through the Superintendent. The S.D. Inspector called for them, I made a report at the time in the Occurrence Book. Jeffery made his statement at once, which went into the Occurrence Book. I took it from Jeffery's pocket-book. He has it now, or should have. He wrote it at once.

PERCY JOHN CLARK sworn.—Divisional Surgeon :--

I was called soon after 1 a.m. on 23rd. I first examined Emms in the charge room. He was very much objecting to have his wound dressed. He said he wished to go before the Magistrate as he was. I dressed his wound. I persuaded him to let me. He had a contused wound on his forehead three-quarters of an inch long of no gravity. It was not serious. Skin was broken. It was bleeding. He had also wound on back of head one inch long, contused, not of any depth, not serious. Had bled rather freely. It was not a typical full truncheon blow, nor was the one on the forehead. Truncheons generally make starred wounds. I could not swear they were truncheon wounds. Neither had been delivered with much force. I said he could be confined in the ordinary way. P.C. had a cut mouth, false tooth broken, two loosened, contused left eye, contusion on left side of back of head with lump size of a pigeon's egg, large bruise on inner side of left knee, below it, possibly a kick. Generally in state of collapse. Had been badly mauled. I put him on sick list—he is still on it. Probably return to duty next Monday.

Cross-examined for EMMS.

I saw no other marks on Emms' head. I think he had the skin of his hand knocked up, but I am not sure. I was half an hour or three-quarters of an hour over Emms. He was very troublesome and excited. Emms seemed to complain of his wounds. To break the skin would need some force. I should not have thought the wound would have made him senseless or even have felled him to the ground. I have had eighteen years as police surgeon, and have seen truncheon wounds. One used to see rough cases in this district. I did not speak to the inspector before I saw Emms. Emms talked nearly all the time, and kept moving his head. He was complaining, I believe, about the case, but I paid no attention. The sergeant was not present ; an officer was.

ARTHUR GREENFIELD, P.C. 214 H, sworn :—

I arrested Norrey on a warrant at 9.45 p.m. on 27th October in Mount Street. He had run away from me in Virginia Road. He fell; I arrested him. Before I spoke, he said, "I'm done. I am innocent. I can prove an alibi." I told him the warrant was for assaulting P.C. in Brick Lane. He said, "What policeman?" I said he knew as well as I. He said, "I am innocent. I can prove an alibi."

Cross-examined by NORREY.

There was no cry of "Fire!" There was no crowd except your associates. You just got off the ground and faced me as I came up to you. You said something about identification, but it was pointed out that you were on the warrant, so it was unnecessary.

JEFFERY, recalled (puts in his notebook for Mr. Schultess Young) :—

Cross-examined.

I wrote this at once when I got to the station. I was feeling dazed. I could hardly hold the pencil. I saw Emms hit me in the mouth ; Norrey hit me in the face first. I may have omitted some things from my book. I was dazed. Perhaps the sergeant made the ink additions. I had no pen.

Re-examined.

The sergeant initialled this book about 1.30, I believe.

For Defence of Emms.

George Kemp, sworn :—

Table maker, 4, Granby Street. I was in Brick Lane about 12.30 a.m. on 23rd, coming from Whitechapel after a walk. Just before the archway is a court. I looked down and saw a P.C. and a man apparently rowing. The P.C. seemed to be stopping the man. There was a scuffle and the man fell to the ground. I saw the P.C. hit the man with his truncheon. I could not see whether the man hit the constable first. It was Emms. When Emms fell the P.C. knelt on him and hit him again. A man ran out of the crowd, punched the P.C., and ran. The P.C. blew his whistle and a crowd came. I saw Emms taken away covered with blood. I thought his throat was cut. He seemed dead. At the final there were many people there.

Cross-examined.

I knew Emms by sight only. I have known him two or three years by sight, He is not a friend of mine. He is not a pal of mine. I may have spoken to him. I don't know Norrey; I never saw him before. The P.C. and Emms were a little way down the court just off Brick Lane through an arch when I first saw them. There were plenty of people there. I was nearly the length of the court away. There were some people between me and Emms. I did not see the P.C. with his back against the wall. There were several women there. I think there were nearly a dozen people there; perhaps more. I saw that the P.C.'s helmet was gone. I saw a boy with it. I was not close enough to see his whistle and armlet were gone. I would not like to say that Emms did not hit the P.C. in the mouth. The P.C. did seem a bit exhausted, as if he had had violent treatment. Emms is the man who scuffled with the P.C. The scuffle was before the P.C. hit him. After the P.C. hit Emms the other man came and hit the P.C. The other man was shorter than Norrey. I can't say who it was. The first blow brought Emms down close to the P.C. Then the P.C. hit him a second blow and knelt on him. Then I rushed towards where they were. I kept away from them by about the distance of the length of this Court. The whistle was blown by a constable after the other man had hit the P.C. I never saw the P.C. against the wall. They were scuffling when I came up. A young man asked me to come here on Saturday afternoon, so I came last week. It was Emms' wife or someone. She lives in Bacon Street. It does not benefit me to come. The woman asked me to go to her house. I went there and a gentleman saw me and asked me what I knew. He wrote it down. I don't see him here now. I did not come to this Court last week. I knew the woman well by sight. I suppose she saw me there. One of Emms' friends saw me and that was why I came here on Monday week. I was not asked to come then, but I came to see the case. But I did not come inside the Court. I did not see Emms till this morning. The gentleman I saw seemed to be a solicitor or someone.

Re-examined.

I had spoken about this matter to a friend of mine. I only came here on 23rd out of curiosity. The court where it happened is about four or five times the length of this Court. The P.C. and Emms seemed to be wrestling with each other. I am nothing to do with this case.

Martha Allen, sworn :—

55, Bacon Street, widow. I keep a coal shop. I was in Brick Lane on 23rd and saw a mob of people. I looked and saw the P.C. shoving Emms to get along. This was at the turning before Brick Lane—Pearley Street, I think. The man said, "All right," and was going along. There were about forty people there. I was quite close.

All at once the whistle blew. The P.C. hit the man on the head with his truncheon and he fell down. As he was getting up the constable hit him again. A lady raised his head and said "Do you know me," but he made no answer. A man behind the P.C. hit him in the face and ran away. The ambulance came up, and Emms was taken away. Emms was bleeding dreadfully. I don't know any of them. I went to the station and saw Emms in a chair. A young woman said she would like to speak to us. The inspector came and threw us both on the pavement, and we fell. I did not come here on 23rd, but a gentleman came and asked me what I saw. I had been speaking about the matter.

Cross-examined.

I was seeing my sister home, and had just left her. I did not see Norrey there. It was a short man who hit the P.C. The P.C. had his hat on. There was a young woman close to the constable; whom, I don't know. At that time Emms was on the ground. She was there also when Emms was being shoved. Emms did not hit the P.C. while I was there. The first blow brought Emms to the ground. He fell straight at the P.C.'s feet. I remained there for about half an hour. The woman with whom I went to the station was a stranger to me. I don't think I saw the station sergeant at the station. I saw an inspector. I thought I could take Emms to the hospital or something. My friend asked to see Emms. She said nothing about bail. I don't know who the man was who came to see me.

Hester Bloom, sworn:—

6, Hare Street, married. At 12.30 a.m. on the 23rd I was in Brick Lane and saw a P.C. struggling with a man in the courtway, and the P.C. hit the man with his truncheon and the man fell. The P.C. knelt and hit him again. I said he had killed him. The man was bleeding horribly. I knew him through passing in the neighbourhood. I asked if he knew me, and he groaned. The ambulance came afterwards. P.C. said, "I didn't know it was you; I thought it was one of our men." He was looking down when he said that.

Cross-examined.

I came up as the blow went. I was about three yards away. The P.C. fell to the ground too, and then knelt and hit the man again. I saw a short man make a blow.

Edward Emms, sworn:—

Out of employment. I was on my way home and saw P.C. and two or three people arguing and I went up. My wife was not with me. A young woman was with me. P.C. asked what I wanted. He said, "What do you want here, Emms?" I said I was only looking. He shoved me and I shoved him again, and he drew the truncheon and knocked me insensible, and when I came to I was in the police-station. I had several marks on my head. I found I was sitting in a chair. I wanted a private doctor, which was refused. I was getting up from the chair and a P.C. knocked me back again.

Cross-examined.

I do some flower-selling now and then. I know Norrey well. Have known him about eight years. I don't know where he lives. I wasn't talking with a woman that night. The P.C. pushed me two or three times and I pushed him back. He spoke to me by name directly I got there. I know him by sight. I have had no trouble with him. I saw nothing happen before I came up. One man was pulling another man. They were intoxicated. The P.C. was shoving them. I don't know what became of the other people. The P.C. got hold of me and pushed me before he drew his truncheon. I saw no one hit the P.C. or pin him against the wall or kick him. What the P.C. says is a lot of lies. I didn't see Norrey on Monday. I saw him when he came out from bail yesterday. I don't know the name of the solicitor who is defending me. I wrote to the society and they are acting for me.

I did nothing except to push the P.C. I saw no violence offered to the P.C. The P.C. knew me by name. Nearly everyone in Commercial Street knows my name. P.C. had his helmet on when I got there. I can't say if he had his whistle or his armlet on. He seemed as if he had been struggling with the other chaps.

Re-examined.

I wrote the letter produced.

JOHN NORREY, sworn :—

6, Poyser Street Buildings, labourer. Saturday 27th, in Virginia Road, P.C. came up and arrested me on a warrant. When I asked what the warrant was for he said for assault on a P.C. I said I was innocent and could prove an alibi. I was taken to the police station, and I asked to be put up for identification. On Monday night when this row was supposed to occur I went home at 11 at night and sat and played three games of draughts. I had been out by myself. I lived with my sister. I played draughts with her. We finished about eight minutes past 12. I went to bed then. Miss Baker played with me as well as my sister. Saturday night I first knew I was wanted. I hadn't been told I was wanted. Emms didn't come and tell me.

Cross-examined.

I didn't see Emms from the Tuesday before my arrest. I didn't run away from the P.C. I heard someone call "Fire," and when I got to the court I fell over a piece of orange peel. I didn't say "I'm done." I didn't say I was innocent before I knew what I was arrested for. I don't know the P.C. Jeffery at all. I haven't seen him before to my knowledge. Emms was a friend of mine until six months ago, when we had a row. I didn't know Emms had been arrested. I haven't associated with anyone since I was in trouble. My last place was at Ingrams & Perkins, in Chiswell Street, about eleven months ago. I do a bit of hawking now. I do work for my sister, who is a hawker. I have been at present address about six months. I am not known as "Ginger Norrey." They may have called me that now and again. I have played draughts. The night before (Sunday) I played draughts. I played a few nights, but can't remember every night I played. It was not unusual for me to play draughts in the evening.

ELIZABETH BAKER, sworn :—

6, Poyser Street. I live in the same place as the Norreys. Norrey came in at 11 and stayed in till 12. We played draughts. He and his sister played two games and I played one with him. Just after 12 I went to bed. I have played with him before. It is a common thing. We played Wednesday and Thursday nights last week. Norrey was there. I don't think I played the week before. We played all the evening on Wednesday night. He was in Wednesday and Thursday night. He was in about six on Thursday night. I sat up till five past one on the Monday night and I bolted the front door. I am on the ground floor. I can't remember every time what time I bolt the door. I didn't know Norrey was wanted till Sunday morning, when his sister told me. I have heard people call Norrey "Ginger Norrey." I don't know what he does for a living.

MARY ANN GIBBONS, sworn :—

6, Poyser Street, married. 22nd October prisoner Norrey was at home at night. He came in at 11. We played draughts—me and him and Mrs. Baker. We often play. He was in till 12 o'clock playing, and went to bed at ten past 12. No one came and told me he was wanted before he was arrested. I haven't seen Emms.

Cross-examined.

I hadn't heard Emms had been arrested. My brother always sleeps at my place. We generally play draughts. I didn't take much notice what time he went to bed on Tuesday or Wednesday. I don't take notice of the time. I had nothing to bring the Monday night to my mind until after he was arrested. Norrey goes out sometimes at night.

Mr. Cluer, the Magistrate, dismissed the charges as against both defendants.

We inquired into the case on December 13th, 14th and 19th, 1906, and on January 29th and 30th, 1907. Mr. Schultess Young and Mr. Livett appeared for Emms, and the police concerned were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

In support of the complaint we heard the evidence of the following witnesses:—Edward Emms, J. Norrey, Mrs. Baker, Mrs. Gibbons, Mrs. Bloom, Mrs. Allen, G. Kemp, Mrs. Hoy and G. Measures. In answer to the complaint we took the evidence of P.C. Jeffery, 369 H, Dr. Clark, P.C. Death, 409 H, P.C. Payne, 285 H, P.C. Wood, 422 H, Sergeant Anderson, P.C. Greenfield, 214 H, P.C. Penny, 366 H P.C. Philips, 363 H, and of Mr. John William Ward and Mr. Thomas John Ward.

The charges against the police in these cases may be thus formulated:—

(1) That P.C. Jeffery, 369 H, without provocation or justification, assaulted and beat Edward Emms with his truncheon, causing him actual bodily harm, on the 23rd October, 1906, at Brick Lane.

(2) That P.C. Jeffery wrongfully arrested Edward Emms for assaulting him (P.C. Jeffery) while in the execution of his duty.

(3) That P.C. Jeffery falsely preferred a charge against Edward Emms of being "concerned with a man not in custody in assaulting" him "whilst in the execution of his duty at Brick Lane."

(4) That in the charge room at the Commercial Street Police Station, when Emms was rising from a chair on which he had been placed, a constable forcibly knocked him back on the chair.

(5) That P.C. Jeffery gave false evidence at the police court in support of the charge.

(6) That P.C. Jeffery maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause commenced and carried on a prosecution against John Norrey for being concerned with Edward Emms in an unlawful assault and battery upon P.C. Jeffery on the 23rd October, 1906.

(7) That Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy were assaulted and violently pushed out of Commercial Street Police Station by one or more policemen.

(8) That Emms was ill-treated in the Charge-room.

General Observations.

This case is of importance (1) because it is the only case except that of Wilson in which complaint is made of the improper use of the truncheon by a police-constable; (2) because it is suggested on the police side that the facts disclosed show the difficulties under which the police discharge their duties in that part of the Metropolis (the H or Whitechapel Division), where they have to deal with an idle and criminal class of persons animated by settled hostility to the police authorities; and (3) because it is suggested, on the other hand, by the complainant, and those who were acting with him, that the case affords a good illustration of the manner in which the police ill-treat men who have become known to them from being, rightly or wrongly, charged with various offences at the police court of the division. In the written notes sent in with the details of Emms' account it is said:—"This case shows that a man 'known to the police' was roughly pushed away by a constable merely because he stopped to look at two or three people who were having 'some words,' and that when the man expostulated after being pushed a second time the constable gave him a knock-down blow on the head with his truncheon and dealt him other blows on the head as he lay on the ground. That when the man recovered consciousness at the station the constable charged him with assault upon himself, and afterwards arrested another man, also 'known to the police,' as an accomplice, who was proved to have been elsewhere at the time. Both charges were dismissed."

We thought it right, therefore, notwithstanding the admitted bad character of Emms, to investigate the affair for ourselves.

Complainant's Case.

Edward Emms' account of what took place on the morning in question, as given before us, was very nearly the same as that which he gave when called for the defence
Q. 23797, &c at the Police Court. He was coming about 25 minutes past 12 through Brick Lane, and as he was going along he saw two or three people round a constable. He was then on the opposite side of the road and crossed the road to them. The constable said to him, "What do you want here, Emms?" He said, "Out of it." He shoved him (Emms). He never went away. He shoved him (Emms) again. He never went away. He shoved him (Emms) again, and then he (Emms) shoved him back, and with that he (P.C. Jeffery) drew his truncheon and knocked him on the head insensible. He (Emms) remembered nothing more until he found himself in the station sitting in a chair. As to what took place then, we give his account in his
Q. 23805. own words: "They sent for a doctor to attend my wounds. I refused to see the
Q. 23808, &c surgeon for the police. I wished to have one outside for myself, but they would not let me; so I refused to be attended by the surgeon for the police . . . . I was in a shocking condition, feeling seriously ill. I fainted. I could hardly sit in the chair. When they refused to let me have a surgeon on my side I got up off the chair, and I was pushed back into the chair again by one of the constables there . . . . A surgeon who was there dressed my wounds. I was charged with assaulting the police . . . . They mentioned a man of the name of Norrey. I had not seen him for over a week."

Q 24199, &c. John Norrey said that he was a labourer, and that he had known Emms before, but had not seen him on the 22nd, and that he was not with him at the time of the occurrence in question, and that he had never seen P.C. Jeffery before. In substance his defence to the charge was an alibi, and he told us that he went home (i.e, 4, Poyser Street), on Monday night, the 22nd October, at 11 o'clock, and sat and played three games of draughts with his sister and a Mrs. Baker, that they finished playing at eight minutes past 12, and that he then went to bed. Norrey, of course, was unable to give, assuming his story to be true, any evidence as to the affray in which Emms became engaged with the police constable. Therefore his complaint is that he, being entirely innocent, was wrongfully prosecuted by the police because of the strong animus which they had against him and because they knew he was acquainted with Emms.

The Police Case.

The answer of the police to these complaints is given, so far as the main question
Q. 25121 is concerned, in the evidence of P.C. Jeffery; and we think it better to give the story as he told it. He told us that he was on duty in Brick Lane about half-past 12 on the morning of the 23rd October, and that when, in proceeding along that street, he came to the Great Eastern Railway bridge, which crosses over Brick Lane, his attention was attracted by two men and a woman who were quarrelling. "Seeing
Q. 25216. the woman crying I spoke to them. I said, 'What is the matter here?' The man
Q. 25133. Emms replied, 'This is my wife.' . . . He said. 'This is my wife. This is my
Q. 25135. brother, and it has nothing to do with you.' I then said, 'If it is your wife, take
Q. 25141. her indoors. Do not keep a woman crying in the street at this hour of the night.' The woman and the man Norrey walked away a few yards. The man Norrey almost immediately returned, and the two men assaulted me, striking me in the face and pinning me to the wall. The man Emms hung on to my throat and knocked the back of my head against the wall. Norrey kicked me just below the left knee, and beat me about the left side of the face and body. An artificial tooth was knocked off the plate, and my whistle and armlet were torn away in the struggle. My lamp was also damaged. I tried to get them to desist assaulting me, and to surrender to me, but they would not, and, finding that I was being overpowered by them, I drew my truncheon. I struck the man Emms a light blow on the forehead. It did not cause him to desist, so I struck him again on the head with the truncheon. The man Norrey ran away to the south, down Brick Lane, and the man Emms released himself from me and ran down Pedley Street, and there he fell to the ground. I followed him and stood over him. In the meantime someone had informed another police constable and he came to my assistance." He said he never recovered his whistle nor his armlet. "My helmet was knocked off and was given to me by a bystander." He told us that the helmet was knocked off at the commencement of the struggle; that P.C. Death was the first constable to come to his assistance; and that afterwards the ambulance came; he walked to the station but Emms was taken on the ambulance. He said he (P.C. Jeffery) was very exhausted, and the station sergeant, seeing his condition, told him to sit down in the inspector's office. He was afterwards attended to by the Divisional Surgeon, and placed on the sick list, and remained on it for some thirteen days. Q. 25147. Q. 25148. Q. 25149. Q. 25150. Q. 25151. Q. 25152. Q. 25153. Q. 25154. Q. 25155. Q. 25156.

Comparing the accounts given by Emms and by the police constable, it is obvious that there is a very glaring conflict of evidence. That P.C. Jeffery was injured, and Emms also, are, as we shall see, facts beyond doubt. The case turns entirely on the view we take of, and the inference we draw from, the oral testimony, and mainly on the question which of these two men is speaking the truth as to the commencement of the affray.

Character of the Parties Concerned.

In considering the credibility of the witnesses in a case of this kind, where two diametrically opposite versions of the commencement of a struggle are given, it is always well to ascertain what characters the parties concerned bear; because though a man of bad character, as we have pointed out more than once, ought not to be treated always as necessarily speaking falsely, still, where his record clearly shows him to have been guilty of dishonesty on many occasions, it is not unfair to treat his evidence with the utmost caution in all cases, and with some special scepticism, where he himself is a party to the occurrence in question, and is not simply giving evidence as an observer.

Whatever may have been the circumstances of the bringing up of Emms and Norrey, or however unfortunate the surroundings of their early lives, it is the fact that they belong to the class sometimes called "hooligans," and that neither can fairly represent himself as one who has simply occasionally committed larceny under the pressure of want, but that they are undesirable members of the community who habitually pass their time without any real effort to get steady employment, and more or less associate together in a highly irregular course of life.

The list of convictions against Emms shows that from 1899 down to August, 1906, he had been convicted ten times for various offences, and been sentenced in each case to a term of imprisonment, the first conviction being for robbery in January, 1899, when he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment with hard labour; and in every subsequent year there were convictions for larceny and allied crimes. In 1902 he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment; in 1903 he was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment; in September, 1904, he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment for assault; in 1905 he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment; and in August, 1906, a few weeks before the occurrence into which we are enquiring, he was sentenced to one month for assaulting his own wife. That constitutes, we believe, the worst record of any witness called before us.

Norrey's record is not so bad, but it is sufficiently serious. In 1905 he was sentenced to eight months' imprisonment for an attempt to steal a gold watch and chain; and in May, 1906, he was sentenced to eight weeks' imprisonment for assaulting a barman at the "Crown" public-house in Brick Lane.

P.C. Harry Jeffery is a young constable who, at the time he was called before us, was in his twenty-fourth year, and he had been fifteen months in the Force. Before becoming a constable he served as a gunner in the Royal Marine Artillery for six years. After leaving the Marine Artillery he had three months' employment as a motor-car driver, and then, after a short interval, became a police constable. His defaulter's sheet is clean, and, so far as we can ascertain, he has, during his somewhat brief experience, given satisfaction to his superior officers. He may, therefore, be described as a man coming before us with a very good character.

The Injuries Received by Emms and P.C. Jeffery Respectively.

If Emms' account of this affair is compared with that of P.C. Jeffery it becomes apparent that not only was Emms in fact close to the spot where the police intervention by P.C. Jeffery for some cause or other first took place, but that P.C. Jeffery and Emms did come into violent personal contact, whichever of them was the aggressor. As a result, both received considerable injuries. Dr. Clark, the Divisional Surgeon, attended to them both at the police station very shortly after the affray had
Q. 25056. occurred. He told us that he found Emms sitting on a chair in the charge room at the Commercial Street police station, and that he objected to having his head dressed by any surgeon except one from outside, because he wanted the Magistrate
Q. 25065. to see his head. After his protest, however, and seemingly without further resistance on his part, Dr. Clark, who had already come to the station to attend to another case, did examine and dress the wounds of Emms. He thus described the result of his examination: "He had a contused wound on his forehead about three-quarters of an inch in length, just at the commencement of his hair; he had another at the back of the head about one and a-half inch in length. They were both lineal wounds in a straight line. He said, further, both wounds were bleeding." Apart from the wounds, he described Emms' condition as being "very excited, and
Q. 25082. talking the whole time, and protesting." He wanted to tell the doctor all about the
Q. 25083. case. The doctor then dressed the wounds, and told the officer in charge of the
Q. 25084. station that he (Emms) was fit to be detained in the cell. Dr. Clark said he had seen truncheon wounds before. He explained that Emms' wounds were not typical
Q. 25077. truncheon wounds. Wounds caused by truncheons were almost invariably "starred," i.e., running in about four directions, whereas each wound in this case was lineal. He
Q. 25097. added, "I do not say they were not caused by a truncheon. They might have been caused by any blunt instrument, or even by coming in contact with the pavement."

He thought that the wound on the back of the head might have been caused by falling on the pavement, and that it was possible the truncheon blow might have been the one on the forehead causing the man to fall, and the wound on the back of the head might have been caused by coming in contact with the pavement.

He added that the wound on the back of the head was undoubtedly the severer, and that what he saw was quite consistent with the policeman and Emms having had a struggle, the policeman knocking him on the forehead with a truncheon, and the man falling and getting a wound on the back of his head. The witness also said that, assuming the wounds were truncheon wounds, judging from his previous experience of that class of wound, they were not delivered with a man's full force.

So much as to Emms' condition when he arrived at the station. Dr. Clark also examined P.C. Jeffery. He found him "in a very exhausted condition, as if he had
Q. 25088. been in a severe struggle. His face was bruised. One of his artificial teeth had
Q. 25089. been broken. He complained of injury to his chest, and to his legs and to his head.
Q. 25090. He presented all the appearance of a man who had been through a severe struggle.
Q. 25091. He had no wounds but only bruises." He put him on the sick list and told him "to
Q. 25092. go home and bathe the bruises with warm water and keep quiet." He saw him regularly for thirteen days, during which he was unfit to go on duty.

The Locality of the Affray.

In order to understand the evidence it is necessary to have a clear idea of the place in which the struggle between P.C. Jeffery and Emms took place. Brick Lane is rather a narrow street running in a northerly direction from Osborn Street (High Street, Whitechapel) to Columbia Market. Proceeding from Hanbury Street northward one comes to the intersection of Brick Lane by Quaker Street on the left, and Buxton Street on the right. Proceeding still northward, the street passes under a bridge which carries the Great Eastern Railway over Brick Lane. About 26 feet or 27 feet before you come to the south end of the bridge you pass on the right Pedley Street. The railway and bridge are about fifty feet wide where the railway crosses Brick Lane, and underneath the bridge there would not be so much light as in the rest of Brick Lane and Pedley Street, because just near the railway, Brick Lane and the beginning of Pedley Street are fairly well lighted, as there are railway lamps which give illumination in addition to the ordinary gas lamps in the street. We have visited the place and observed nothing requiring us to modify the statements just made, which we gathered from the evidence. According to P.C. Jeffery's evidence, he was just under the bridge at its north end when he saw two men and a woman quarrelling, and the latter were standing near a doorway at the south end of the bridge. A plan, which it is however unnecessary to reproduce, was put in showing the necessary portions of Brick Lane and the vicinity.

From the evidence of Emms and P.C. Jeffreys, together with that of the Doctor, we ascertain the following facts :—

(i.) Emms, as the result of the encounter with P.C. Jeffreys, had sustained two wounds on the head—one slight wound on the forehead and another more serious on the back of the head.

(ii.) P.C. Jeffreys admits that he struck Emms twice on the head with his truncheon—once lightly "on the forehead" and a second time on "the head."

(iii.) The wounds were such as might have been caused by blows from a truncheon. The one on the back of the head might certainly have been caused by a fall on the pavement, and it is possible that the one on the forehead might have been produced by such a fall.

(iv.) P.C. Jeffreys was also suffering from the effects of assaults ; he was exhausted ; his face was bruised ; an artificial tooth had been broken ; he complained of injuries to his chest, legs, and head, and though unwounded he had bruises on his person.

(v.) It is not denied by Emms (nor by anyone else) that P.C. Jeffreys' whistle and armlet had been torn away in the struggle.

Evidence of Complainants' Witnesses.

There were called on behalf of the complainants five witnesses, viz. :—Mrs. Bloom, a stallkeeper, in Brick Lane ; Mrs. Allen, a shopkeeper, residing in Bacon Street ; Mrs. Hoy, a married woman, also residing in Bacon Street ; George Kemp, a tablemaker, living in Granby Street ; and George Measures, a carman, and ex-soldier. Unfortunately, even assuming that they are all honest witnesses, their evidence gives us no assistance in coming to a conclusion on the question how the affair began, and no trustworthy guidance as to whether the use of the truncheon was necessary or unduly violent. Measures, whose account differs greatly from that of any of the other witnesses, we believe to be quite untruthful, and we are inclined to think P.C. Clark was right in suggesting he was not on the scene at all, or only there at so late a stage that he saw nothing of consequence. Mrs. Bloom and George Kemp we think were honest in the sense that they tried to give a truthful account of what they saw, but there are such discrepancies or contradictions between what they told us and what they said at the police court, and between their several narratives, that we cannot reconcile them. Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy were thoroughly unsatisfactory witnesses, and we are inclined to think they were making common cause against the police, but however this may be, we do not think it safe to place any reliance on what they said. Mrs. Hoy was not called before the Magistrate, but she admitted she had made a statement to a gentleman concerned in getting up the evidence to be given before us, and that statement contained a story very different from that which we heard in the witness-box. That they were on the spot either just as or just a minute or two after the struggle commenced is probably true, and there are indications from which it may be reasonably suspected that Mrs. Hoy was the woman whom P.C. Jeffreys observed talking with two men when he first intervened. The material allegations hostile to the police to be gathered from the testimony of these persons are that the constable exercised great force in striking the blows with the truncheon, and that he struck Emms after he had fallen in Pedley Street, but the stories are so confused, and on many points so contradictory, that we have no hesitation in finding that they afford no ground at all for deeming those allegations proved.

Still though the accounts of these four onlookers cannot possibly be wholly reconciled, and much of what they said was (obviously to any careful listener) untrue, whether because they intentionally tried to mislead us, or because they were led away by imperfect observation or unduly strong sympathy with a bleeding and suffering man, coupled with faulty recollection, their evidence is not wholly without value. There are some phases or incidents on which all or the majority of the witnesses are agreed.

The following allegations clearly emerge :—

(1) There was a struggle or scuffle between the constable and Emms.

(2) The constable did strike Emms twice on the head.

(3) Some man did "punch" the constable in the face and run away.

(4) Emms did fall down seemingly unconscious in Pedley Street.

(5) The police constable did stand over him (Emms).

For each one of these allegations it is to be observed that there is a basis of fact in P.C. Jeffery's own account. There was a struggle, the blows that he struck were two in number, the constable was struck in the face, and one of the men whom he identified (Norrey) did run away, and Emms did fall down seemingly unconscious in Pedley Street, and P.C. Jeffery did stand over him. There is a sense, therefore, in which it may be said that the witnesses on behalf of Emms to some extent corroborate P.C. Jeffery's account of the events. The difference between him and them is as to the order in which the incidents occurred. If they occurred, as he says, we think there can be no doubt whatever that he was justified in using his truncheon. If he is mistaken as to the exact place at which he used the truncheon, and in fact in the struggle with Emms he had really got further from the railway arch than he imagined, even into Pedley Street, and it was there that the two blows were really given by him, it does not seem to make any substantial difference to his case. If the final struggle with Emms took place in Pedley Street and not at the point which P.C. Jeffery thinks, if he was justified in using the truncheon at all he was justified in using it there just as much as where he believes he did use it ; and we are not by any means certain that it is not a mistake on the part of P.C. Jeffery as to where his truncheon was used which has principally contributed to the conflict of evidence in this case.

The Police Case.

Turning now to the Police case we find that, as in many others, the only witness on that side who can speak as to the crucial incidents is the policeman himself concerned, namely P.C. Jeffery. We have summarised his account above, and we need only add that while the circumstances make it quite possible that he is mistaken as to various details, we think that the story he tells is one that has every mark of truth. According to Emms' story, P.C. Jeffery's interference with him and the truncheon attack were wholly unprovoked. P.C. Jeffery's story, having regard to the character of Emms and Norrey, is one that seems probable enough. Whether P.C. Jeffery was wise or not in interfering in the altercation that was going on when he got under the railway arch, in the course of his beat, simply because a woman was crying, may be open to question ; but his doing so, coupled with the fact of his being isolated in a lonely and dark place, may well have annoyed men already hostile to the police, and only too glad to get what they deemed a safe opportunity to pay off old scores. That P.C. Jeffery sustained injury is certain ; and that he lost his whistle and his armlet is certain. The evidence on Emms' side does not explain these facts, nor does Emms' own statement.

The other constables who quickly came upon the scene do not give very material assistance, but so far as their accounts go they all tend to confirm the accuracy of P.C. Jeffery's version. P.C. Clark, being informed by some stranger of what was going on, immediately ran into Pedley Street, a distance of two hundred yards. He found

P.C. Jeffery leaning against a hoarding in an exhausted condition, and asked him what was the matter. P.C. Jeffery said, "I have been assaulted by this man (pointing to Emms lying on the ground), and Ginger Norrey; Ginger Norrey has got away." P.C. Clark then went down on his knees with the intention of rendering first aid to Emms, if necessary. He raised Emms' head from the ground, when he (Emms) said "I will make some of you f———g well sit up for this." Another man that he (the constable) knew by sight said "Guvnor, here is his wife, let her have a look at him." He said "Certainly." With that the woman stepped forward and said, "Let me take him home, will you?" P.C. Clark said, "That is impossible, he is in custody now." With that P.C. Clark raised Emms to his feet and asked him if he would walk to the station. Emms said "No," and threw himself down again, and was in a reclining position against the hoarding when the ambulance arrived. The constable then helped to put him into the ambulance, and he was taken, as we know, to the station. P.C. Clark was certain that no woman touched him (Emms) during the time that he was there, and he was positive that Measures did not do so, and, in fact, that he was not there at all, so far as he knew, and did not help Emms on to the ambulance. Q. 29977

The effect of course of P.C. Clark's evidence is to show that P.C. Jeffery was suffering himself, and that Emms' condition was not so serious as he and his witnesses would lead us to believe; and indeed it tends to confirm the suspicion which we strongly entertain, that Emms' statement to us that he was unconscious and remembered nothing from the time he received the first blow till the time he found himself in the station is false, though we have very little doubt that he was for a short time stunned.

The evidence of the other police witnesses is not material except that it throws great doubt on the accuracy of the complainant's witnesses on some of the later incidents described by them.

The Case Against Norrey.

We now come to consider the evidence bearing upon the charge made against Norrey.

The question raised by the prosecution of Norrey is simply one of identity. No substantive evidence was called by that complainant tending to disprove the statement of P.C. Jeffery as to the origin of the affair. Of course Norrey himself could not consistently with the denial which he made that he was the man with Emms on this occasion give any evidence as to the commencement of the matter. His case is that he was not present at all, but that he was at home and in bed at the time when this occurrence in Brick Lane and Pedley Street took place.

Like Emms, Norrey is a man with a bad record, but until comparatively recently he was leading an honest life. But we have also the information that he had known Emms intimately for eight years, though he denied that he was one of the Harding gang, or associated with Harding or his gang at all, and alleged that he had quarrelled with Emms some eight months ago. He did not deny the previous convictions alleged against him, though we were not very well satisfied with the way in which he answered Mr. Eldon Bankes' questions in reference to them. There is nothing to suggest that Norrey was a man who had taken to drink, and whatever the circumstances which may have led him into evil ways he seemed to have been a man who had been acting with his eyes open. Upon the whole, without allowing ourselves to be unduly prejudiced by his bad record, we were not favourably impressed with him as a witness, and thought him a person quite capable of telling deliberate lies. The defence that he set up to the accusation made by P.C. Jeffery was an alibi which we will examine presently. Q. 23867 Q. 24289 Q. 24293

P.C. Jeffery, as appears from the account given above, named Norrey as one of the two men whom he found under the railway bridge with the woman, who was crying. He said that he had never spoken to Norrey before the night in question, but that he had been pointed out to him by a police officer on duty in Brick Lane "as being 'Ginger' Norrey, one of the gang that hang about that neighbourhood," and that he had seen him on and off during twelve months. In reply to Mr. Dickinson he said that when he on the evening in question got up to three persons he recognised him, and that the two men were standing in the full Q. 26414 Q. 26415 Q. 26396 light of the lamp at that end of the bridge. The effect of this evidence therefore is that the constable had ample opportunity of seeing the features of the two men to whom he spoke, and there seems no reason whatever for doubting that P.C. Jeffery was acquainted with Norrey by sight and knew him under the name of Ginger Norrey, which appears to have been a nickname often applied to him.

Further it is shown by the evidence of P.C. Death, who was the first constable to arrive upon the scene when Emms was lying in Pedley Street, that when he
Q. 26694 spoke to P.C. Jeffery the latter replied "I have been assaulted by the man who is lying on the ground and Ginger Norrey, who has run away." Moreover, P.C. Clark also asked him what was the matter, and P.C. Jeffery replied "I have been
Q. 29977 assaulted by this man," pointing to Emms lying on the ground, "and Ginger Norrey has got away." Again, immediately upon arrival at the station P.C. Jeffery
Q. 30171 told Inspector McMillan that he had been assaulted by the man they were just moving on the ambulance, and that Norrey had escaped. P.C. Payne told us that
Q. 26962 he heard P.C. Jeffery say to the station sergeant "Ginger Norrey is the man we want besides this one we have here." P.C. Payne then said to the station sergeant (Station Sergeant Anderson) "I know him," and thereupon P.C. Payne went out immediately but saw nothing of him that night.

Furthermore, early on the morning of the 23rd October P.C. Jeffery made an entry in his notebook before leaving the station, which he did in accordance with regulations applicable to the case of a constable who has used his truncheon. This entry must not be confounded with the formal report which he made on the 31st October, and is an entry made practically at the time of the occurrence in the course of his ordinary duty, to which he was entitled to refer for the purpose of refreshing his memory, and in that entry he says he "saw an altercation between two men and a woman. The woman was crying. P.C. (i.e., himself) spoke to them and requested them to go away; whereupon one man, not in custody, whom I know as Ginger Norrey, struck me a violent blow in the face. . . . Norreys kicked me on the left knee and struck me on the chest and body. . . . Norreys then made good his escape." This entry was undoubtedly made at the time, as it is initialled by his superior officer on the 23rd October. The words "Ginger Norrey" were clearly written right off at once, as they are not interlineated and cannot have been subsequently interpolated. We think no importance can possibly be attached to the addition of the "s" to the name of Norrey on the second and third occasions where the name occurs quite naturally in the course of the brief narrative. Proceedings were thereupon taken against Norrey, and a warrant was issued by the magistrate on the 25th. The slight delay in the issuing of the warrant appears to have been due to the fact that the consent of Scotland Yard was required to the proceedings.

The Suggested Alibi.

Q. 30391 &c. Norrey was arrested on Saturday, the 27th, by P.C. Greenfield, 214 H, under circumstances which he described as follows: P.C. Greenfield first saw Norrey, the person described in the warrant, whom he knew, in Virginia Road, and he immediately went towards him in order to arrest him, when Norrey dodged round and ran up Mount Street. The constable ran after him for eighty or ninety yards, when Norrey fell down, but got up. The constable told him he was going to take him into custody for assaulting a policeman the other night in Brick Lane. Norrey said "What policeman?" The constable replied, "You know as well as I do." "He then said 'I am innocent and can prove an alibi.'" The constable then arrested him and took him to the station and read the warrant to him there. He made no reply. Norrey gave a slightly different account of the conversation between him and P.C. Greenfield, but, in the view we take of the matter, the difference is not material.

Norrey's story is that he was back at his home, 4, Poyser Street, a little before 11 o'clock on Monday the 22nd, that he played two or three games of draughts with his sister Mrs. Gibbons and his sister's friend Mrs. Baker, who lives in the same house, and that he went to bed at midnight or a few minutes after, and that he did not again leave the house before morning. If that statement is true it is of course a complete answer to the police case, and P.C. Jeffery must be mistaken in thinking that Norrey was the man who was with Emms under the railway arch. Mrs. Gibbons and Mrs. Baker were called before us, and confirmed with many details the account given by Norrey. We have considered their evidence, and compared it with what they said before the Magistrate. We see no reason to doubt that they and Norrey occasionally played draughts together, but in our opinion their statements that they did so on the particular Monday on which the affair in question occurred are not proved to our satisfaction, even if we take the favourable view that they did not come before us with a deliberately concocted story.

A strong point against the truth of the alibi is, we think, afforded by Norrey's own conduct. Norrey told us positively that until he was arrested he knew nothing whatever about the affair; he did not even know that a constable had been assaulted, or that Emms had been injured in Brick Lane, nor did he know that anyone had mixed his name up with the affair, and he was ignorant of the fact that there was a warrant out against him. Nevertheless the moment Norrey saw P.C. Greenfield in Virginia Street he dodged round and ran up Mount Street, and then some 80 or 90 yards off fell down. We entirely disbelieve his obviously invented allegation that he was running because he heard shouts of "Fire," and regard his attempt to escape as showing that he was telling a lie when he told us that he knew nothing whatever about his being wanted by the police.

Upon the whole we have come to the conclusion that Norrey was the man with Emms upon that occasion. If so, the question whether he was guilty of assaulting P.C. Jeffery must depend upon the view we take of that constable's evidence. Norrey, therefore, must stand or fall with Emms.

Summing up of Case as Between P.C. Jeffery and the Complainants.

We are now in a position to consider the case broadly, and, but for the fact that so experienced a Magistrate as Mr. Cluer dismissed the case both against Emms and Norrey, we should have very little hesitation in deciding that Emms' account of the origin of the struggle between him and P.C. Jeffery is incorrect, and that the intervention of the police-constable was justified. We start, with some facts which are ascertained. P.C. Jeffery was undoubtedly knocked about a good deal, his whistle was taken away or lost in the struggle, and his armlet was torn off; and, if Emms' account is true, these injuries were received before he came upon the scene, for, except as to the blow given while he was standing in Pedley Street over the prostrate Emms, of which he says nothing, there is no evidence whatever that Emms or anyone struck the constable, and the "blow" or "punch" spoken to by some of the witnesses cannot have been the only blow received by the constable. As to Emms' injuries there is no dispute. He had two wounds, and one, at any rate, bled a good deal, though neither of them was of a serious character. According to Emms, he became unconscious, and remained unconscious after receiving the blow until he came to in the police station. According to the evidence of some of the witnesses favourable to Emms, that cannot be true, because they saw him raise himself up after he had been felled to the ground, and P.C. Death and P.C. Clark are positive that he spoke after they came into Pedley Street. Whether, however, Emms was or was not unconscious as long as he says seems to be of no consequence, so far as the question we are now discussing, namely, the origin of the affair, is concerned. There is no doubt at all that he received two blows on the head with the truncheon from the constable. The accounts of Emms and of P.C. Jeffery agree as to the place where they first came into contact. It is common ground between them that this was just under the railway bridge on the opposite side of the road from Pedley Street, which runs out of Brick Lane a few feet south of that point, and also that when P.C. Death came up Emms was lying in Pedley Street a few feet from the corner.

What we now have to ask ourselves is, How did the affray commence? According to Emms' story, he saw two or three people round the police-constable. In his examination-in-chief he said nothing at all as to what the people were doing, or whether there was any kind of altercation going on between them and the constable, and it was not very obvious why his attention should have been attracted to the group on the other side of the road. But in cross-examination he informed us that Qs. 23945 the police-constable was called a name, "and one chap was pulling another chap 23946 away." Again, he told us that the constable was standing "with his back against the 23947 wall and three or four chaps—I think there were some women too—standing there."

Q. 23951 Later he said that when he crossed the road and got to the place there were seven or
Qs. 24000 eight people there, and he thought he noticed Mrs. Allen, but would not be sure. The 24004 seven or eight people he said were not close round him—'standing round him."
Q. 24009 Then he crossed over, and then the constable said, "What do you want, Emms?"
Q. 24014 and so on. Now, if that is so, the constable's action appears to have been one of a very silly and unnecessary character. We are asked to believe that a constable standing with seven or eight people round him, one of whom is pulling another man away, and calling the constable by some improper name, simply because Emms came up, singled him, the new arrival, out for attack. It is difficult to see what motive is suggested for this course. Besides the total absence of motive for the police-constable interfering with Emms, one cannot help noticing that it is odd that if this account is true, not one of the seven or eight persons who were around the police-constable, and who must have heard his inquiry of Emms, and seen the commencement of the affair by the pushing of Emms three times, have been called before us unless, indeed, Mrs. Allen was in fact standing there at the time, though, if her evidence is true, she was not. We have had quite a considerable number of people who speak to the remainder of the affray, but not one of them says anything about its commencement. If Emms' story is true, what became of the seven or eight people? His account gives no explanation whatsoever of their disappearance from the scene.

When critically examined, Emms' account of the origin of this matter is very unconvincing in itself, and, when examined in the light of all we know about the case, it seems to us to show that there was a woman, possibly though not certainly, Mrs. Hoy, with Emms on the occasion, and, if so, to some extent Emms' own story lends assistance to the police-constable's account.

Let us now turn to the police-constable's version of the origin of the affray. It seems to us to give a reasonable enough cause for the commencement of the affair. There is nothing improbable in the circumstances that two men and a woman were talking, and that the woman was crying, and though we are not at all sure that, even according to his own account, P.C. Jeffery displayed much prudence, still his intervention was natural enough under the circumstances, as the woman was crying; and perhaps when P.C. Jeffery has had more experience he will not be so susceptible
Q. 26322 to a woman's tears. Having spoken to them, and being told by the man, who turned
Q. 26323 out to be Emms, "This is my wife," he was preparing to walk away on his beat when he was at once assaulted, though he found it difficult to say which of the men
Q. 26295 struck him first. He was rather pressed in examination by the Chairman as to why he interfered, and he explained that, knowing the man Norrey, he thought they might be up to some mischief with the woman, so, as she was crying, he asked what was the matter. He would not admit that his conduct was in the least degree provocative; and when he got the answer, "This is my wife," he quite properly did See White Book, p. 215 not interfere further. In taking that course it should be observed he was acting in strict accordance with the regulation that "The police are not to interfere between a man and his wife who are quarrelling unless it is absolutely necessary."

Upon the whole, no successful attack was made upon any of the details of P.C. Jeffery's story, nor was anything brought out which tended, according to our thinking, to discredit his character or his story.

There is one criticism which we think may be directed against the story as told by P.C. Jeffery, and that is that it discloses no adequate motive for the assault on him. P.C. Jeffery does not suggest that there was any personal motive directed against himself for the assault, but he asks us to believe that the reason simply was that these two men took advantage of the loneliness of the spot, the lateness of the hour, and the isolation of the constable, to revenge themselves upon the police. That habitual criminals and good-for-nothing young men who spend their time in loitering about the streets in the intervals of visits to various public-houses and other resorts should dislike the police as a body, and even conceive hatred for individuals among them is quite natural, and there is very good ground for our thinking that this is the case with the more or less organised groups of such persons as exist in this part of the East End. Both Emms and Norrey, and Harding and others, whom we find to have been more or less associated with them during the past few years, for the most part are not men who have been guilty of one or two offences for which excuse might be found by the temptation of an immediate and pressing poverty, but they are men of considerable intelligence who seem to have received a good elementary education, and who, though they occasionally do a day's work, rely chiefly, or at any rate, very largely, upon the profits obtained by larceny committed in combination for their means of livelihood; and as we think too, they are the misleaders of youths at the critical stage between boyhood and full manhood. The conditions of life in this part of London are such as to make it difficult for the high spirits of youth to find, as they can find in the country, an adequate outlet for their natural expression. The young people there are practically forced to spend long hours and long evenings in thoroughfares where they are exposed to the influence, and perhaps inspired by the example, of older men who have fallen into a settled and criminal course of life. The consequence is the formation of what the tradesmen called before us described as "gangs," which come to be associated more particularly with the name of some individual, generally one who has been in collision with authority; and, in estimating the value of the explanation given by P.C. Jeffery of this assault upon him, one ought to take into account the condition of things which has been shown to exist in the neighbourhood of Brick Lane. We see, under all the circumstances, no improbability whatever in thinking that these two men, Emms and Norrey, seized an opportunity of humiliating a constable by a sudden attack under circumstances which seemed pretty favourable both for its execution and for escape from its consequences.

The conclusion that we have come to is that the story told to us by P.C. Jeffery is true, and, that being so, that he did not, under the circumstances, use more force than was necessary in defending himself against the attack of Emms and Norrey.

Complaint of Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy.

This conclusion, however, does not finish our enquiry in this case, because it appears that Mrs. Allen when called as a witness at the Police Court said that she went to the station and saw Emms in a chair. "A young woman said she would like to speak to him. The Inspector came and threw us both on to the pavement and we fell." The statement of this alleged ill-treatment of Mrs. Allen and her companion attracted attention, and police reports were called for upon the subject; but the Inspector and the constables who reported on the matter were unable to throw any light upon it, though one and all denied that any such treatment had been accorded to any of the visitors to the police station upon the morning of the 23rd October.

The hearing of this complaint took a long time; but, fortunately, as the allegations against the police were whittled down by Mrs. Allen, the more trustworthy of the two complainants, to an accidental slip on the steps of the police station, and practically withdrawn, we need not go into the evidence.

We do not believe that Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy went right into the station together at all. Mrs. Hoy was evidently very much interested in Emms, and Mrs. Allen, too, appears to have been very greatly upset by what she had seen. We think it by no means impossible that mingled curiosity and sympathy may have led them to walk to the police station. Sergeant Anderson told us that a person getting on to Q. 30305. the station doorstep could see right into the charge room. We have visited the place, and find it is possible that if Mrs. Allen and Mrs Hoy got as far as the station steps and looked into the charge room, they may have seen Emms as they described. If so, it is possible that they may have slipped on the steps when they attracted the attention of a constable at the door, and that he ordered them off, and that here we may have the germ of what developed into a wholly inaccurate story. We are however, quite satisfied that the complaint made by these two women of ill-treatment by the police at the station is wholly unfounded.

Emms' Complaint of Ill-treatment at the Police Station.

Emms, in the statement sent in to us, in addition to his main complaint of the wholly unjustifiable assault by P.C. Jeffery complained that he was ill-treated in the charge room. The initial account that he gave, however, is somewhat weak, as it seems to us, as a basis for a charge of that kind. He said, "They sent for a doctor
Q. 23805. to attend my wound. I refused to see the surgeon for the police. I wished to have one outside for myself, but they would not let me; so I refused to be attended by the surgeon for the police. . . . . I was in a shocking condition, feeling seriously ill. I fainted. I could hardly sit in the chair. When they refused to let me have a surgeon on my side I got off the chair, and I was pushed back into the chair again by one of the constables there."

In cross-examination he gave a fuller account. He said "I told them I was willing to pay for the doctor myself, as I did not want to be attended by the divisional surgeon." He added "I said I wanted to see a doctor. That was as much as to say I would pay for it myself." He then in answer to Mr. Eldon Bankes said: "The divisional surgeon came. He did not ask me to allow him to examine me at all. As he walked into the room I got up off the chair and I said 'I do not wish you to attend to me; if I cannot have a doctor myself I will go in front of the Magistrate as I am.' One of the constables got hold of me by my two shoulders, and put his knee in my stomach, and forced me down." He was positive that the constable put his knee on his stomach.

The only other evidence besides the police evidence as to the treatment of Emms in the charge room is to be found in the evidence of Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy, who, during the alleged visit which we have just discussed, gave with still greater fulness an account of Emms' condition and how roughly he was treated whilst sitting in the chair, and so forth. For reasons which already appear we ignore the evidence of the two women upon this point entirely. P.C. Wood was called, and he told us that no violence was used to Emms except, of course, that he was placed in the chair by P.C. White because he got out and refused aid of any description.

Dr. Clark, who was present during the time at which the alleged use of the knee was suggested, as well as the police-constables present, denied that Emms was improperly kneed in the stomach or forced back into the chair with any undue violence.

We think there can be no doubt whatever that Emms was treated with all consideration under the circumstances, and that, assuming that it was right to force upon him the attention of the divisional surgeon, nothing improper at all was done. We were not quite satisfied as to what action ought to be taken when a prisoner who is injured obstinately refuses to allow the divisional surgeon to attend to him, and, in order to obtain the view of the ordinary constable on the matter, P.C. Wood was asked, after he had told us that Emms had to be put into the chair by force, why he had to be forced into the chair, and he replied, "For the purpose of
Q. 27131 the doctor dressing his wounds." He was then asked whether Emms was objecting to having his wounds dressed, and he answered, "He did decidedly object. He
Q. 27132 said, 'I want to go before the Magistrate as I am.' I said, 'You cannot go before the Magistrate as you are; you must have your wounds dressed.'" We then asked him,
Q. 27133 "Who told you to make that statement to him. What superior officer was present?" He replied, "The doctor wanted to dress his wounds, and we had to see that he was in the chair. It was necessary for him to be put in the chair, under the light."
Q. 27134 Then we said, "Your view is that he was bound to be put in the chair for the purpose of
Q. 27136 being examined by the doctor and having his head dressed by the doctor?" and he replied, "Yes." After further questions he said, "No one told us to use force to place him in the chair, but we knew he had to have his wounds dressed, and we know that all prisoners have their wounds dressed. It is no uncommon occurrence at Commercial Street police station to hold a prisoner in the chair to have his
Q. 27137 wounds dressed." We then called attention to the statement in the White Book. "If prisoners are insensible from drink or any other cause, or appear to be ill or injured in any way, although they do not complain, the divisional surgeon is to be sent for immediately." In answer to the subsequent questions it appeared that P.C. Wood did not act under the orders of the divisional surgeon, but upon his own initiative, and that that was according to the regular practice.

The regulation in the White Book, though explicit enough as to the necessity of sending for the divisional surgeon in such a case as that of Emms, does not seem to provide for the case of a refusal by a prisoner, nor to contain any direction or caution to constables as to the course they are to pursue where a prisoner objects to having his wounds attended to. We are not at all certain that the police authorities or the divisional surgeon have the right to give surgical attendance to a prisoner who objects to assistance being given. It appears that at the time when the doctor dressed his wounds the charge had not been taken, and therefore at that time the prisoner was technically only in the custody of P.C. Jeffery who had arrested him, so that then no Q. 30263 prison regulations which may lawfully apply to the case of a prisoner once placed in a police cell, or in one of His Majesty's gaols, appear to apply to the case. It is only necessary to add here that we are quite satisfied that, assuming the police concerned had the right to insist upon Emms submitting to having his wounds dressed, no other force was used than was absolutely necessary to make him sit down in the chair, and that the force so used was not of a kind to give any or to increase any pain from which he was suffering or in any way to injure him.

Reverting now to the charges formulated against the police in this case we answer them in the following manner:—

(1) P.C. Jeffery did not without provocation or justification assault and beat Emms with his truncheon, but Emms and Norrey, without justification, assaulted and beat P.C. Jeffery, who used the truncheon in self defence and without more force than was reasonably necessary to defend himself against his assailants.

(2) P.C. Jeffery was justified in arresting Emms and causing him to be conveyed in an ambulance by other constables to the police station.

(3) P.C. Jeffery did not make any false charge against Emms, but rightly charged him with being concerned with a man not in custody in assaulting him whilst in the execution of his duty at Brick Lane.

(4) Emms while rising from a chair on which he had been placed in the charge room, was compelled by force by P.C. Wood, another constable, to sit down on the chair for the purpose of having his wounds attended to by the divisional surgeon, but the force used was not such as to cause any additional pain to Emms, or to injure him in any way.

(5) P.C. Jeffery did not give false evidence at the Police Court in support of the charge against either Emms or Norrey.

(6) P.C. Jeffery did not maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, commence and carry on a prosecution against John Norrey, but on the other hand Norrey was jointly guilty with Edward Emms of an assault and battery on that police-constable.

(7) The complaint of Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy is quite unfounded.

(8) The complaint by Emms that he was ill-treated at the Police Station is quite unfounded.

XV.—RILEY'S CASE.

James Riley, of 21, Loudoun Street, Wapping, aged 21, complained of misconduct by P.C. Mizen, 134 H, on the 21st November, 1906, and we heard his complaint on the 28th and 29th January, 1907. The complainant was represented by Lord Russell, and the police concerned were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

The written statements sent in by or on behalf of this complainant agree in substance with the evidence which he gave before us, and, though he represented himself as being wrongly charged with being drunk and disorderly and making use of obscene language at Old Gravel Lane, the real burden of his complaint is that he was improperly assaulted by P.C. Mizen while on the way to the station.

His story, shortly put, as appears in the evidence before us, is as follows: Riley, on the 21st November, 1906, was having a dispute in Old Gravel Lane with another man whose name he does not know. It was about ten minutes past 11, and he was having a row with him, and while it was going on a constable whose number he had forgotten but whom he identified as P.C. 134 H. (i.e., Mizen) came up and laid hold of him, and as he was taking him he took him about ten yards away from the other man, and then another constable came up and the two of them took him down Prusom Street. He identified the second man as 332 H. (i.e., P.C. Thomas Kemp). They were taking him down Prusom Street when P.C. 134 H, who was on the right hand side hit him with his right hand, which caused him to fall to the ground in a dazed condition. He dragged him about 200 yards. The constables were dragging him along and each had hold of him by each arm. He was in a dazed condition and could hardly stand. They let him sit down for a while and gave him a rest on the pavement for about ten minutes, and then they took him to the station. There, before he was charged, he complained to the Inspector about his eye. The Inspector said, "Sit down." and the prisoner then sat down on a chair. The doctor was sent for and when the doctor came he bandaged his eye. The doctor then said, "Walk up and down." He walked up the room straight first but as he was coming back he happened to make a slip, and the doctor said to him, "You are drunk." When the doctor came Riley said, "You might let that constable go out of the room." He said, "Why?" Then Riley said, "He will hear what I say to you, and what you say it is. The constable will say the same thing." The doctor said something about that it could be done by a fall, and then the constable said in the presence of the doctor that it was a fall. Riley said to the doctor, "No, it was a punch," and the constable said it was a fall. The doctor asked him what he had had to drink. The prisoner told him that he had had a kola (a mineral water) about 11 o'clock. He further asked him if he was drinking any beer in the afternoon. The prisoner admitted that he had had a couple of glasses. The Inspector charged Riley with being drunk and disorderly, but the prisoner said he had no time to make any answer to the inspector. He told us, to use his own words, "They bunged me down too quick." He was not bailed out till seven in the morning, as the police would not allow bail before that time. Riley further said that a brother had come there in order to bail him out, but the authorities told him to come early in the morning. He was not informed of the fact that his brother had come until he was released at 7 o'clock. Later in the day the case was heard before Mr. Dickinson at the Thames Police Court. The two constables already mentioned gave evidence against him, and as the defendant complained that he had been assaulted by the police, the magistrate remanded the case to the Saturday then next following, and on that day the hearing of the case was concluded, and the magistrate convicted Riley and fined him 2s. 6d. and costs.

Charge No. 4 Without Warrant.

J. MONK, Chief Inspector for Superintendent.

The following is a copy of the Notes of Evidence taken at the Police Court:

22nd November, 1906.

Alfred Mizen, Police-constable 134 H Division, sworn, states:—At 11.30 p.m. yesterday, the 21st instant, I saw the prisoner in Old Gravel Lane, drunk. He was quarrelling and behaving in a disorderly manner. He was violent, and he threw me down.

Cross-examined:—I did not hit you in the eye.

By the Court: He may have got his black eye in struggling or beforehand.

Thomas Kemp, Police-constable 322 H Division, sworn, states:—I saw the prisoner and Police-constable 134 in a crowd. Prisoner tripped the police-constable up, and they struggled on the ground. Prisoner's eye was swollen then.

Defence.

Edward Sweeney, 6, Whitehorn Place, E., labourer, sworn, states:—I saw the Police-constable 134 H strike the prisoner in the eye, knocking him against the wall. Prisoner was going quietly between the two police-constables then. I was passing only.

Richard Sanders, Inspector H Division, sworn, states:—I was in charge at Shadwell Police Station at 11.45 yesterday. Prisoner was brought in by Police-constable 134 H on a charge of drunkenness and of using obscene language at Old Gravel Lane. He was drunk. He had an injury to the right eye, and I called Dr. Grant, who asked him how he got it. Prisoner said "The policeman did it." Prisoner denied drunkenness. Dr. Grant in prisoner's presence said he was drunk.

I asked the constable if he could account for the injury. The police-constable said he found the prisoner quarrelling with a man, that he used obscene language, and wouldn't go away, and he (the police-constable) took him into custody. He said, "He may have had the injury at the time, or it may have been done after his arrest. On the way to the station going through Prusom Street opposite Chopping's Court the prisoner tripped me and tried to get away and we were on the ground when the other constable came to my assistance." The constables great coats were mud all over.

Remanded 24th November, O.R. 40s. Free.

24th November, 1906.

Police-constable 322, H Division, recalled, sworn, states:—The prisoner lay flat on his face on the ground and the police-constable was on his knees just raising himself up. Police-constable 134 and I took him to the station. The tripping up was in Prusom Street. I saw only two lads and a little girl at the corner of Clegg Street. I saw no other soul. A crowd afterwards followed. The prisoner went very quietly to the station after we had sent for the ambulance. I did not strike him. I did not see Police-constable 134, strike prisoner.

By the Court: Prisoner was not struck in my presence that I know of. He was not struck in my presence.

Re-examined: I did not come up before the prisoner and Police constable 134 were on the ground. I was about 30 yards from Prusom Street when I saw the crowd. The large crowd first attracted my attention.

By the Court: The large crowd was in Old Gravel Lane. I went through the crowd. The police-constable and the prisoner were a little way down Prusom Street. The crowd did not come down Prusom Street.

Again cross-examined and questioned by the Court: The first I saw of the prisoner and Police-constable 134 was turning the corner of Old Gravel Lane into Prusom Street. I was in Old Gravel Lane. The crowd was five or six yards from the corner between me and 134 and prisoner. I got round the corner into Prusom Street and saw the tripping up. The prisoner was going quietly around the corner. The prisoner and Police-constable 134 had got 10 or 12 yards down Prusom Street when I got round the corner. They were then on the ground. Afterwards the crowd followed up.

By the Court: I was on duty in Old Gravel Lane. My attention was called to the crowd. I looked and saw Police-constable 134 with prisoner in custody. I walked up, passed through the crowd, and went to the corner of Prusom Street. The crowd followed me to the corner. Then I saw 10 or 12 yards away, P.C. 134 and the prisoner on the ground. The others couldn't see I don't think. I was several yards in front of the crowd. Clegg Street, where the two boys and the little girl were, was about seven yards beyond P.C. 134.

P.C. 134 H Division, recalled, sworn, states:—He was very drunk and using obscene language. He was not fighting but quarrelling. I arrested him between Green Bank and the "Angel" public-house in Old Gravel Lane, right opposite Prusom Street. There was a crowd when I arrested him. I took him down Prusom Street. About 90 or 100 yards down Prusom Street he tripped me up. He was very violent. P.C. 322 H came to my assistance. When prisoner tripped me up, there were two lads and a little girl standing opposite at the corner of Clegg Street. The crowd remained at the top of Prusom Street, in Old Gravel Lane. I and Police-constable 322 got him up and took him to the station. He went quietly. I did not strike him at all. I saw no one strike him. I first noticed his eye when we picked him up, after we had struggled on the ground. He said nothing about his eye on the way to the station.

By the Court: When I first saw him he was drunk, quarrelling with two other men and using obscene language. The other two men went away. There were 30 or 40 people there, including children. It was about five yards from Prusom Street, just across the road, when I took him. Police-constable 322 was about 20 yards down Old Gravel Lane, and came towards me as I arrested prisoner. He did not come quite up to me, but I saw him coming. I did not wait, because the prisoner went quietly. None of the crowd followed me. He went very quietly to a dark place where there was a dark court on the left down which he tried to escape. I did not look back to see if P.C. 322 followed me. There was nothing to draw my attention to the two lads and little girl before the struggle. I struggled with the prisoner about two minutes before P.C. 322 came up. I did not strike him. I couldn't say if he had a mark before I arrested him or before the struggle. I saw no mark. I noticed it when we got up.

Cross-examined by Prisoner: I went to the ground. My coat was mud from top to bottom.

Re-examined: Clegg Street from the corner of Gravel Lane is a matter of 90 yards.

Richard Sanders, Inspector H. Division, recalled, sworn: Evidence read—no question asked.

Charles Graham Grant, Divisional Surgeon, sworn, states: I was called on the 21st of November instant at 11.50 p.m. to see defendant. He had an injury to his eye, and I said, "Have you had a fall?" It presented that appearance to me more than any other. He said "I want the police-constable to leave the room before I reply." I said "There is no reason why you shouldn't say what you have to say before the police-constable." Prisoner said "He hit me with his fist." I applied a cold water compress. It was an ordinary black eye. My first impression was that it had been a fall. There was a small lacerated wound near the nose, as if some hard substance had impinged upon it there. The injury was not one I should have been called to in the ordinary way. I told the prisoner to remove the bandage next morning. He has it still. He has his reasons no doubt. I saw the policeman's coat. It was covered with street debris, mud and dirt. He denied he'd had any intoxicating liquor and said he had had only one glass of kola. He was drunk.

By the Court: The injury could have been caused by a blow from the fist, or from falling in the struggle.

DEFENCE.

James Riley, 21, Loudoun Street, labourer, sworn, states: On the 21st of November between 11 and 11.30 p.m. I was quarrelling with a man outside the "White Swan." I had not been in there. I had been in the "Angel" close to the "White Swan." Police-constable 134 came up and laid hold of me. The other came up and laid hold of me. They marched me down Prusom Street. Just before Clegg Street the constable (134) hit me in the right eye with his right fist. He was on my right hand side. The blow knocked me down. While I was on the ground the other police-constable said "Go and get the ambulance." Constable 134 said "No, this is my man." When I got up they dragged me about 200 yards, and when I had a little rest I got up and went quietly with them to the station.

Cross-examined: The two officers arrested me almost at the same minute, and both took me down Prusom Street. It was about 170 yards down Prusom Street I was knocked down. Constable 134 gave no reason for striking me. I wasn't drunk. The last drink I had was a kola. That was about five minutes to 11. I had a couple of drinks before that about 7 p.m. I had had nothing intoxicating for four-and-a-half hours. The doctor certified me drunk because I was dazed. I stumbled, being dazed. The doctor must have made a mistake.

By the Court: I was quarrelling over sixpence I owed the man and couldn't pay him. I can't make out why he didn't take the other man. There was no reason why two constables should take hold of me.

James Shepherd, 76, Prusom Street, labourer, sworn, states: On the 21st of November, about 11, I was coming home from a concert. I was with another chap and we went down Chopping's Court, going from Old Gravel Lane into Prusom Street. When I was in the court I heard a bit of a rush. I looked up and saw P.C. 134 hitting prisoner. He hit him in the head about twice and in the ribs about three times. I went and told the constable they ought to be ashamed of themselves hitting a man like that. The prisoner fell to the ground after they hit him. Constable 134 who hit him went to the ground. They picked the man up and dragged him. I told them they ought to let him rest, but they dragged him along on his knees. I followed as far as my own door.

Cross-examined: I don't know prisoner personally. I've met him at football matches, but never drank with him or mixed with him. The constable, hitting him (the prisoner) caused the bit of a rush. The constable may have hit him more. It was more than once he hit him. I saw no more than that; I didn't know I could go to the police station. I was only there once before. I was then a witness for the police. I suppose Constable 134 went to hit the prisoner, missed, and fell. I don't know otherwise how he fell. I wasn't here last Thursday. Last night I was first asked to come.

By the Court: Prisoner and the two constables were just this side of the court. Only me and the other chap were there. I didn't see any other people in the street. The police-constables and the prisoner were walking when I first saw them. Prisoner seemed quiet to me. I cannot say how far he'd been quiet. The other constable had hold of him. The one who struck prisoner was on the right hand side. Thomas Tree was with me. He's a carman at work to-day.

Edward Sweeney, recalled, sworn, states:—I only saw the one blow. I was coming from Whitehorn Place, a turning out of Prusom Street. Whitehorn Place is about two minutes' walk from Chopping's Court. It was further from Old Gravel Lane than Chopping's Court. The blow was struck just by Chopping's Court. I was walking towards them. The crowd was behind the police-constables, very nearly on top of them. I noticed the crowd before I noticed the prisoner. I was about 20 yards from the prisoner when I noticed him first. He was on one side (the side where Chopping's Court is) and I was on the other. He was between the two constables. He was walking quietly. The constable on prisoner's right hand side struck him. I was about 20 yards away. I had only just noticed him as the blow was struck. I saw no blows struck after that. I turned round and went home. I didn't want to get mixed up in it, having read many cases in the papers of bystanders getting mixed up.

Cross-examined : I first saw the crowd and then the police-constables with the prisoner. The police-constables and the prisoner were on the footway. The crowd was all over the place, in the road, and on the pavement. The crowd was just behind the police-constables. The crowd was not between me and the police-constables. The blow knocked the prisoner against the wall and then he fell. Next morning the prisoner asked me to come up. I can't say if the police know me. I have been charged for drunkenness. I was sent to prison for ten days in 1903 for assaulting the police. I was fined 21s. or 14 days for assault six years ago. I had six months hard labour at Maidstone. I was innocent. The charge was assault and attempt to steal. I'm as fair for the police as for any other man.

2s. 6d. or one day.

We are satisfied that the conviction of the prisoner by Mr. Dickinson was entirely just. We have considered all the evidence bearing upon the actual circumstances of the arrest, and are of opinion that there is no reason whatever for doubting that P.C. Mizen was right in apprehending the prisoner and in making the charge against him at the police-court. The only substantial complaint made by Riley is that he was in the manner described by him assaulted by being struck with the fist in the eye, and afterwards dragged for about 200 yards with unnecessary violence on the way to the station.

The misconduct alleged in this case may thus be formulated :—

(1.) That P.C. Mizen while taking Riley to the police station at a little after 11 p.m. on the 21st November, 1906, assaulted him by striking him in the face with his fist.

(2.) That P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp used unnecessary violence in taking Riley to the police station on the same night.

(3.) That P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp gave false evidence at the police court by denying that P.C. Mizen had struck Riley as above-mentioned.

As above indicated, the only point of interest in this case, and as to which there may be any reasonable doubt, is whether the black eye which Riley had undoubtedly sustained when he arrived in the charge room was caused by P.C. Mizen or otherwise, and also whether that constable and his colleague, P.C. Kemp, behaved cruelly and caused unnecessary pain to their prisoner by dragging him 200 yards after he had received a blow from P.C. Mizen. There can be no doubt that the arrest was fully justified. It ought at once to be said that Riley was a person of bad character. He had been previously convicted, and he gave us no satisfactory information about the way in which he earned his living. As we have had occasion to mention before, the bad character of a prisoner ought not to be an element in his treatment by the police. The same fairness and the same careful avoidance of unnecessary force or pain should be observed in the case of persons of Riley's class as in that of any other citizen. We do not propose to summarise the evidence in the case, because it is a comparatively simple one. It is only necessary to say that the fact that the injury to the prisoner might have been caused on the way to the station when he was in custody threw on the police the burden of supplying all the information which they could give upon the matter.

The case turns mainly on the view we take of the credibility of the witnesses who took part in or saw the struggle in Prusom Street, near Choppin's Court. We are of opinion that Riley and Sweeney are quite untrustworthy ; but we believe the evidence of P.C. Mizen to be substantially true. P.C. Kemp seemed to us honestly trying to give a true account of what he saw and of the part he played in the affair; but there are discrepancies in his story as told before us and his evidence at the Police Court, and we cannot attach the same weight to his testimony as we accord to that of P.C. Mizen.

Q. 29273 Dr. Grant, the Divisional Surgeon, was called by telephone to Shadwell Police Station at ten minutes to 12 on the night of the 21st November, and then examined Q. 29277 Riley. He found a contused right eye, and an abrasion under the same, close to the nose, within three-quarters of an inch from the nose, and that he was intoxicated. Q. 29283 There was no injury to the eye itself. It was, in his opinion, "a common black eye." The doctor made an entry in the Occurrence Book as usual, which reads as follows: Q. 29292 "I attended at 11.50 p.m. to see James Riley suffering from right contused eye; intoxicated, fit to be retained." He also stated that in his opinion, though the injury might have been caused by the fist or elbow in the course of a struggle, it was in fact caused by a fall, and that his opinion was to some extent based upon the fact that there was an abrasion close to the nose, and under the eye. We have visited the locality and walked from Old Gravel Lane where Riley was arrested into and up Prusom Street to the corner of Choppin's Court and Prusom Street. The court is a way for foot passengers only, and a post is placed in the centre of the way just where it runs into Prusom Street. A few feet further on Clegg Street turns off to the right. It is not disputed that the struggle between Riley and P.C. Mizen took place close by where the court and the street meet, and we could not help concluding from our observation that it was a place very well adapted for an attempted escape. If Riley had in fact succeeded in getting clear of the constable it would have been easy for him to baffle a pursuer in the numerous adjoining narrow streets and courts. We noticed, too, that owing to a bend in the street P.C. Kemp, unless at the time the struggle began he was very near, could not have seen its commencement.

According to the complainant's account P.C. Mizen's attack on him was entirely unprovoked. No motive whatever is disclosed for the constable's suddenly knocking him down when they reached Choppin's Court; and if not only P.C. Mizen but P.C. Kemp had him in custody at that time the alleged action of the former becomes still more improbable. On the other hand, P.C. Mizen's story of the beginning of the struggle, namely, that Riley suddenly tripped him up and tried to get away, is by no means improbable, having regard to the fact that Riley was considerably the worse for liquor and the favourable aspect of the place. It is clearly proved that both P.C. Mizen and the complainant fell to the ground, and that is a circumstance of which the latter's version of the affair affords no explanation. We have no doubt that in truth Riley did, finding himself alone with P.C. Mizen, suddenly trip him up with a view to escape, and that a violent struggle then occurred which ended with the advent of P.C. Kemp and the overpowering of the prisoner. The latter constable, in the proper exercise of his discretion, had followed P.C. Mizen and his prisoner in order to satisfy himself that the latter was going quietly; but he was so far behind them when Riley made his attempt that the bend in the road prevented him from seeing the actual commencement of the affair. If he had been a little more quick in his movements it is probable that nothing unusual would have happened. However, this may be, a struggle did ensue, and we think it was during its continuance that Riley received a blow which gave him "a black eye." It is not possible to determine with certainty whether the injury was sustained by Riley's face coming in contact with the post in Choppin's Court, the corner of one of the adjacent houses, the edge of the pavement, or some uneven projection in the road, or else simply by a blow from P.C. Mizen's fist. Having regard to the existence of an abrasion near Riley's nose, we are inclined to think the last is not the most probable explanation. P.C. Mizen does not admit that he intentionally struck any blow with his fist, and we see no reason to conclude that he did so. In any case he used no more force than was necessary to prevent his prisoner from escaping, and Riley brought his injury on himself by his own unjustifiable assault on his captor.

With regard to the charge of unnecessary violence after the struggle was over and P.C. Kemp had come up, it is only necessary to say that, with the main allegation made by Riley, it falls to the ground. In sending for the ambulance the constables behaved perfectly properly, and there was no necessity at all for their endeavouring to force Riley to walk if he was not in a fit condition to do so, and therefore there was no reason for dragging him along in the way Riley alleges. We are satisfied that the constables behaved with all due consideration to the prisoner on the way to the station.

In this case no question arises as to the propriety of the proceedings in the charge room. We however desire to express our opinion that Sub-divisional Inspector Sanders Q. 29437 ought to have mentioned in the entry in the Occurrence Book the fact that the prisoner alleged to him that P.C. Mizen had caused the injury to his eye. No doubt Riley was drunk and it is often impossible to take a note of all the things persons in that condition may say. The matter must be left to the discretion of the officer taking the charge. In this case, however, the fact that he had sustained a black eye was obvious and necessarily appeared in the Occurrence Book from the doctor's entry. P.C. Mizen's statement as to the way in which the injury may have been caused is Q. 29577 included in the entry and the prisoner's counter-statement ought to have appeared in order that a superior officer examining the entry might be apprised of the fact that Riley had made a definite accusation against the constable. In omitting to make this clear in the entry the Inspector does not, however, seem to have neglected any definite rule in the White Book, and we do not suggest there was any intentionally improper concealment of a relevant fact by him.

The result of our inquiry into this case is therefore as follows :

(1) P.C. Mizen did not, while taking Riley to the police station at the time in question, assault him by striking him in the face with his fist.

(2) P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp did not use any unnecessary violence in taking Riley to the police station on that night.

(3) P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp did not give false evidence at the police court when they denied that P.C. Mizen had struck Riley as above-mentioned.

XVI.—GAMBLE'S CASE.

George Gamble complained that on Tuesday the 21st August, 1906, at about 1 a.m., when he met a woman called Ethel Griffiths in a street leading from Brick Lane, in the Whitechapel district, a constable, whom he identified as P.C. Ashford, 207 H, in abuse of his authority ordered him to move on, molested him, and assaulted and kicked him in such a way that he sustained grievous bodily harm, namely, a rupture of the urethra.

In this case there were no police court proceedings. As the result of injuries received in the early morning of the 21st August, Gamble had to go into the London Hospital, and remained there until the 21st November. While he was in the hospital his case was brought to the notice of Mr. Timewell, the secretary of the Police and Public Vigilance Society, through a fellow patient, and he wrote down a statement of the way in which he had received his injuries, which was put in and handed to us. Upon leaving the hospital Messrs. Radford and Frankland were instructed by Mr. Timewell to write a letter dated the 23rd November, 1906, to the Commissioner of Police. The letter was in the following terms: "Dear Sirs,—We have just been instructed in the case of George Gamble, and we think it right to lay the facts before you in order that the case may be investigated by the authorities. Our client has been in hospital since the assault complained of and is not yet recovered, but it is proposed to issue process against the police constable complained of as soon as he is able to attend. The facts are shortly as follow: On the 21st August in this year in Spelman Street, Whitechapel, George Gamble was speaking to a woman named Ethel Griffiths at about 4 a.m. when, after some conversation, the constable knocked Gamble down and kicked him several times while on the ground. The constable is stated to be aged about 30, with a ginger moustache, and to be numbered 207 H. George Gamble in consequence of his injuries was taken to the hospital, where he has since been an in-patient. We are your obedient servants, Radford and Frankland." The letter was duly acknowledged and certain steps were taken in the matter on behalf of the Chief Commissioner to which we refer more particularly below. No proceedings were in fact taken by Gamble, but the case was brought to our notice and a written complaint setting forth the facts deemed to be material was laid before us.

We heard the case on the 20th, 21st, and 28th February, and the 4th and 5th March, 1907.

Lord Russell appeared for the complainant, and Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C. and Mr. R. D. Muir appeared for the police concerned.

The complaints made by Gamble may be thus stated:—

(1) That P.C. Ashford, 207 H, while on duty, wrongfully interfered with, molested and finally assaulted and beat the complainant in such a way as to cause him grievous bodily harm, namely, a rupture of the urethra.

(2) That the complaint made on his behalf to the Chief Commissioner was not attended to with such reasonable care and thoroughness as he had a right to demand on the part of the Chief Commissioner.

The first and principal question in the case is whether P.C. Ashford was guilty of the misconduct alleged.

We will first summarise the account given by George Gamble of what happened to him during the early morning of the 21st August, and then state the evidence of P.C. Ashford.

George Gamble is a labourer, who, in August, 1906, was living at the Victoria Home in Commercial Street. He told us that after having been to the "London"

Theatre he was going home when about 1 a.m. he met a woman named Ethel Griffiths, who stopped him and asked him if he was going to have a "short time." While they were speaking, a constable came up and said, "Go on; come out of this," and "You are after no good with the likes of this." The witness said, "All right, there is no hurry," and walked steadily on. Ethel Griffiths stopped with the constable. Witness went on and had got half way up the street, of which he could not give the name, though he knew it led from Brick Lane, when Ethel Griffiths caught him up again and said, "What do you think yon policeman wanted to do? He wanted to go in and have a short time with me, and take me round the corner and have a short time with me." The witness said, "Did you go?" and she replied, "No, no fear." She had hardly said those words before the constable, who had followed her up, caught him (witness) up. The constable said, "You are not out of it yet." The witness replied, "I was going." The constable said, "You are after no good." The witness said, "Why?" The constable replied, "You ought to be ashamed of yourself." The witness said, "It is not for me to be ashamed." He said, "You ought to set a better example to the woman, instead of asking her to go round the corner with you." Ethel Griffiths was there with him while this conversation was going on. The constable followed him up, and kept trying to tread on his heels, and shoving him all the time up the street, "and then when I kept walking on he would get in front of me and try to stop me from walking on." Both of them were talking during this time. The constable was going on and saying that he would take him down to the station. Witness said if he (the constable) did he should certainly report him for wanting to have connection with the woman. The witness did not notice anyone in sight at this time, and he used no bad language because he thought the constable was trying to "rile" him, and "to make me strike him." The constable followed him up and kept dancing in front of him, as he said, and trod on his heels, and shoved him, and finally the police constable knocked him down, and started kicking him between the legs. He said the constable was by the side of him walking up the street when he knocked him (the complainant) down. He witness kept walking all the time, and the moment he went walking on he (the constable) "kept dancing in front of me and tried to stop me." The witness, after being knocked down, got up and went away and the constable followed him half way up the street, and caught him up and knocked him down again, and started giving him "some more boot." While he (witness) was on the ground, and before he got up to the top of Brick Lane a sergeant stood at the top of the street talking to some man, but he (witness) could not see who the man was. He first saw the sergeant after the constable had knocked him down the second time. He (witness) was on the ground before the sergeant came up. The sergeant stood there and said, "That is enough—you have done enough to him." Witness could not say anything, but only shouted. He heard the sergeant telling him to stop — "You have done quite enough." The constable did not stop for a little while. The sergeant said, "Get up and fight him like a man." When the police constable stopped kicking him they left witness there, and he walked steadily to the wall the best way he could, because he had not started swelling so much and did not feel the effects of it. He said the constable walked away and left him as he was. The sergeant never came near him, and he (witness) could not say whether he walked away or not. He managed to get up by himself and walk to the place (seemingly Victoria Home) and then a boy and Ethel Griffiths helped him to the hospital the best way they could. He went down to the Victoria Home because he thought of going in and going to bed, but he found he was gradually swelling, and it took him a long while to get down there—he "was swelling that bad, and was in terrible agony." The swelling was between the legs where the kicking had been. The boy's name was Wiltshire, as he had found out since. At that time he had never seen him. Wiltshire being called into court, the witness identified him as one of the two boys who took him to the hospital. He thought it was between 2 and 3 o'clock when they got him to the hospital. He remained in the hospital until the 16th November, and then was for twenty-six days in a convalescent home at Swanley. The witness said that he could identify the constable, but not the sergeant. He had not seen the constable since he came home except on that morning (i.e., the morning on which he was giving evidence) when he saw him pass him outside the court. On the suggestion of Mr. Eldon Bankes and the Chairman all the constables who were on the beat near Brick Lane on the morning of the 21st August were called in with their helmets on and in uniform, as well as a sergeant in uniform. The witness was then asked if he could identify the constable, and, having looked at the con-

Q. 37529 &c. Q. 37542, &c. P.C. Ashford, 207 H, told us that he had been in the force for six years on the 18th March, 1906, and that he was a married man with one child. He remembered being paraded for duty on Monday night, the 20th August. At that time one hour's leave was due to him for having been present at the reading of orders. Upon being paraded that evening he asked Station Sergeant Anderson, who was parading on night duty, to grant him the hour in the course of the period then commencing, and he was told that he could come off at 5, that is to say, one hour before the period Q. 37556 of duty would, in the ordinary course, have ended. He was posted on the night of the 20th August to No. 10 and No. 11 beats of the second section of the H division in charge of Sergeant Sheedy. No. 10 and No. 11 beats joined together form nearly a parallelogram, not quite rectangular. The area covered is bounded on the north by Buxton Street, on the south by Hanbury Street, on the west by Hunt Street and Spelman Street, and on the east by Vallance Road. It was explained in the course of the hearing before us that when, owing to absence of men on sick leave or for other causes, there was a shortage, it was not unusual to post one man on two beats in the Q. 37562 same section. P.C. Ashford stated that he did not go off these beats at all during the Q. 37549 to 37554 time he was on duty on the night of the 20th, and on the morning of the 21st, until at 5 o'clock, as arranged, he left duty and reported himself at the police station in the ordinary way. He said that he met his sergeant (Sheedy) several times as Q. 37564 Q. 37572 usual. Nothing unusual occurred during the night. He did not know Gamble, Qs. 37565 37566 37569 37570 although he knew Ethel Griffiths by sight, but he had never spoken to her, and did not see her that night. He denied the meeting with them as alleged, and also the alleged assaults and misconduct in Osborn Place and Spelman Street; and said Q. 37575 &c. that the first mention he heard of the story was from Inspector Hewison in the latter part of November. In answer to a question from the Chairman he thought Q. 37579 &c. Q. 37845 that in the course of his duty that night he went over the two beats about six times altogether, but he had no note which would show where he was at any particular hour.

That is the substance of P.C. Ashford's answer to the complaint, and, with the exception of Sergeant Sheedy's, is the only evidence on the police side that amounts to a direct and personal contradiction of the complainant's statement.

Gamble's account was confirmed by Ethel Griffiths, the woman who was with him when the constable, as alleged, first came and interfered with him, and a number of other witnesses were called who spoke to seeing some of the incidents which go to form the complainant's story; and some of them identified P.C. Ashford as the constable who was ill-treating the complainant. However, before shortly summarising their evidence, it will be well to see what portion of the complainant's case is undisputed.

The medical evidence can hardly be impugned. Dr. Walter Brinsmead Billinghurst was in August, 1906, the house surgeon at the London Hospital in Whitechapel Q. 35019 &c. Road to which Gamble was taken early on the morning of the 21st, and was admitted under a mistake, the circumstances of which are explained below, under the name of Pearce and not that of Gamble. His name was so entered in the book at the hospital, and it was under that name that Dr. Billinghurst knew him there. The doctor was not on duty on the night of the 21st and so he did not see him until 10 o'clock in the morning. When Gamble arrived at the hospital he was taken to the Receiving Room.

Dr. Robert Stanton Woods, the house physician, was on that morning what is Q. 36488 &c. known as the "Receiving-Room Officer," and he was called to see a patient in the Receiving Room between 5 and 6 in the morning. He saw the patient in the Q. 36496 &c. Receiving Room and treated him in the wards until the house surgeon could see him. He found the patient was sufficiently ill to justify his being taken in, so he admitted him, and he went up to see the house surgeon and asked him if he would like him to treat him (complainant) for the time being, and the house surgeon said, "Yes." Nothing was said about the man's name, and Dr. Woods was unable to identify Gamble as the man, but there can be no doubt that it was Gamble whom Dr. Woods in fact saw and treated. He found, on examination of the patient, that there was a large blood swelling between the buttocks and the perineum. The doctor gave him morphia and prescribed a cooling lotion for the perineum and passed a catheter. He duly reported to the house surgeon, and that was the only time at which he attended the patient. The patient was conscious when he first saw him, and also in the wards. In the Receiving Room the patient said that during the night he had been in the company of a woman, that a policeman had come up, and, to the best of the doctor's recollection, that there had been some dispute with regard to the woman, and the policeman had knocked him down and kicked him. That is all the doctor could recollect. So far as he saw there were no other injuries, and the appearance of the injury was consistent with it having been caused by a kick, though it could have been caused by any extreme violence in that region, but not simply by falling down. There was no abrasion, and the doctor thought that if he had fallen sufficiently violently on a sharp point there would have been some abrasion of the skin.

Q. 36504 Q. 36505 Q. 36507 &c. Q. 36511 Q. 36513 Q. 36518 Q. 3 :519 &c.

Dr. Billinghurst saw Gamble (or Pearce, as he knew him) at 10 o'clock in the morning. He found the patient in great pain. The main cause of the trouble was a large hæmatona of the perineum and difficulty in passing his water. He had been relieved to a certain extent when he (Dr. Billinghurst) came in. It was necessary then to give him relief, but there were no other injuries about the body; there was swelling of the perineum, and the patient was in great pain then, and his water was taken off, and he was relieved to a certain extent. He was quite sober, and there was no sign of his having been drunk. He became steadily worse and the swelling enlarged, and it was necessary to operate on him, and it was then discovered he had ruptured the urethra. The first operation was performed on the night of the 21st; there was a second operation performed on the 24th, and a third one on the 31st. An artery in the urethra had been ruptured. The complainant was in the hospital until the 16th November, when he was sent to a convalescent home, where he remained for three weeks or a month. The injuries were, in the opinion of the doctor (Dr. Billinghurst), extremely serious, and were undoubtedly due to direct violence on the perineum. They were quite consistent with kicking. It would have to be a kick between the legs, and the legs must be open at the time the kick was given. The injuries were not consistent with mere slipping in the street or falling down unless he fell on something hard between the legs—a fence or anything of that sort; the injury could not have been sustained by falling down ordinarily. In the doctor's opinion the complainant is permanently damaged. There is no doubt that at the time when Gamble came to the hospital he was suffering from a rupture of the urethra, which could only have been caused by the application of extreme violence between the legs on the perineum.

This fact being ascertained, let us see how far the other witnesses confirmed Gamble's account that his injuries were sustained by a kick given by a policeman, who was in fact P.C. Ashford, 207 H.

The principal witness in the sense of being the one who saw most of what is alleged to have happened between Gamble and the constable is Ethel Griffiths. She described herself as living at No 2, Flower and Dean Street, and it may here be said at once, though it only came out later in her examination, that she was a married woman who had come to London two years before and had taken to prostitution as a means of livelihood. She said that she remembered meeting Gamble one night in August between two and three o'clock. It was opposite some chapel down by Osborn Place, but she could not remember the name of the street; it was opposite some chapel or a school. There was nobody else in the street but Gamble and herself and the constable. She had known the constable before, as she was often about in that part of the world. The constable came up to her and called her on one side from George (i. e., Gamble), and he asked her if she would come across the road to speak to him, but she refused to do so, so she left the constable and went back to George. The constable was on the left side of the road, opposite the chapel on the pavement, though she said immediately afterwards that he was "in the middle of the road." The constable called her on one side. She left George on the pavement and went close up to the constable. He asked her if she would go to a certain place with him, and she refused. She knew what he meant. She went back to George and told him what the constable had asked her. Gamble had then walked on about five minutes walk from where they had been standing. It took her nearly five minutes to catch him up. The constable followed her. She walked after Gamble and left the constable. When she came up to Gamble she told him what had Q. 33521 happened. The constable came and stopped them again. He (the constable) was

Q. 33522 alongside of her—a few steps behind her. Gamble told him (the constable) what she
Q. 33523 (the witness) had told him and said he ought to be ashamed of himself. One word
&c. brought up another and there was a bit of an argument. During that time they were walking on. She said that when she caught up Gamble she was in a street turning into Osborn Place going towards Brick Lane, because she was going towards Brick Lane when they met the constable. She and Gamble were walking in the middle of
Q. 33527 the road. The constable told her to go one way and George to go the other. She
Q. 33528 said "No, we are both going to Brick Lane, and we will go together,' and the Q 33530 constable followed them. She could not exactly remember what Gamble
Q. 33535 and the policeman were saying to each other. She supposed the argument was
Q. 33538 about her, because she would not leave George to go with him (the constable),
Q. 33539 and there was a bit of a "niff" about it. The constable did nothing
Q. 33542 except talk until he got outside Osborn Place, and "then he pushed George, &c. and he fell on the pavement." There were some few people standing by at that time. Two of them she knew. Mr. Hughes was one whom she knew, but she could not tell the name of the other young man though he was one of the
Q. 33549 witnesses there. When George had fallen down there was a fight between the
Q. 33550 constable and him, and the constable kicked him and knocked him about. She saw the constable kick him, and went in between them. The constable kicked him
Q. 33551 about the ribs and the back. Then a sergeant came on the scene. He came from the Qs. 33552 top of Brick Lane opposite the "Bell" public house. It was in Osborn Place, a few 33554 steps from the "Bell" public house, that Gamble fell down. Being asked from which
Q. 33556 way she had come into Osborn Place before it (seemingly the quarrel) happened, 33557 she said she turned by Vallance Road to come up to it first of all, and came into
Q. 33558 Osborn Place not from the Brick Lane end but from the other end. She could not
Q. 33559 remember the name of the street she had come from before she got into Osborn
Q. 33560 Place. The sergeant was standing outside the "Bell" public house talking to
Q. 33562 another constable, she thought. He came on and stopped the constable from kicking
Q. 33566 Gamble. Gamble got up on his feet and went across the road, and the constable
Q. 33567 followed him. She did not know what happened in the next street. Gamble walked
Q. 33569 as quickly as he could in the direction of the way in which they came away from Brick &c. Lane. The sergeant did not do anything except to tell her to go home, and she walked
Q. 33574 away. She did not remember any conversation by the sergeant while the constable
Q. 33577 was kicking Gamble. Gamble and the constable turned "to their own right." When
Q. 33585 Gamble turned the corner he fell. She then went into Osborn Place into White-
Q. 33586 chapel in order to see what had happened to Gamble, and she saw him standing outside
Q. 33589 the Victoria Home. She found him there about a quarter of an hour after she had
Q. 33592 parted from him. He was by himself. She asked him how he was. He said he
Q. 33595 was not able to walk. She asked two young men if they would help her to take him
Q. 33596 to the hospital, and they said Yes, they would come with her. One of the young
Q. 33599 men was with her. The other was standing outside the "Princess Alice" public-
Q. 33600 house. Being asked whether Gamble told her anything about what had happened
Q. 33601 since she had seen him, she replied that he told her the constable had kicked him,
Q. 33602 and he was not able to move. He said that it was worse than the first time. He could
Q. 33604 scarcely walk at all. They took him to the London Hospital. She thought they got there about four o'clock, but she could not be positive as to the time; it was just breaking daylight as she got there. She did not go in with Gamble, but the two young men did. She stayed at the door.

The next witness, and, next to Ethel Griffiths, the most important one, was a Q. 34342 young man named Joseph Wiltshire, who lived at 19, Brick Lane. Wiltshire earns his
Q. 34344 living as a newsvendor, and was seventeen years of age when examined before us. He told us that he earned his living by selling newspapers in the streets in the City, and that he began his work about one o'clock in the day, when the evening papers began to come out, and he usually remained in the City until midnight. He generally walked home from the City, and often was very late. As I gather, the common
Q. 34354 lodging-house in which he lived had an entrance in Flower and Dean Street as well as one in Brick Lane. Wiltshire told us that he was standing outside the lodging-house in Flower and Dean Street between two and three a.m., on the 21st August,
Q. 34352 when he heard "a man's screams." He rushed up to Brick Lane, and saw a man
Q. 34358 lying on the ground and a constable leaning over him. That was outside the lodging-
Q. 34360 house in Chicksand Street within a stone's throw of Brick Lane. Every time he went to get up the constable hit him and kicked him. He heard a sergeant say, "Let him alone; he has had enough." He knew the sergeant's number 5 H. The man was on the ground about five minutes after witness came up. After getting up the man ran down Chicksand Street with the constable after him. When they got near the school the constable kicked him again, and witness saw him fall. The witness said that he saw Ethel Griffiths, whom he knew by sight only, there. He and she then walked round the other way to try and find out whether the man was hurt or not. They went by Brick Lane, Montague Street and Whitechapel Road, and when they him found was leaning up against the wall at the Victoria Home, and another man whom he had not seen since was standing there too. He and Ethel Griffiths helped Gamble to the hospital. Nobody else helped. The witness went into the hospital with him (the complainant) and took charge of his clothes. It was about 6.30 when he came out. They got to the hospital about an hour after he first heard the man screaming. When this witness's evidence is looked at in connection with the sectional plan put in it will be seen that if he was, as he says, standing at the entrance to the lodging house in Flower and Dean Street, and then rushed into Brick Lane and went down the lane to the point at which Osborn Place runs into it, it is quite possible that he could have seen such an occurrence as he describes in Chicksand Street; but, seeing that he says that he saw the man lying down on the ground outside the lodging house in Chicksand Street, it would seem that he is in error in using the term "Chicksand Street," and that what he meant to say was that the man was lying outside the lodging house in Osborn Place. Chicksand Street runs into Osborn Place, and the lodging house referred to is situate in Osborn Place, and not in Chicksand Street. The discrepancy between this witness's evidence, therefore, and that of Ethel Griffiths and others as to where the man was lying down on the ground before he got up and walked or ran off followed by the constable is only apparent, and not real.

We had, in addition to Wiltshire's testimony, that of five other witnesses who speak to the incidents which they observed and which seem to be, if the evidence be true, connected with the alleged assault upon Gamble. The evidence of Mrs. Franks and Mr. Rubenstein must, however, be separated from that of the other three witnesses, Hartnett, Brager, and Hughes, because the former relates to what they saw in Spelman Street, while the latter relates to what the witnesses saw in Osborn Place and Chicksand Street.

Mrs. Franks, who lived at 28, Spelman Street, was in bed on the morning of the 21st August, when she was awakened between 2.30 and 3 a.m. She heard someone groaning, so she opened her window, which looked out into Spelman Street, and saw a figure lying there and over him was standing a policeman, and when she looked she saw the policeman kicking the man. She was asked how far from her window the policeman was, and she replied: "From about here (the witness box) to where you are standing," i.e., about two yards. Asked whether she heard the policeman say anything, she said that she heard the man say to the policeman, "Will you let me alone?" and the constable said, "I will give you some more if you do not get up and go away." The policeman saw her looking out and he soon went away. He turned away so that she could not get the chance to see him. The policeman was kicking the man in the stomach. She did not notice whether the man was lying on his back or face because "the policeman was standing covering him like." The policeman went off when he saw her looking, she went and looked out, and the man tried his best to walk away. He staggered away a little and she went in. The man walked off down Spelman Street towards Hanbury Street. 28, Spelman Street, she said, was about a second's walk from Chicksand Street. There are three or four houses from Chicksand Street to 28, Spelman Street. She told us that she could identify the policeman if she saw him. At first sight it seems a fair observation to make upon this witness's evidence that this occurrence in Spelman Street cannot be the second assault described by the witness Wiltshire, who said that, after getting up in Osborn Place, the man ran down Chicksand Street, with the police constable after him, and that when they got near the school the police constable kicked him again and the witness saw him fall. From where Wiltshire was standing he could not have seen the man fall actually in Spelman Street, or have seen the constable kick the man in that street; but No. 28, Spelman Street is only three houses from the corner, and it is to be noticed that Ethel Griffiths said that when, after the assault, at which the sergeant was looking on,

Q. 33586 Gamble got up and walked the way they (i.e., Ethel Griffiths and Gamble) had come, he turned the corner and fell. That corner was, we should infer, the corner of Chicksand Street and Spelman Street and, if Gamble fell forward into Spelman Street, Mrs. Franks' evidence does not seem to be in contradiction with that of Ethel Griffiths or Wiltshire. If Gamble was kicked as described by Wiltshire, and the kick was given as he was turning the corner, he may have fallen forward into Spelman Street. If so, the relative positions of the constable and the man would be those which Mrs. Franks described. The importance of Mrs Franks' evidence is due to the fact that it is the evidence of an obviously respectable and perfectly intelligent person, who speaks to something as to which she could hardly be mistaken. Such an incident as that of being awakened in the middle of the night by groans, and finding a man lying in the road with a policeman standing over him, is one not easily forgotten, though perfect accuracy as to details cannot be expected. There seems to be no reason for doubting the good faith of this witness, and her manner in the witness box impressed us very favourably. As to the identification of the constable, she tells us nothing helpful, but unless we reject her evidence as a mere invention, we may take it as an ascertained fact that a constable was in the small hours of the morning of the 21st August kicking a prostrate man in Spelman Street.

Q. 35493 &c. Isaac Rubenstein, who lived at 25, Spelman Street, was called before us with a view of confirming Mrs. Franks' statement. He was a very aged person, and seemed extremely confused and nervous. He only spoke Yiddish, and was examined through Mrs. Franks, who was sworn as interpreter. The substance of the evidence that Rubenstein gave was of very small value as to any details. It only came to this, that he looked through his window some time during the night in question, Q. 35497 &c. though he could not say what the time was, and that he saw a man lying on the area, and saw a constable next to him there, and saw people standing there, and Q. 35501 that he heard the man groan and cry. There seems no reason to doubt the honesty of his testimony, so far as it goes, except that there were some indications that the witness was not speaking so frankly as he ought to have done owing to a timidity that suggested fear of some ill consequences that might result from his appearance Q. 35546 before us. Mr. Gordon, a member of the London County Council, was good enough to send us a letter in which he enclosed one that he had written on behalf of Isaac Rubenstein, to which Rubenstein had put his mark. The substance of the latter letter was that Rubenstein had received the summons from the Commission, and that he considered it must have been sent to him by mistake as he knew nothing about the police, and had had no dealings with them, and he hoped that he might be excused from attendance on account of his being over 85 years old; but the witness in the box before us said that he had never put his mark to the letter which was shown him. The matter does not appear to be of any importance except that it suggests that the witness might have told us more about what he saw, if for some reason he had not deemed it prudent to be reticent. The evidence of the other three witnesses, Hartnett, Brager and Hughes, relates to what they observed in Osborn place. They all three are men who were in August, 1906, living at the common lodging-house referred to above, and some of the windows of which open into Osborn Place.

Q. 35556 &c. James Hartnett said that on Tuesday morning of the 21st August, between three and four, he heard a woman screaming and a man holloaing. He looked out of the window, and saw a constable kicking the man. There was a sergeant there as well. He saw the man on the ground, and the constable was telling him to get up. He only saw him kicked as he was getting up; it was in the lower part of the back Q. 35570 of his body. The sergeant told the constable to leave him alone. When the sergeant told the constable he had done enough to him, the man ran down the street, and the Q. 35572 woman tried to follow, but the sergeant got into the middle of the road and barred the way. The next morning he saw a lot of blood smeared all over the pavement Q. 35575 outside where the man was lying. He identified Sergeant Sheedy, 5 H, out of four sergeants who were brought into Court before us. He was sleeping in a room on the Q. 35591 &c. first floor with several other men in the room. The window looked right over the scene of the assault. Brager got up, too. The witness also said that he saw the Q. 35730 man get up and the constable kicked him as he got up. He went down the street towards Chicksand Street. The witness watched them until they got by a kind of bend opposite the school. Hartnett's statement as to the pavement being smeared with blood, a fact not mentioned by either Gamble or Mrs. Griffiths, strikes one as prima facie an exaggeration or invention damaging his credibility, but it was subsequently explained that Gamble's nose bled, though not directly in consequence of any blow. The incident seems therefore immaterial in any respect.

George Brager, who described himself as a dock labourer, said that he lived at 1, Osborn Place in August, 1906. He remembered that about four o'clock in the morning he awoke and heard a man holloaing out "Let me alone." He looked out of the window, and he saw two constables standing over a man. One was a constable and one was a sergeant. He heard one say, "Get up and face me like a man." The man was on the ground. He was just getting up on his hands and knees. The constable said, "Go on," and the man ran down the street, and he (the constable) ran after him. He saw no more of them. He did not hear the sergeant say anything. He saw a woman, but she was doing nothing. The holloaing that awakened him was, "Oh, let me alone; let me alone." He said he was in the same room as the last witness, Hartnett, but Hartnett went to the window first. Being asked whether he could identify the constable, he said he had an idea. Nine constables were thereupon brought into court, and he could identify the constable as the fourth one from the left, which was in fact P.C. Ashford. But the value of this identification was somewhat diminished by the witness admitting to Mr. Bankes that the police constable's number was 207; so that if on the 21st August he had seen the constable's number, or had heard that the number of the constable supposed to have been the guilty one was 207, the identification before us was of little value as tending to support the accuracy of the witness's recollection of the constable's face, as he (P.C. Ashford) and the other constables were all in uniform, and their numbers were plainly visible on their collars, though it is only fair to the witness to say that he asseverated that he should know the constable out of a hundred. Q. 35740 &c. Q. 35765 Q. 35767 Q. 35772 Q. 35774 Q. 35825 &c. Q. 35828

William Hughes, a young man of 19, and who, like Wiltshire, earned his living by going to the City and selling newspapers, told us that he lived at the same common lodging-house as the last two witnesses, and that he remembered on one morning in August, the 21st he thought it was, between half-past three and four, he was in a room at the lodging-house and heard a scream, and he looked out of the window and saw a constable hit a man and knock him down. He was in bed but woke up when he heard the scream. He saw one man and two constables or one constable and a sergeant. He did not see anyone else. He saw the constable strike the man and knock him down. Then the man got up again, and he (the constable) knocked him down again. When the man got up the third time he ran down the street, and the constable ran after him, and caught him up beside the school, and then the constable kicked him between the legs. That was a hundred yards from the lodging-house. Asked if he could recognise the constable, he said Yes. He also said that he had met the constable a month before the occurrence in question, and he also saw him a month after. It happened at the corner of Hanbury Street, which is quite near Osborn Place. He had also seen him about the Court, and he knew his number. As, under the circumstances, it seemed not of much use to ask the witness to identify the constable out of a number of constables in their uniforms with the correct numbers on their respective collars, P.C. 207 H was called in alone, and the witness then said that he (P.C. Ashford) was the same constable whom he saw in Osborn Place with Gamble. This witness in cross-examination contradicted a statement that he himself had made that he did not see anyone else in Osborn Place while the assault was going on, because he told Mr. Eldon Bankes that when he got out of bed and looked out of the window he saw a crowd of people, and that he saw Ethel Griffiths, whom he knew by sight, standing by herself outside the "Bell" public-house. Q. 35830 &c. Q. 35840 Q. 35841 Q. 35842 Q. 35843 Q. 35844 Q. 35 44 Q. 35851 Q. 35852 &c. Q. 35930 - 35945

Police Evidence.

The only evidence given on the police side which directly contradicts any portion of the evidence for the complainant is that given by P.C. Ashford, which we have summarised above, and that of Sergeant Sheedy, 5 H, whom some of the witnesses identified as the sergeant who was looking on at the occurrence which was alleged to have taken place in Osborn Place. Sergeant Sheedy told us that he was in charge of Section 2 on Monday, the 20th August, and paraded his men at a quarter to ten on that evening, and that he told Sergeant Anderson, who was station sergeant, what men he (Sergeant Sheedy) had out, and the list was duly entered on the "state." He patrolled Section 2 from 10 a.m. on the 20th August to 6 a.m. on the 21st. He visited each constable, he told us, about four times. He did not on that night find any man off his beat, and he denied that he was present at the alleged assault in Osborn Place, or that he saw P.C. Ashford, 207, anywhere near there or off his beat at all. P.C. Ashford went off duty at 5, as he stated that Station Sergeant Anderson had given him leave to do so at the parade. He (witness) thought it was in November that he first heard of the assault.

Nature of the Case.

This case, like most of those with which we have to deal, resolves itself into a conflict of evidence between a body of persons in humble circumstances, of very varied occupations, and of various degrees of respectability as to character, and so forth, on the one side, and witnesses who are members of the Force on the other. Unlike some of the other cases, however, the conflict of evidence is not as to what took place between the complainant and a constable, who admits that he had arrested or interfered with the complainant, and justifies himself on the ground that he did so in the execution of his duty, but between a complainant and a constable and a sergeant, who both deny that they came across the complainant or had anything to do with him on the night in question at all, so that it may be that the story told by Gamble and Ethel Griffiths is true in so far as it alleges that some constable and some sergeant behaved in the manner they allege, and yet that they are wrong in saying that it was P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy who were the constable and the sergeant concerned in the affair.

Characters of the Witnesses.

It seems necessary to inquire a little particularly into the respective characters of the principal persons concerned. We took steps to find out what we possibly could about Gamble, and we discovered that he had been employed by Messrs. George Trollope and Sons, the well known builders, as a labourer in the painting department of their business from the month of March 1906. George Plumb, who is the managing foreman of the decorative department of their business, came before us, and gave Gamble an excellent character for sobriety, regularity, and capacity in doing his work. He informed us that Gamble was recommended to the firm by a lady who resided in Belgrave Square, and who, when Gamble was out of work, had given him a letter recommending him for employment. It appeared that Gamble
Qs. 36248 36251 was the son of a person employed upon this lady's country estate, and that he had come to London, but was unfortunate in not getting work. He was very highly recommended in this letter, and accordingly he was taken on by this firm of builders. There is not the slightest reason to doubt this evidence, and we may take it that Gamble is a working man of diligent habits and of good character.

In this connection we ought to refer to a matter which at first sight seemed to throw some possible suspicion upon Gamble, and that is, that as the case came before us there appeared to be some doubt as to whether his name was Gamble or Pearce. It turns out, however, that the matter is of no importance and that it is perfectly certain that Gamble himself has had no occasion to pass under the name of Pearce, and never did pass under that name of his own will. It appears that the name Pearce had been written down by some blunder in the Hospital book as the name of the man who was admitted as an in-patient at 6.5 a.m. on the 21st August. No satisfactory explanation has been given of the blunder, though it is suggested that the patient had, when asked his name, said something about "police," and that the person who heard him understood that he answered that his name was Pearce. Whatever the reason, a blunder was made, and the matter being thus explained, no adverse criticism on Gamble can be made on that account.

The next, and in many respects the most important witness called in support of the complaint, was Ethel Griffiths, who admitted that she had taken to the streets and who, therefore, cannot be described as a person of good character. The story she told is a sad one. She is a married woman, who until recently has been living with her husband at Merthyr Tydvil, but left him owing to his drunken habits; she went to Cardiff, where, to use her own expression, she "went wrong," and then made her way to London. She seems to have tried to obtain some work of an honest kind, but for more than a year she has maintained herself by prostitution. She gave her evidence for the most part very well. At the time of the occurrence, though she was known by sight to some of the constables in H Division, she had not been in any trouble with the police, but it came out that some weeks after the affair we are investigating she had been convicted and fined 5s. for being drunk and disorderly. We think that, without being open to the charge of undue leniency, we may take, upon the whole, a favourable view of her disposition. Her compassionate behaviour to Gamble, whether we have got at the truth of the affair or not, tells in her favour as being that of a poor woman who, moved by the impulse of pity, did her best to help a fellow-creature in distress. No motive of a pecuniary kind has been suggested as likely to have actuated her in coming forward to give evidence. That her relations with Gamble were a good deal closer than appears from his or her first statement in the witness box is clear, and we shall have a word or two to say about those relations below.

Passing from Ethel Griffiths to J. Wiltshire, the young newsvendor, who says that he too accompanied Gamble to the hospital, it is only necessary to say that he was a very good specimen of his class. He has never been in any kind of trouble with the police; he is the son of a bricklayer, who died some years ago; he had been at a Board school in Spicer Street till he was fourteen; his mother still lives in the neighbourhood doing work; and he helps her when he can afford it, though he does not live with her, and for about three years he has supported himself by selling newspapers in the City. His occupation involves his being in the City till close on midnight, and he usually makes his way home from there to his lodgings in Brick Lane in the small hours of the morning. His demeanour in the witness box was good, and, so far as we can see, his account was not shaken in cross-examination or in examination by the Commissioners. So far as character and the manner of giving his evidence are concerned, he may be regarded as a witness prima facie entitled to credit.

With regard to Mrs. Franks, upon whose evidence, in our opinion, the case very largely turns, we need only say that she is the wife of a respectable working man, and that she appeared to be thoroughly trustworthy. No suggestion of any kind was made against her character or that of her husband, and her position is such that we may infer with reasonable confidence that she was completely disinterested. She struck us as a calm and capable woman, and not in the least likely, like some of the witnesses we have had before us in our Inquiry, to allow her emotions of sympathy with a man in pain to impair her judgment.

Of the three other witnesses, Hartnett, Brager, and Hughes, who resided at a common lodging house in Osborn Place, one cannot speak with the same degree of confidence. But as nothing whatever was suggested against them in cross-examination, they are entitled to be regarded as labourers of good character, though their want of education compels one to accord to their evidence as to detail a less degree of importance than one feels inclined to give to that of a witness like Mrs. Franks.

Turning, on the other hand, to the constable and the sergeant, whose conduct is impugned, one finds that the former (P.C. Ashford) bears an excellent character in every respect, and that his defaulter sheet is quite clean, while Sergeant Sheedy has a very good record, having been for nearly thirteen years in the force. He was first attached to the A division, and after ten years' service there he was removed to the C division, and on 23rd June, 1906, he was promoted to be sergeant, and removed on his promotion to the H. Division.

The Ascertained Facts.

Before discussing the details of the case, so far as it is necessary for us to go into them, it seems well to form a clear view as to the circumstances which are proved beyond doubt.

First of all, it is ascertained that Gamble was received as an in-patient at the London Hospital at six a.m. on the morning of the 21st August. The formal admission
Q. 35050 of Gamble to the hospital was timed at six a.m., and it is certain from Dr. Woods' evidence, without taking into account that of Gamble and Wiltshire, that he had been at the hospital in the Receiving Room for some considerable time, and there is no reason to doubt the doctor's evidence that he is not likely to have first come into the Receiving Room much more than about an hour before he was taken to the Ward as an in-patient.

Q. 36206 &c. Fewell, the night lodge porter at the London Hospital, gave us further help as to the time of Gamble's arrival at the hospital. It is his duty to observe persons who go in, and to make a note in his book of the "cases" that come to the hospital. He does not enter the name of any person who comes to the hospital suffering from the effects of an accident or from illness and who wishes treatment, but simply makes a general entry in the following form:—"10.10—Medical case—woman. 1.15—Accident—woman," &c. He had no recollection of Gamble's coming, but he had kept his book as usual, and produced it for our inspection, and we found that after midnight only two accident "cases" had come to the hospital. The first was a case of a woman who came at 1.15 suffering from the effects of an accident. The other was a case described as "4.45—Accident—man." It is practically certain that the man who arrived at 4.45 was Gamble, and therefore that he got into the Receiving Room of the Hospital a little before five o'clock.

Secondly, Gamble was undoubtedly seen between five and six o'clock by Dr. Woods, who was the house physician on night duty on the 21st August, and he (Gamble) told the doctor that he had been in company with a woman and had had a dispute with a police-constable about her, and that the police-constable had
Q. 36511 knocked him down and kicked him. Later in the day Gamble told Dr. Billinghurst,
Q. 35078 the house surgeon, who attended to him, that he had been kicked by a policeman, and that it was an unprovoked attack. The doctor added that Gamble just told him it was something to do with a woman, but he (the doctor) did not enquire into details.

Thirdly, we think it may be taken as an ascertained fact that Mrs. Franks, residing at 28, Spelman Street, a house three or four doors off from the corner of Spelman Street and Chicksand Street, was awakened in the middle of the night of the 20th—21st August by a noise in the street, and on looking out of the window saw a policeman kicking a prostrate man in Spelman Street. She did not recognise either Gamble as the prostrate man or P.C. Ashford as the constable. We may, therefore conclude that, without relying at all on the evidence of Ethel Griffiths or J. Wiltshire or the three lodgers in Osborn Place, it is proved beyond all reasonable doubt that Gamble arrived at the London Hospital at about 4.45, suffering from very grave injuries, that at the earliest opportunity he complained that those injuries had been caused by a kick from a policeman, and that a credible inhabitant residing in Spelman Street observed an assault committed by a constable on a prostrate man.

Criticism of Gamble's Story.

Next, bearing in mind the facts which we have ascertained to be true, let us consider the probability of the story told by Gamble supported by Mrs. Griffiths. It may be said at once that the account Gamble gives is not only possibly true, but, assuming that a police-constable, meeting Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths in conversation, determined to detach her from him for his own purposes, and that thereupon a quarrel took place between him and Gamble about the woman, there seems nothing at all in the story which is markedly improbable under all the circumstances. But the story is open to some criticism. It is not suggested that Mrs. Griffiths was a particular friend of the constable, or even a woman with whom he had had connection before, and it may be said with some reason that the occasion for the interference by the constable with a view to taking the woman away from Gamble seems very slight. It may also be said that for a constable to come across a man and a woman talking together is a common occurrence, and that it is a very curious thing that this constable should have deemed it necessary to interfere. Supposing a constable wished to have connection with a woman known by him to be on the streets, there would be, one would imagine, no great difficulty in his getting opportunity for gratifying his desire, and, even if there should have been something about Mrs. Griffiths which specially attracted this constable, one cannot help thinking that he would not have chosen the particular moment at which she was talking to or perhaps soliciting another man for the purpose of making her acquaintance and entering into improper relations with her. If the story had been that the constable had discovered Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths having or about to have connection in some convenient place near Hanbury Street, there would be no improbability about the occurrence of a quarrel between the two men leading to a fight, in the course of which the constable might be driven to such straits and so lose his temper and forget himself as to indulge in kicking his assailant.

Another point with reference to Gamble's account, which seems to us open to adverse comment, is his submissiveness throughout the whole affair. He describes the constable as following him, molesting him by treading on his heels, and so forth, without his making any remonstrance. Gamble says the constable then knocked him down and started kicking him between the legs. Gamble went away without Q. 32865 making any counter attack or resistance. The constable followed and caught him up and knocked him down again and started giving him "more boot." Again, he Q. 32870 seems to have made no resistance. He does say that when the constable threatened to take him down to the police station, he answered, "If you do, I shall certainly report you about wanting to have connection with the woman," a remark that may Q. 32862 have added fuel to the constable's anger, but still there is the fact that this young man, who, though he was weak and ill when he appeared before us, looked a naturally strong, well-built young fellow, behaved in what at first sight seems a remarkably tame and cowardly way; and that there was something noticeable about Gamble's submissive conduct is rather borne out by a remark made by the sergeant, "Why do you not get up and fight him like a man?" The answer to the suggested improbability of Gamble's behaving in the way which he himself described is possibly to be found in his fear of the police, and it may be said in defence of his conduct, assuming that he described it truly, that he was not on equal terms with the constable owing to the advantage which the latter had in being quite indifferent as to whether the matter came into a Police Court. That Gamble valued his employment was shown by more than one circumstance which was disclosed in our proceedings, and it is not unlikely that he was determined not to get into such trouble as might involve his being taken to the station. He told us he thought that the constable was trying to "rile" him in order to make him (Gamble) strike him.

The most damaging attack that can be made on the trustworthiness of Gamble as a witness is that founded on his attempt to mislead us as to the nature of his relations with Mrs. Griffiths. He certainly gave us to understand in examination-in-chief that he had never had anything to do with Mrs. Griffiths, but when, later on, he was asked by Mr. Dickinson whether he had ever spoken to her before, he replied: "Yes, Q. 33393 only as a matter of form. She would ask me if I was going to treat her, or anything like that." Then almost immediately afterwards, being asked whether he had ever gone home with her, he replied, "No, he could not say that he had." Not long Q. 33396 afterwards, on being asked by Mr. Isaacs whether he had ever been home with Ethel Q. 33472
Griffiths, he said, "Yes, but not for a long while before this. I had not seen her for a long while before this." Then, being pressed, he admitted he had been with her Q. 33479 once or twice.

Mrs. Griffiths also at first disclaimed anything but mere acquaintanceship with Gamble. She said she had seen him about twice before she met him on the 21st., Q. 33669 and that she had known him a month or so, but did not remember. In answer Q. 33671 to a subsequent question from Lord Russell as to whether she had ever taken George (i.e., Gamble) home with her, she said yes, she could remember that about 12 months before she had, but did not remember it yesterday (i.e., the first day on which she was examined before us). The Chairman categorically asked her whether Gamble went for a short time with her somewhere, and she replied, "Yes, he has been with Q. 34071 me twice, as far as I can remember."

So far as the evidence of these two persons goes their relations were merely occasional, but one cannot help remembering that Lily James, a friend of Mrs. Griffiths, told us that George was "her particular man," which, if true, indicates that the friendship between Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths was a good deal greater than was admitted by them before us; and if we felt that we could rely upon the accuracy of Lily James about a matter of that kind Gamble's suppression in the first instance of his true relations with Mrs. Griffiths would be open to much severer comment than we feel inclined to make upon it.

There can, therefore, be no doubt that Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths attempted in the first instance to deceive us as to the degree of acquaintanceship between them. One does not see why Mrs. Griffiths should have attempted to do so, but there is perhaps some excuse to be made for Gamble, because his manner suggested to us that he was anxious to protect Mrs. Griffiths' character, because he did not appear to know what she might say about herself in the witness-box, and she had undoubtedly been very kind to him about the matter; and also his anxiety about his employment made him desire to conceal misconduct on his part which might perhaps imperil him with his employers in case they came to know of it. However, his untruthful answers on this point ought to tell to some extent against the trustworthiness of his evidence, though we do not say it is a circumstance that ought to cause us to reject his account.

Some suggestion was made in cross-examination as to the way in which Gamble came to make his complaint to us, but full investigation of the matter has been made, and there seems nothing to suggest anything detrimental to his credit. It appears that one Weekes was in the hospital at the same time as Gamble, and that it was he who suggested that he should communicate with Mr. Timewell, the Secretary of the Police and Public Vigilance Society. Gamble did so, and the result was that Mr. Timewell paid one or two visits to him during the time that he was in the hospital, and took a statement from him which Gamble signed under the name "G. Pears" with difficulty, and after more than one attempt to sign it. The statement does not materially differ from the account which he gave before us, though there are some discrepancies which, if he had been quite well when he made the statement, and his evidence had been taken by a solicitor, might be worth attention, but, under the circumstances, they seem to us to be of no importance.

These are points which strike us as affording a basis for adverse comment upon the story told by Gamble. They are not very serious, and certainly not conclusive. But more substantial matter for comment confronts us, for when we come to consider the somewhat conflicting evidence as to the time at which Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths first met and at which the assault took place, we find we cannot have received a full and complete disclosure as to the events of the night. We have examined that evidence and have satisfied ourselves :—

(i.) That Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths met on the night in question not earlier than 12.30 a.m., and probably not latter than about 1 a.m.

(ii.) That the disturbances in Osborn Place and Spelman Street took place certainly not earlier than 2.20 and not later than 3.45 a.m., and probably at about 3 a.m. It follows that there is a considerable interval of time for which the story as told does not account. As the time consumed in walking and quarrelling after the constable came up cannot well have been more than a quarter of an hour or a few minutes longer, there was a period of from an hour and twenty minutes to two hours and a quarter, during which the complainant and Mrs. Griffiths were together before the constable interfered. The allegation that the constable came up just after they had met and commenced talking cannot therefore be true.

One's natural inference is, seeing that their friendly relations are admitted, that they went away somewhere and passed the time together, but whether in some house or in some convenient place in the neighbourhood must be mere matter of conjecture. Nor for our purpose is it of any consequence where they went. What is important from our point of view is the fact that they have not given us what we have a right to expect, namely, a full and frank disclosure of what took place upon this occasion. If they have not done so, then their credibility is damaged to a considerable extent, because it shows that they are persons capable of deliberately persisting in giving us a false and a misleading statement. We could understand Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths agreeing or perhaps arriving separately at the determination not to admit that their relations had been intimate, because they or either of them might wish to conceal the fact of their relations from natural and not unworthy motives, and we were willing to pass by the incorrect representation of both these witnesses in regard to that matter in their initial examination before us; but seeing that we thought it right in testing their story to see how far their evidence accounted for the lapse of time from midnight to the time that Gamble arrived at the hospital, there seems to be no excuse for their perseverance in withholding any part of what took place, if what took place was simply this—that they went away to some place or other in order to have connection. Their failure to make a full disclosure might, if they had been the only witnesses before us, have so discredited their evidence that we should not have felt justified in accepting the relevant facts of the story upon that alone. But to reject that part of the story which relates to what took place in Osborn Place, Chicksand Street, and Spelman Street, would involve also the rejection of other evidence which is no way discredited, and which prima facie there is no reason to debelieve. We ought to observe, however, that if the inference which we are inclined to draw from the minute examination of the evidence that Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths went away somewhere to have connection, and passed something like two hours together, be true, that does not, save so far as it may damage their credibility, disprove either the possibility or the probability of the main events that form the story.

The Place of Meeting and the Quarrel.

Let us now try to determine if possible where the meeting of Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths and the first interference by the constable took place. Gamble said that Mrs. Griffiths stopped him in a street "leading just off Brick Lane—not far off Brick Lane, but he did not know the name of the street." It was not near any public-house of which he knew the name. "It was one of the streets leading up there. Brick Lane was on the top"; and afterwards he said that the nearest he could tell us was "that it was one of the streets leading from Brick Lane." Q. 32843 Q. 32848 Q. 32849

Mrs. Griffiths said, in reference to the place at which she met Gamble, "I really could not tell you the name of the street, but it was opposite some chapel down by Osborn Place, the bottom end of Osborn Place; I don't really remember the name of the street." Again, she said it was "near Osborn Place—it was opposite some chapel where I met him, or a school." She did not remember any public-house near it. Later on, after telling us that while she was talking to Gamble the constable came up, she told us she did not know the name of the street in which that happened. "We met outside this chapel, and the chapel was a little way away from the 'Bell.'" The chapel was about five or ten minutes' walk from the "Bell." Mrs. Griffiths was also cross-examined as to her movements before meeting with Gamble, and having said that she left Bow about 11 o'clock, she said she went "by tram to the Pavilion, which is close to the Vallance Road." She did not meet Gamble in Vallance Road, but met him a little further on. When she got to Vallance Road, she turned round on her left-hand side. She met Gamble close to Vallance Road; "it was not far from a chapel or a school where we met." She knew Hanbury Street. It was opposite a chapel in the street, but she was not positive of the name of the street. Q. 33406 Q. 33499 Q. 33500 Qs. 34275 34276 Q. 34277 Q. 33725 Q. 33728 Qs. 33731 33732 Qs. 33737 33738

We gather the effect of these and subsequent answers to be this—that she walked into Vallance Road intending to go to her home in Flower and Dean Street, and that when in Vallance Road she turned to her left into a street, the name of which she does not know, and that by a chapel or a school in that street she met Gamble; and further, that the street into which she turned was a street that led to Brick Lane. According to the plan before us, a person walking up Vallance Road would have on his left hand, some distance away, and, running very nearly parallel with Vallance Road, Brick Lane. If any such person walking up Vallance Road wished to go from Vallance Road to Brick Lane, the first street on the left-hand side leading into Brick Lane is Old Montague Street, which crosses Brick Lane and then becomes Wentworth Street, and then crosses Commercial Street; the second street would be Hanbury Street, which also runs to and crosses Brick Lane, the third street would be Underwood Street which only runs part of the way to Brick Lane; and the fourth street is Buxton Street, which runs straight from Vallance Road across Brick Lane into Quaker Street, and then into Commercial Street. Old Montague Street and Hanbury Street run into Vallance Road at the same point, and there are school buildings near the point of junction which abut both upon Hanbury Street and Old Montague Street. If one goes into Old Montague Street towards Brick Lane one passes those buildings on the right, and if you go into Hanbury Street you pass them on the left. There are also school buildings on the opposite side of Hanbury Street nearly facing the schools just referred to. If one walks past those schools on towards Brick Lane one comes to another school building on the corner of Hanbury Street and Deal Street, and just opposite that school building on the corner of Hanbury Street and King Edward Street there is a building marked on the plan as a church. Reading the evidence in the light of the assistance given by the plan, and by a personal visit to Hanbury Street and the other streets referred to in the evidence, it would seem that what Mrs. Griffiths' really did was to turn from Vallance Road into Hanbury Street, where she might well have met Gamble. That being so, it seems most likely that the place at which they met opposite, to use Mrs. Griffiths' words, "some chapel" or "school," may have been opposite the church at the corner of Hanbury Street and King Edward Street, the appearance of which is not inconsistent with its being a chapel or school. Here we need only add that if a person going up Vallance Road wished to get to Flower and Dean Street, the shortest way would be to go into Hanbury Street, turn to the left from Hanbury Street into King Edward Street, and then to the right into Chicksand Street, which leads into Osborn Place, which runs into Brick Lane, and then on getting into Brick Lane, Flower and Dean Street would be found almost opposite. If such a person wished to go to the Victoria Home the nearest and most direct way would be to turn from Vallance Road into Old Montague Street, across Brick Lane into Wentworth Street, which is a mere continuation of Old Montague Street, and then across Commercial Street, when he would find the Victoria Home on his left-hand at the corner of that street and Wentworth Street. Whether in this case the proposed destination was Flower and Dean Street or the Victoria Home, either of the suggested routes is better than any other. The former is a little nearer for Flower and Dean Street and the latter for the Victoria Home. If it be assumed that both Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths turned into Hanbury Street on their way to their respective homes and met in Hanbury Street somewhere near the church at the corner of Hanbury Street and King Edward Street, the fact would be quite consistent with the accuracy of the story told. Osborn Place would be most nearly reached from that point by going either down King Edward Street or Dunk Street, or Great Garden Street into Chicksand Street and then along Chicksand Street to Osborn Place.

Accepting the story told by Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths it may well be that the constable first came up to them while they were in Hanbury Street near the church, that Gamble walked on as he described, and followed by the constable turned down into Chicksand Street and proceeded along Chicksand Street, till he got to Osborn Place near Brick Lane, where he was knocked down and kicked, and that when he got up and ran away he ran back along Osborn Place into Chicksand Street, and turned and fell either at the very corner of or in Spelman Street, where a man was observed lying on the ground and being kicked by a constable by Mrs. Franks. There is in fact nothing to be gathered from an inspection of the locality which throws any doubt on the details of the complainant's evidence.

Result of Examination of Complainant's Case.

We have now summarised the evidence for the complainant and have considered the question how far Gamble and the witnesses called on his side may be deemed to be credible witnesses. We have considered the criticisms that may be passed upon the complainant's story as a whole, and endeavoured to sift or analyse the evidence as to the time of the alleged assault and the place at which Gamble met Mrs. Griffiths on the night in question.

The result is that the following propositions are proved to our satisfaction:—

(1) That Gamble was admitted to the London Hospital suffering from a grave injury, namely, a rupture of the urethra;

(2) That that injury was most probably caused by a kick delivered on the perineum, though it is possible that the rupture may have been caused otherwise;

(3) That Gamble arrived at the London Hospital at 4.45 a.m. accompanied by Mrs. Griffiths and Wiltshire ;

(4) That a disinterested and credible witness (Mrs. Franks) saw, probably at a little before 3.0 a.m., a constable kicking a prostrate man close by the corner of Spelman Street and Chicksand Street ;

(5) That the relevant parts of the story told by Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths as to a policeman interfering with them somewhere not very far from Osborn Place, and having assaulted and kicked Gamble more than once at different places is a coherent narrative which reasonably accounts for the injury received, and is quite consistent with the facts ascertained ;

(6) That nothing was elicited in the course of cross-examination or in the examination of the witnesses before us which tends to show that there is any ground for believing that the witnesses either among themselves or in combination with others who have not been called before us have conspired to fabricate a story with the intention of throwing the blame for Gamble's injuries untruly upon a member of the Police Force ;

(7) That even assuming that there has been something in the nature of an intrigue against the Police, or there existed a settled bias or hostility against the Force, so far as Wiltshire and the three lodgers are concerned, there is no reason whatever to believe that Mrs. Franks was a party to anything of the kind or actuated by any such feeling.

The general conclusion is, that the injuries sustained by Gamble were inflicted in the course of a conflict that occurred after a quarrel between him and a constable about Mrs. Griffiths. That proposition is one which may be arrived at without relying on the evidence of Wiltshire, Hartnett, Brager or Hughes, though if we can safely rely upon their testimony we can do so upon stronger ground.

The complainant, however, goes further and alleges that P.C. Ashford, 207 H, was the constable who assaulted and kicked him after an unprovoked interference with him and Mrs. Griffiths ; and he also charges Sergeant Sheedy, 5 H, with having made himself a party to the constable's misconduct by looking on without making any attempt to prevent him from continuing his acts of violence, and with deliberately shielding P.C. Ashford from the consequences of his guilt. It becomes, therefore, necessary for us to consider whether the evidence justifies us in concluding that P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy are in fact the constable and sergeant of whom the witnesses are speaking. The police case is confined to the evidence of P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy, who say that they were not concerned in the affair at all, and to evidence that none of their superior officers or of the constables on duty on the beats near Osborn Place know anything about the occurrence more than the fact of Gamble's charge, and that certain inquiries were made after the receipt of the letter from Messrs. Radford and Frankland towards the end of November, 1906.

Identification of P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy.

Let us now consider the evidence identifying P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy as the constable and the sergeant who played a part in this affair if Gamble's story is true, and for that purpose it is reasonable to assume the substantial accuracy of his story. If we do accept that story and believe, notwithstanding the criticisms which may be made upon him, that Gamble is an honest man, then it follows that we must look upon Mrs. Griffith's evidence with much the same degree of favour. If Gamble is substantially speaking the truth so also is Mrs. Griffiths, and therefore some weight may be accorded, identified though she is in interest with Gamble, to the fact that she speaks positively to P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy being the constable and the sergeant really concerned. At any rate, Mrs. Griffiths, as might be expected from what she admitted as to her frequenting the streets nightly, knew P.C. Ashford by sight, though it would not seem that she had ever spoken to him before the 21st August. In the course of Mrs. Griffiths' examination a number of constables and sergeants in uniform were brought before us and stood in a row. Mrs. Griffiths at once identified P.C. Ashford as the constable who assaulted Gamble, and though she picked out Sergeant Sheedy as being the sergeant who was in Osborn Place she very frankly stated that she could not be positive about him. We may say at once that her evidence did not appear to be materially strengthened by the test implied in her being asked to pick out the constable from a number of men brought into Court, because all the men were in uniform, and their numbers were plainly visible upon their collars, and there can, we think, be no doubt that Mrs. Griffiths as well as all, or nearly all, the other witnesses had heard that it was P.C. Ashford, 207 H., who was the man upon whom suspicion had fallen. In order to strengthen the evidence of identification, the testing of a witness's recollection by asking him to pick out the man whom he accuses from among a number of others must be carried out under conditions very different from those which we could conveniently impose at the Guildhall, Westminster; still it is possible that some little additional weight may be rightly accorded to identification in the way in which it took place before us. However that may be, the evidence of identification can hardly be put higher than this, that when confronted with P.C. Ashford the witnesses said they recognised him as the man who was concerned in the affair.

Gamble told us he did not know the number of the constable who assaulted him, and that he had not seen him since the 21st August until the morning of the day on which he was giving evidence before us when he recognised him outside the Court. He added that he knew him by his moustache which was "very red—ginger." Subsequently several constables and a sergeant in uniform were brought into Court and Gamble at once identified P.C. Ashford as 207 H—"the third man from the end of the rank"—but he said that he could not identify the sergeant.

The value of this evidence, of course, depends almost entirely on the view we take as to the character of the various witnesses. If we put them down as merely suborned or reckless there is nothing in it, but if, as we think is the case, the witnesses are speaking on other matters quite honestly one cannot, in the absence of any special motive for their picking out P.C. Ashford, help attaching very considerable weight to the evidence, if the movements of P.C. Ashford are found upon investigation to be such as to make it possible for him to have come across Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths at the place at which they say they met.

It is obvious that the case of identification is rather stronger against P.C. Ashford than it is against Sergeant Sheedy. Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths, who had the best opportunities of observing the features of the constable concerned, because both had talked to him when he was quite near, and both of whom had strong reasons for noticing him, speak positively as to his being the man who called her aside and was concerned in what afterwards happened. Of the other three witnesses who positively identify the constable Wiltshire is the one who had the best opportunity for observing the constable's features, because he was standing in the street while one of the assaults was going on with the sergeant looking on, whereas Brager and Hughes were looking out of a window, which was at a good height above the level of the road. The first named was quite certain on the matter. With regard to Sergeant Sheedy, the evidence of Mrs. Griffiths was very uncertain, but that of Wiltshire, assuming that he is not deliberately lying, seems nearly conclusive, because it is not easy to think that a sharp lad standing quite close to the sergeant under the circumstances would be likely to make a mistake; but in Harnett's statement to the same effect one cannot feel quite the same confidence, as his opportuunity for observation was not so good. We leave the evidence as to identification there.

The Interview Between Mrs. Griffiths and P.C. Ashford.

There is one other topic that we must touch upon before we pass to consider the Police case, and that is the evidence about two interviews which, as alleged, took place between Mrs. Griffiths and P.C. Ashford.

Mrs. Griffiths told us that she had seen P.C. Ashford on the Sunday night before the 20th February, 1907 (the date at which she gave evidence), outside the "Carpenters' Arms," about ten minutes after the public-houses had been closed. He (the P.C.) was on duty and in uniform. She had at that time received a summons to give evidence before this Commission, and she had it with her on the Sunday night just referred to. According to her account, she went up to the constable and asked him if he knew anything about this (showing him the letter containing the summons), and he answered "No." Mrs. Griffiths said, "It is a funny thing that you have not heard when I have." Here we had better give her exact words. "So, after one or two words, he said, 'I have.' He said, 'What are you going to do?' I said, 'I don't know what I am going to do.' He asked me if I was going to do my worst . . . I said I thought it was all dropped until I heard on Saturday . . . I don't think much passed besides that. He offered me £2 if I would not go against him. That is all that passed. . . . He said I should be sorry for it. He said he would do it in on me. What he meant by that I don't know." She also said that she had spoken to him before Christmas, but she could not tell us the date. She spoke to him about the same thing. "He was on duty in Brick Lane on a Sunday morning," she said it was, and she saw him in Brick Lane just along by a public-house called the "Cranes"; at any rate, not far from it. She said, "I just spoke to him on the subject. I told him I had given a statement about it . . . He said, 'What did you do that for'? He told me he was a married man, and he told me I was not to recognise him if anything should occur." That is all that took place. Q. 33647 &c. Q. 33654 &c. Q. 33655 Q. 33657 Q. 33658 Q. 33933 Q. 33934 Q. 33936 Qs. 33945 33946 Q. 33947 to 39349

P.C. Ashford denied that he had spoken to Mrs. Griffiths about the matter at all. As to the conversation on the Sunday morning near the "Cranes" public-house, he denied that he met her. As to the Sunday evening conversation in which he was alleged to have offered her £2, he denied that any conversation took place, but he admitted that she had approached him on the Monday night before she came here (i.e., the Monday night before the 20th February) about half an hour after midnight. His account of the conversation was as follows:—"She asked me if she could speak to me. I said, 'Yes.' She said, 'I have got a paper here! would you mind reading of it?' I said, 'No, I don't want any conversation with you.' I then walked away . . . . She shouted out something about, 'If you make it worth while, I will bunk out of it, but,' she said, 'I will give you till Wednesday to consider it over.'" He did not say anything in answer to that, and he had not seen her since. He was examined by the Chairman in reference to this admitted conversation, and the conversation which had been detailed by him before was put to him, and he admitted that she commenced the conversation by saying, "Can I speak to you?" The Chairman then asked him, "Then what did you mean by saying she might speak to you?" and he replied, "I did not know whether she wanted to ask me any question, or anything like that." He was then asked, "Was not that obviously what she was going to do? She said, 'Look at this paper.' Was she not going to ask you for advice?" He replied, "This paper being a letter, I did not read it." The Chairman then asked him, "Here was a woman whom you knew by sight who very courteously asked you if she might speak to you, and you said 'Yes.' Then she said, 'I have a letter here; will you read it?'" and he replied, "I said so." "(Q.) Why did you not read it? (A.) I did not want to read other people's letters. (Q.) You said she wanted your advice? (A.) I thought she might want me for something else. (Q.) For what? (A.) For some other question. (Q.) What other question? (A.) I do not know." Further questions were put to him with a view of suggesting to him that his account of the conversation did not seem very probable, the point being that he had given the woman permission to speak to him, and the moment she did so by asking him to read a letter, and to give her advice, he refused to have anything further to say. We do not suggest that there is very much in the point, but the manner of the witness in answering the question was unsatisfactory, and the conversation as given by the constable does not seem to us to have an air of reality about it. He absolutely denied that he thought the paper in any way concerned himself, and said that the thought that it might be a summons to come before us in connection with Gamble's affair never occurred to him. That being so, one would have thought that, after giving the woman permission to speak to him, he would, at any rate, have listened to what she had to say, and that when he found that all she wanted was that he should look at a letter, evidently with a view of giving her some advice, he would have done so Q. 37585 Q. 37586 Q. 37857 Q. 37592 Q. 37594 Q. 37595 Q. 37598 Q. 37600 Q. 37803 Q. 37806 Q. 37807 Q. 37809 Q. 37810 Q. 37811 Q. 37812 Q. 37813 Q. 37814 unless of course he had some reason to suspect that she was speaking with the object of compromising him in some way in regard to the case which he then knew was pending before the Commission; and if he had frankly said that he suspected that the letter was a summons, and that she was going to talk to him about the case, we should have thought there was nothing at all in the conversation that in any way reflected adversely upon him; but we could not help coming to the conclusion that he was not speaking honestly about the interview, whatever may have taken place at it, and, on the whole, that part of P.C. Ashford's evidence produced a very unfavourable effect upon our minds, especially as he admitted that she used words just as he was walking away that had distinct reference to this case, we mean the words "If you will make it worth while I will bunk out of it." Even if Mrs. Griffiths' suggestion that he (the P.C.) offered her money to drop the case be without foundation, the unfavourable impression that P.C. Ashford made upon us is by no means removed.

As to the first of the two interviews alleged by Mrs. Griffiths, the happening of it is absolutely denied by P.C. Ashford; but it may be urged that some confirmation of her statement is afforded by the evidence of a witness called Lily James,
Q. 37922 who is a friend of hers, and, like her, a woman of the "unfortunate" class. According to her story before us, it was in September and not in December, as Mrs. Griffiths told us, that the interview took place. She said that she and Mrs. Griffiths were walking down Brick Lane on a Sunday morning in September between twelve and one in the daytime, when they saw P.C. 207 H. The constable stopped Mrs. Griffiths, and asked her how the young man was. She (Lily James) was by her side. Mrs. Griffiths said that he was very bad. The constable said, "What are you going to do?" Mrs. Griffiths answered, "I do not know." The constable then said, "Well, keep your tongue between your teeth as I am a married man."

In cross-examination it came out that she had not been formally summoned, and that she had only attended on the 5th March, when she was called, and it was suggested that she had been tempted to come because Mrs. Griffiths told her how much she had received as a witness for her own attendance, and that the inducement for her coming forward in order to confirm, to a certain extent, Mrs. Griffiths' statement, was the temptation afforded by the very small amount payable to the witnesses for their attendance before us.

Upon the whole, though we think that it would be quite unfair to attach the slightest importance to the evidence of Lily James, and although, as will be seen from comments that we have made in other cases about evidence as to conversations introduced with a view of strengthening a case, we do not attach, as a general rule, much importance to it, still if one comes to the conclusion that Mrs. Griffiths is a reasonably trustworthy witness, one can hardly refuse all belief in regard to her alleged conversations with P.C. Ashford, though as to the precise words used one could feel no great confidence. P.C. Ashford admitted that he did have a conversation, though he put it on a Monday and not on the Sunday night, and the way in which he gave his evidence upon the matter, and the somewhat unnatural and forced terms which he gave to the tenor of the admitted conversation, rather point against him. The upshot is that this part of the complainants' case tends slightly to confirm the evidence of identification against P.C. Ashford.

The Police Case.

The case made by the body of witnesses called on the complainant's part was met by the evidence of P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy, who were both on duty in Section 2 on the night in question, and who both denied any knowledge whatsoever of the occurrences spoken to by Gamble and his witnesses.

We have already referred to the excellent characters and good record of both these members of the Force, and we need only say here that it seems to us a point to which we ought to attach very great importance.

Let us now see what was the duty of each on this night, and where did it take him? The necessity of making this inquiry naturally occurred to us during the hearing of the complaint, and we accordingly took evidence as to the disposition of the members of the Force on duty in the H Division on the night in question.

Sub-divisional Inspector Hewison gave us full information as to the parade and inspection of the men on night duty from 10 a.m. on the 20th August to 6 a.m. on the 21st in the H Division. He told us that it was the duty of the sergeant when he parades the men of a night to post the constables on the different beats. He Q. 36343 explained to us, first of all, that, according to the system in vogue, it was his duty, as Sub-divisional Inspector, to arrange the duties of constables for every month. Once a month he made out what is called the Roster, which is then submitted to the Superintendent for his approval. The Roster having been approved, it is kept and exhibited at the station, and every day every officer and constable finds out what his duty is for the whole month for which the Roster is made out. In the course of the month, however, certain variations may be made in consequence of men being away from duty or relieved from duty, and that sort of thing. For such variations the sergeant makes arrangements. The men going on night duty should be paraded and inspected at 9.45 p.m. under the direction of one of the inspectors or the station sergeant. The H Division is divided into four different sections. The constables on parade fall into their different sections, and their appointments and books are inspected, and it is seen if the men are in proper order to go on duty. After that any necessary information taken from Police Orders and telegrams or anything urgent are read to the men before they go out on duty. The sergeant of each section should report to the inspector or station sergeant the number of men that he has available for duty, and an entry of that is made in a book called the Duty Book. The sergeant, before leaving with his men, enters up the strength of the night duty on a slate, and it is afterwards copied into the Duty Book by one of the officers on night duty. The sergeants, before going out with the constables, are given by the inspector or the station sergeant notes stating the places and times during the night at which the sergeants would be met. No one, except the sergeants and the inspectors, knows the time and the place of the rendezvous, and the inspector places a note in the Duty Book before he goes out patrolling, so that if any superior officer might wish to find him, or want to know where he was during the night, he could easily be found. After the inspection is over, the sergeant marches the men under him to their section, and posts them on their respective beats, and relieves the constables who have been on duty on such beats for the preceding four or eight hours. The system was very clearly explained to us by Sub-divisional Inspector Hewison and by Station Sergeant Anderson, and it appears to us to be entirely well conceived. The result of the system and of the record kept is this, that if you go to a police station at any hour of the day or night you can, by looking at the Roster, at the station sergeant's slate, and at the Duty Book, find out where any constable on duty at any moment ought to be, and if he is not in fact on duty, you can learn the reason for his absence.

Sub-divisional Inspector Hewison put in a plan of Sections 1 and 2 of the White-chapel district which showed the beats into which the section is divided; and it is the Q. 36337
Second Section which comprehends the streets between Brick Lane, Vallance Road, Buxton Street and the Whitechapel Road, within which Osborn Place, Spelman Street and the other streets mentioned in the evidence in this case, are situate. The Second Section is divided into eleven beats. From the documents put in it is found that the Second Section was undermanned, as sometimes happens, on the night of the 20th-21st August, and therefore some of the constables posted to the second division had to patrol two beats instead of one. This was the case with P.C. Ashford, who was allocated to No. 10 and No. 11. The boundaries of those beats have been given above. Osborn Place runs between and divides beat No. 3 and beat No. 4. Chicksand Street, starting from its easterly end, runs through No. 8 beat and No. 9 beat, and then passes between No. 4 beat on the left hand and No. 9 beat and No. 3 beat on the right hand. The effect of this evidence is to demonstrate conclusively that P.C. Ashford might have met Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths as they say while performing his duty on beats No. 10 and No. 11.

The general effect left on our minds is this: that Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths have shown that they probably met at a place where they might have met P.C. Ashford while being engaged in the regular performance of his duty, and that if he so far forgot himself as to leave his beat and follow Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths into Chicksand Street, a street which they would be likely to pass through on the way to their respective homes, the allegation that he is the constable who knocked down and kicked Gamble in Osborn Place and Spelman Street is by no means improbable, and that conclusion is strengthened by the reflection that if we accept the story told to the extent of believing that it was a constable who caused the injury to Gamble, we are practically forced to the conclusion that that constable was the same man who first interfered with them when he came across them talking together in Hanbury Street.

Turning to the question whether it was Sergeant Sheedy who looked on at the assault, it does not seem to us that the consideration of the way in which the various officers and constables of the H Division were employed on duty during the night in question carries us much further. Sergeant Sheedy was undoubtedly on duty, and no kind of breach of duty would have been involved by his being near the "Bell" public-house in Osborn Place at the time when the alleged assault took place, whether it was as early as 2.30 a.m. or as late as 4 a.m., and there is nothing in Sergeant Sheedy's evidence which negatives the possibility that he was at the place where the assault is alleged to have taken place at the critical moment.

We thought it might be of some advantage for us to see Sergeant Doyle, who was on duty in command of Section 1 on the night in question, especially when it came out in our minute examination of the roster and of the sergeant's state, made in the course of duty for the night in question, that P.C. 200 H, who belonged, according to the roster of the 20th August, to another section, had been posted with him (Sergeant Doyle) on this night, and this induced, we will not say the suspicion, but the notion in our minds that possibly the system was not worked so rigidly and accurately as we were asked to believe. The explanation given by Sergeant Doyle of the seeming irregularity was entirely satisfactory, and he told us that he saw nothing of the alleged occurrence, and that if, while on duty in his own section, he saw a constable kicking a man lying down, he would go and investigate what was going on, even though it took him off his section.

We think it only fair, in concluding our observations on this part of the case to say that not the slightest disposition was shown on the part of those who appeared for the police to conceal anything whatsoever that might throw light upon the occurrence. Mr. Eldon Bankes told us that all the constables upon the beats lying close to P.C. Ashford's beat, and in fact, as we gather, all the men in charge of beats close to Osborn Place, were interrogated, and we were invited to examine all or any of them. It did not appear to us necessary to do so, because we felt it would simply have resulted in a series of men being called and denying that they witnessed any of the events connected with the occurrence into which we were enquiring.

We feel it may be urged, as against the acceptance of the story told by Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths, that it is extremely improbable that Sergeant Sheedy, or any other sergeant in the H Division, would be likely to witness an affray in which one of the constables under his immediate supervision was concerned without taking any action at all, and without making any report whatever upon the subject. But the introduction of the sergeant into the story was by no means necessary to the case made by Gamble and Mrs. Griffiths. Supposing that they have concocted the story, one cannot see why they should have brought the sergeant into it at all. As it stands, the presence of a sergeant is an integral part of the narrative, and, if we were to reject that part of the story, one could only do so for reasons which would so discredit the witnesses as to take away the ground upon which the rest of the story stands. Looking at the affair as a whole, it should not be forgotten that it cannot have seemed to the sergeant, or to any experienced observer of East End scenes, anything like so surprising or so serious as it does to us. The only thing at all out of the common in what the sergeant (if he was there) saw is the fact that the constable kicked the man. Everything else was quite in the ordinary course of events near Brick Lane, and what the sergeant saw was consistent with its being a case in which a prisoner had been attempting to escape, or some man was assaulting the constable while in the execution of his duty. Nor was there anything to indicate to an onlooker, when Gamble got up and ran from Osborn Place to Chicksand Street, that he had been really injured. The utmost that anyone could have seen there was a man engaged in an altercation with a constable, and that the constable knocked him down, gave him a kick, and pursued him. It may, therefore, be that the sergeant, whoever he was, simply saw a constable, engaged in conflict with a man, give him a kick, which did not seem to have any grave consequence, as the man got up and ran away. It is not suggested that the sergeant followed and saw anything of the subsequent assault in Spelman Street. If that be so, though it could not be said that the sergeant joined in or was responsible for the assault, yet he would be open to censure for not intervening and reporting the matter at the police station.

Having given our best consideration to the case, we are unable to resist the evidence, and we accept Gamble's story as substantially true. There is no doubt in our minds that P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy are the constable and sergeant who were actually concerned in the affair. We desire to add that we are satisfied that P.C. Ashford did not intend to do Gamble serious injury.

Our formal conclusions are :—

(i.) P.C. Ashford was guilty of the misconduct alleged, but in kicking Gamble did not intend to do him the serious injury which resulted.

(ii.) Sergeant Sheedy was guilty of misconduct in that :—

(a) He did not intervene between Gamble and the constable, whom he observed in conflict in Osborn Place, and terminate the disturbance, ascertain its cause, and then take the consequential steps which the performance of his duty under the ascertained circumstances required.

(b) He omitted to make any report at all to the Inspector or other superior officer.

Complaint of the Treatment of the Case by the Chief Commissioner.

Gamble himself did not when he came before us expressly complain that the Chief Commissioner had not dealt with the case properly when it came under his notice. He was content to come before us and tell his story. But as the case affords an illustration of the manner in which complaints by members of the public are dealt with by the authorities at New Scotland Yard, it is necessary for us to inquire into the facts of this particular case, as they form part of the data upon which we ought to base our conclusion upon the general question submitted to us. As appears from the summary of the evidence given above, Gamble while in the hospital talked to a man called Weekes, who suggested that he should put himself in communication with the Police and Public Vigilance Society. It does not clearly appear how the case was brought to the attention of the Society, but in fact Mr. Timewell, the Secretary of the Society, saw Gamble more than once while he was at the hospital, and he took the statement referred to above from him. The Society appear, without instructions from Gamble, to have retained a well-known firm of solicitors (Messrs. Radford and Frankland), and instructed them to write a letter to the Chief Commissioner, which is set out above. So far as can be ascertained, this was undoubtedly the first communication made to the Chief Commissioner, and, so far as we can find, it was the first communication made about the case to any police authority. The letter was duly acknowledged. Reports were called for, and the solicitors' letter was sent Q. 36812 to the Commercial Street Police Station and handed to Sub-divisional Inspector Q. 36816 Hewison with instructions to make inquiries. He told us that before he received this letter he had heard no gossip, rumour or report about a man lying in the hospital Q. 36817 who alleged that he had been injured by the police. Upon getting instructions to make a report, he said, "First of all I asked the constables" (he does not say which constables), "and particularly P.C. Ashford, but he absolutely denied all knowledge of it, and was directed to make a report, which he did." The report has been put in Q. 37710.
and is in the following terms :—"Commercial Street Station, H. division, November 25, 1906. With reference to report called for re alleged assault on Charles Gamlett (sic) on 21st August, 1906. I beg to report being on 10 and 11 beats, second section, night-duty, which includes a part of Spelman Street on the above date, I do not know the man who have complained, I did not see him, neither did I assault him or know anything of the occurrence. Edwin Ashford, P.C. 207 H. J. Hewison, S.D. Q. 36821 Inspector J. Mulvaney, Supt." The inspector then made inquiries of four or five shopkeepers carrying on business in that portion of Spelman Street that was on P.C.

Ashford's beat, and asked them if they had heard any disturbance or if they were woke up by any disturbance in the morning, and they said they had heard nothing, and they knew nothing at all about it. He (Sub-divisional Inspector Hewison) then went to the London Hospital, and with one of the night porters searched the books, but they could not find the name of Gamble there at all, and so the inspector came to the conclusion that he was not in that hospital. The letter, the inspector properly observed, did not say what hospital he was in. The Chairman asked him whether in searching the books he had not found the entry on the 21st August "Accident—man 4.45," and he replied that he had no knowledge that that referred to this case. Being pressed upon the point, he said that they (meaning himself and some person or persons at the hospital) searched the books to see if they could find the name, but he did not go to the porter's lodge, and therefore the only books he searched were the records in the office of the hospital. The inspector then told us that the conclusion he came to was that the man referred to was not in the London Hospital, that, in his opinion, he made the inquiry as thoroughly as he could at the time, and that he did not himself in fact close the inquiry. On the 29th November, Sub-divisional Inspector Hewison made his report which is covered by Superintendent Mulvaney, and is in the following terms:—"With reference to the attached correspondence I beg to report that there is no record at this station of any complaint being made by Gamble of the alleged assault. I have made careful inquiry at Spelman Street, and also at the London Hospital, but I am unable to obtain any information whatever of the occurrence. The P.C. was on night duty during the month of August last, and was posted to a beat that takes in part of Spelman Street, Whitechapel, on the date in question. He, however, absolutely denies all knowledge of the assault. I would respectfully suggest that the solicitor might be asked to furnish Gamble's address so that he could be seen with a view to his statement being taken, and the nature of the alleged assault inquired into." In the margin of the report is the letter "A," and below is a note in these terms: "A recommended." On the 8th December, 1906, Mr. Bathurst, on behalf of the Chief Commissioner, wrote the following letter to Messrs. Radford and Frankland: "New Scotland Yard, S.W. Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of the 23rd ultimo, I am directed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to acquaint you that the P.C. referred to denies having seen or assaulted your client, and nothing is known to the police of the incident." No further steps were taken in the affair, and the recommendation noted upon the report of Sub-divisional Inspector Hewison was not, so far as our evidence goes, acted upon.

Q. 36825.

Q. 36825

It is perfectly clear that the Sub-divisional Inspector did all that could be reasonably expected of him with the very scanty data afforded to him by a copy of the letter of Messrs. Radford and Frankland. Our first impression was that the Chief Commissioner ought to have pushed the inquiry further having regard to the gravity of the misconduct alleged. But Sir Edward Henry called our attention to instructions given by the Home Office, to the effect that "if the complaint amounts to a criminal charge and there is conflicting evidence on the subject, the Commissioner ought not to decide the matter, but it ought to be brought before a Magistrate, who can take evidence on oath," and contended that in view of this direction the authorities at New Scotland Yard were justified in not acting upon Inspector Hewison's recommendation or inquiring any further into the matter.

Q. 52402 &c.

All that we need say here is that we think that in the circumstances this contention is well founded, and that the course taken was correct, but we may refer to our observations made above upon the Home Office instructions.

See above p. 142.

XVII.—MR. Y's CASE.

(In Camera.)

In this case a young gentleman made a complaint of the misconduct of certain constables on a recent Saturday night in wrongfully arresting two young ladies, in whose company he was in Piccadilly, for solicitation and for riotous and indecent behaviour, and afterwards arresting him while on his way to Vine Street Police Station in order to bail out his friends. He informed us that he came forward out of a sense of public duty; and he conveyed to us a message that, though he felt much aggrieved at the treatment to which his friends and himself had been subjected, he did not wish to make his complaint in public as, whatever the result, further publicity would only add to the annoyance that had been caused to him by the affair, and that, however well founded his complaint might be found to be, he might be injured in his business if the occurrence should become, as would inevitably be the case if we inquired into the complaint publicly, a matter of general notoriety. He therefore requested us to hear the case in private.

We considered the application, and though, seeing that we became acquainted with the name and address of the complainant, we had the power under the Metropolitan Police Commission Act, 1906, of compelling his attendance and giving evidence before us in public, we thought that to take that course, which might have the prejudicial result to him which he suggested, would be a somewhat harsh and unduly inquisitorial exercise of the powers with which we are invested. On the other hand, seeing that in regard to the manner in which the police deal with solicitation cases we had only taken evidence in regard to the cases of Madame D'Angely, Mrs. Braham, and Mrs. X, we thought it would be inexpedient to allow the opportunity of learning more about the way in which solicitation cases are dealt with by the police to escape us; and though as in the case of Mrs. X we were rather reluctant to adopt the course of taking the case in camera, and suppressing the names of the complainant and his friends, we considered ourselves justified in hearing the matter in private. We accordingly decided to hear the evidence of Mr. Y and Mr. Z, a friend of the former, who had seen part of the affair, without any representatives of the police or any constables being present, and then, if after listening to the story told by Mr. Y and his friend, we thought it expedient to go further into the matter, that the shorthand notes of the examination of Mr. Y and of Mr. Z should be handed to Messrs. Wontner and Sons, as representing the police, and that at the future stages of the Inquiry the police might be represented by counsel, and Mr. Y, if he so pleased, might be also represented by counsel.

We therefore took the evidence in the case in private on the 11th, 13th, and 18th June, 1906.

Mr. Y told us that he was a motor engineer, carrying on business at (——), that he was 24 years of age, that he had heard of the appointment of the Commission, and in the first instance approached Mr. Timewell, the Secretary of the Police and Public Vigilance Society, and in consequence of what passed he made the application to us. Q. 48374, &c.

Shortly summarised Mr. Y's story was this. On the night of Saturday the (——) day of (——) 1906, he went to meet a young lady, whom for the purposes of our inquiry we shall call Miss A, by appointment at the London Pavilion Music Hall opposite the Criterion Theatre and Restaurant. He had known her for eight or nine months as the mistress of a friend of his. It appeared that he had promised during the week to take this friend on the Sunday for a drive with Miss A. He had been busy all that day, and had been somewhere in the country, so he wired to Miss A to meet him on the corner of the Pavilion at 12 o'clock (this telegram was not produced before us but was produced at the police court) in order to make the necessary appointment for the next day. He went to the rendezvous, and when he got there he found Miss A with a lady friend of hers, Miss B, whom he knew by sight, and by her Christian name; but she was nothing more or less than an acquaintance. He waited at the corner of the Pavilion for about five minutes before they came up. He could not tell where they came from Q. 48384 Q. 48385. Q. 48390. &c.

but, after waiting a few minutes, they arrived and took hold of him by the arm, and they started walking along, and had got as far as the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue
Q. 48396. and were waiting to cross opposite the Monico on the Glasshouse Street side. Just as they were going to cross a constable seized Miss A, and then turned round to one of his colleagues, and said, "Take the other one as well." The ladies started struggling and he (Mr. Y) said to them, "It is no good struggling; you will have to go—go quietly." Upon that the police were insulting to him. They told him to mind his own business, and Mr. Y told them that they could not say anything to him so
Q. 48399. long as he was assisting them. They crossed over to the Fountain then. One constable had hold of one lady and the other constable had hold of the other, and he (Mr. Y) followed. They went towards Vine Street, they crossed over
Q. 48401. to the Fountain (that is the centre of Piccadilly Circus) and there, as one of the women was struggling, they called upon a constable (No. 155 C.R) to assist them. They dragged the ladies along Regent Street, and Mr. Y kept saying to the one he knew "Don't be silly; don't struggle; I will come and bail you out." With that the constables used filthy language to Mr. Y; they told him to mind his own business, and he replied the same to them as he had previously said at the Pavilion until they got to Vine Street. At Vine Street, as they dragged the women through, one of the constables said, "Don't let that man through with the cap." Mr. Y insisted on going through, and they would not let him go through. In the meantime P.C. 155 had come out again, and then he said, "All right, if you want to come through, come through," and he dragged him in, and as they dragged him in, Mr. Y said, "You have no right to drag me like this." The constable said, "We will soon see about that." Mr. Y said, "What are you going to charge me with?" The constable did not reply. When Mr. Y got inside he was subjected
Q. 48404, &c. to the most filthy and abusive language, and was pushed down by one policeman—he thought it was P.C. 27, but he could not swear to it—and he was charged with rescuing. He says he was first pushed into the charge room and after that he was put in a cell. He thought he was told to sit down in the charge room. He stood, and was pushed down very violently but not by a blow. There were two constables near him. He thought one of them was 27 CR, and he called him (Mr. Y) all sorts of names. He could not tell the number of the other constable as he had not his pocket-book then, but he had it written down in a pocket-book at home. He said,
Q. 48411. further, that they called him all the filthiest names they could, and, being asked what,
Q. 48433, &c. he replied, "They called me a b—— ponce." The ladies had been already put in the dock and taken through into a cell before he (Mr. Y) was put into the dock, but he saw them in the dock. They were charged with being common prostitutes, and
Q. 48437, &c. nothing else, so far as he could remember. An inspector, or he thinks it was a sergeant, took the charge, he wrote it in a book, and, after he had written it in a book, he told the young ladies that they were charged with being common prostitutes. He did not remember anything else. On being asked whether Miss A or Miss B said anything in answer to the charge he replied "They very nearly fainted. They
Q. 48445 cried and shrieked, but I do not think they said anything very much. They said it
Q. 48446. was not true. They were asked what their profession was, and they said they were actresses." Mr. Y said they refused to give their addresses, and he believes
Q. 48452. they gave wrong names at the time. Being asked whether there was any disturbance in the charge room, he replied that there was no disturbance. While the charge was being made and being taken the only people who were talking were
Q. 48453. the constable who made the arrest and the sergeant and the young woman in the dock. Then after they had been taken away, he (Mr. Y) was put into
Q. 48460. the dock, and P.C. 155 CR. charged him. He said that P.C. 27 CR called him at the Fountain, and told him to arrest him (Mr. Y), and that he then arrested him
Q. 48464. and took him to Vine Street. The charge was "Attempting to rescue." The
Q. 48467, &c. sergeant took down the charge. Mr. Y denied it, and said it was absolutely false. Then Mr. Y was asked for his name and address, and he gave them correctly. Mr. Y
Q. 48472. told the sergeant he had walked to Vine Street absolutely alone and unmolested, and that he tried to persuade the girls to go quietly, also telling them that he would bail them out if they did so; and he added other details which it is not necessary to mention here.

In further examination he told us that upon this night there were a good many
Q. 48521 people in Shaftesbury Avenue and Piccadilly Circus, though he did not think there was much traffic at the time, as it was past the time of the theatres. At Swan and Edgar's there were crowds of people. There were not many people by the Pavilion, but there were plenty all round Swan and Edgar's, and the Fountain, and all up Regent Street. There was a big crowd following him when he was following the constables and the young ladies. The crowd remained behind and heard the altercation with the police. There were a lot of people standing round—packed. Q. 48524. Q. 48527. Q. 48530.

Mr. Y was allowed out on his own recognisances at 2 o'clock and offered himself as bail for the young ladies, but the inspector wanted more evidence as to his position, so he went back to his business place and brought back papers which satisfied the inspector, and they were allowed out a little after 3 a.m. In answer to a question from the Chair Mr. Y said he had never been drunk in his life, and he was nearly a teetotaler.

Mr. Y was accompanied before us by Mr. Z, who was a great friend of his, and who also gave evidence on the same occasion. It appeared that Mr. Z and a friend, Mr. Q, were walking towards the Pavilion Music Hall on this very Saturday night when they observed a disturbance just outside, and they subsequently saw Mr. Y arrested. These two gentlemen were there without any previous arrangement with Mr. Y, and their presence at the time of his arrest was a mere accident. Mr. Z said that their attention being called to a disturbance outside the Pavilion Music Hall, they noticed several policemen's helmets in the crowd; and he observed to his friend (Mr. Q) "Here is an arrest; let us see what happens." They accordingly tried to push across the crowd, and to follow the persons arrested across Piccadilly Circus and up Regent Street. They got to a big hoarding there, where a hotel was being built, and there was a small passage way to Vine Street Police Station. Just up there (seemingly up Half Moon Passage) the crowd were stopped by several policemen—he thought about six or seven—at the passage way. They got through, and were much surprised to see Mr. Y arguing with the policemen. Till then they had not seen him. As they got there (seemingly at Half Moon Passage) he thought it was P.C. CR. 27 who had just gone down the passage way, and he (the constable) turned round and said, "Don't let that fellow with the cap go down." He was quite close enough to hear that. Then he heard Mr. Y arguing. Then P.C. 155 C said, "Very well then, you shall come if you want it," and he took Mr. Y by the collar and ran him in. In the court P.C. 155 C stated that Mr. Y was arrested in Piccadilly Circus, but the witness Mr. Z absolutely denied it. The constable arrested him at the top of this passage for no reason whatever that he could see at all. Then the other constables moved the crowd on. They said, "Move on, move on," and pushed them all off. He went back to the garage where Mr. Y's business is, and was going to ring up some friends to see if he could get bail for him; and, while talking to Mr. Q, Mr. Y himself arrived. He and Mr. Y then drove down in a car to Vine Street and bailed the two girls out. He said that while waiting outside in the car a lot of policemen were coming on duty and they were impudent while he was in the car; he was not the driver nor the owner of the car; and that then a conversation that may be described as an "unfriendly altercation" took place. Q. 48695. Q. 48696. Q. 48698.

In answer to questions from the Chairman he said that he might have seen the two girls at the Fountain in the centre of Piccadilly Circus, but he should not have associated them with Mr. Y, and he did not at the time. He saw the two constables going up Regent Street with two girls and several fellows. Of course he did not know it was Mr. Y. He also said there is always a big crowd with an arrest there. He said that on the night in question the streets were very crowded, it was a Football Cup-tie night, and there were a lot of provincial people in the streets. They only got to the head of the crowd when they reached the passage leading to Vine Street. At that time the girls were just going down in custody. It was 27 CR. who shouted out, "Don't let that man with the cap go through." 155 C was then standing at the entrance to the passage way. He arrested Mr. Y and took him into the police station. He did not go with 27 CR. and the girls into the police station first before arresting Mr. Y. Q. 48703. Q. 48705. Q. 48707. Q. 48708. Q. 48709. Q. 48711. Q. 48713. Q. 48714. Q. 48715. Q. 48764. Q. 48766. Q. 48767. Q. 48771. Q. 48774.

In answer to Mr. Dickinson he said that he first became certain of the fact that there were two women in the case when he got to the entrance to the passage to Vine Street. He saw the two girls go in the passage, and when they turned round he recognised one of them by her dress and her bonnet, and he was sufficiently near to see them go down the passage. P.C. 155 C did not go down the passage with the girls, and then he saw Mr. Y arguing with him. As far as he could remember, Mr. Y wanted to go down the passage way to the police station, but the police constables would not let him, and they would not let any body go down the passageway. He had seen Mr. Y in the course of the day, but did not speak to him during this occurrence. At the police court he laid emphasis on the fact that it was at the entrance to the passage that Mr. Y was arrested because the police said they arrested him at Piccadilly Circus by the Fountain, and that was not true.

Having taken the evidence of these two gentlemen, and obtained from Mr. Y the names and addresses of Miss A and Miss B, we adjourned the further proceedings, and, having considered the matter, we determined to inquire into the case.

We summoned Mr. Stanley Savill, Chief Clerk of Marlborough Street Police Court, and he was good enough to attend before us on the 13th June and to produce the register of the court sitting at Marlborough Street on Monday the (——) day of (——), 1906 ; and we subsequently obtained the charge sheets in the cases of Miss A, Miss B, and Mr. Y, and Mr. Savill also produced the original notes of evidence taken by him in the three cases.

The Notes of Evidence are as follows :- -

In the Case of Miss B. (Case No. 24.)

Walter Howell, P.C. 22 R. [Howell should be Earl. Mr. Savill said that a mistake was made as to the name.] At 12.30 a.m. on the (——) of (——). Piccadilly Circus. Defendant annoying gentlemen by catching them by the arm. One she stopped at Windmill Street and one in Shaftesbury Avenue. Prostitute. There nightly. Struck me twice in face with fist when I took her.

Cross-examined.

Had not hold of a gentleman by the arm when I took her. She was with another woman. Another constable took the other woman. At the corner of Windmill Street I saw a gentleman whom she accosted shake her off. I did not see the man (Mr. Y) with her. She did not strike me twice in the face until after I had gone a few yards with her.

O.R. £5 for six months.

In the Case of Miss A and Mr. Y.

(Cases 30 and 31.)

P.C. Caladine, 27 CR. At 12.30 a.m. on the (——) day of (——). Piccadilly Circus. Saw defendant (Miss A) stop two gentlemen corner of Windmill Street. I requested them to pass away. They did so towards Coventry Street. Shortly afterwards the defendant (Miss A) returned and I saw her stop another gentleman there. She went on towards Shaftesbury Avenue. When I took Miss A into custody the man (Mr. Y) came up and said, "You are not going to take her," and tried to get her away. The woman walks Coventry Street and Regent Street. The man (Mr. Y) was close beside Miss A when taken into custody.

P.C. William Wood, 155 C. Saw 27, CR. with Miss A in custody. Saw the man (Mr. Y) come up and seize Miss A by the arm and try to get her away from P.C.'s custody.

Then Mr. Y was called.

On the (——) I sent Miss A a telegram (Produced) to meet her at Leicester Lounge. She is the mistress of a friend of mine. I subsequently met Miss A and Miss B at Windmill Street. They put their arms in mine and we walked towards the Pavilion. Near there a constable came up and took her. I told her to go quietly, and did not try to rescue her.

Then Miss A was called.

I met Mr. Y by telegram, and about midnight went with him and the girl (Miss B) and another gentleman friend to the Pavilion and going on through Regent Street when the constable arrested us. Miss B (the other prisoner) corroborated. The constable took me from Mr. Y's arm. I met Mr. Y by appointment at 11.45 at Leicester Lounge, and left with him at 12 o'clock.

Then Mr. Z was called.

I saw Mr. Y at Vine Street Police Station demanding to go in to bail someone. P.C. William Wood, 155 C, said, "You cannot go in." He (Mr. Y) said he wanted to go in and bail someone out. 155 C then took him.

Then Mr. Q said, I was with Mr. Z and I corroborate him.

O.R £5 for six months.

We issued summonses addressed to Miss A and Miss B, and proceeded to inquire further into the case in private on the 18th June, 1907, when Lord Russell appeared for Mr. Y, and Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir appeared for the police, but, owing to some misapprehension, counsel for the police had not understood that the formal inquiry would commence on that date, and were unable to proceed with the cross-examination of Mr. Y. Accordingly, it was arranged that the cross-examination should be postponed, and if we, after hearing the police witnesses, should think it necessary, the cross-examination of Mr. Y and of his witnesses should take place at a later stage of the inquiry. Neither Miss A nor Miss B was in attendance.

We accordingly took the evidence of P.C. Earl, 22 CR, P.C. Caladine, 27 CR, P.C. Wood, 155 C, Sergeant Lougton and Inspector Bex.

P.C. Earl was on double patrol duty with P.C. Caladine on the night in question from Windmill Street to the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue. The duty was called "double patrol" duty because he and the other constable were to make the patrol together. He and P.C. Caladine commenced their duty just before 12 o'clock midnight. They saw Miss A and Miss B for the first time that night at the corner of Windmill Street, Piccadilly Circus, at about twenty-five minutes past 12. There was no one with them when he first saw them, but they saw them stop two gentlemen at the corner of Windmill Street. P.C. Caladine spoke to them; the two gentlemen went up Windmill Street, and the two ladies passed on to Shaftesbury Avenue and the Circus, in front of the Pavilion. They spoke to two other gentlemen, one in front of the Pavilion and the other at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue, and then they were taken into custody. He took Miss B, and P.C Caladine took Miss A. He did not hear what P.C. Caladine said. He said to Miss B that he was taking her into custody for soliciting prostitution. She made no remark, but going across Piccadilly Circus she hit him in the face twice with her fist. Then he got hold of her hand to prevent her striking him again, and held her hand until they got to the station, where she was charged. There was no man with her when he took her into custody. He (P.C. Earl) went with his prisoner before P.C. Caladine went with his prisoner, and he did not see what happened to the latter or his prisoner. He had known both Miss A and Miss B by sight for six months. He had seen them together frequently and he had also seen them separately. He had also seen them soliciting prostitution—stopping men as on that occasion. Qs. 49188, 49199. Q. 49190. Qs. 49193, 49194, 49195. Q. 49196 Q. 49204. Q. 49207. Q. 49209. Q. 49210. Q. 49211. P.C. Earl was cross-examined very carefully by Lord Russell, but none of his answers disclosed any substantial variation from the story that he told in chief, and nothing to which attention need be specially called as tending in any way to shake the evidence.

In answer to the Chairman he said that Miss B was pretty fashionably dressed in blue, and that he had never heard her called by her name before, and that he had seen her frequently since. In answer to Mr. Rufus Isaacs he said that he had seen her and the other woman leave the "Leicester" with separate gentlemen and get into a cab. Asked what he had done as to giving them a warning, he answered thus: "Sometimes you caution them and tell them not to repeat their conduct again or otherwise you would have to arrest them. Other times you cannot get near enough to caution them They run away." He said further "Sometimes you have not cautioned them but they are repeating the soliciting of prostitution and you arrest them although no caution has been given." Pressed upon this point he answered: "If you get close enough to them there is a rule, and you are supposed to caution them. If you cannot get near enough to them, if they run away from you, and you see them repeating the soliciting of prostitution and annoying gentlemen, then you arrest them." The witness's attention was then called to the regulation in the White Book: "In the first instance the woman should be cautioned by the police on duty, and told to move on, and conduct herself properly. Should she refuse and persist in misconducting herself she should be taken into custody and charged with such offence." The witness also said that it had happened on more than one occasion that he had had to arrest a woman for soliciting whom he had not been able to get near enough to caution. He further in answer to the Chairman denied that it was true that the two prisoners that he and his colleague (P.C. Caladine) arrested were arm in arm with any gentleman at the moment of arrest, nor did he Qs. 49431, 49428, 49432, 49433, 49435. Qs. 49439, 49440. Q. 49441. Q. 49443. Q. 49445. Q. 49446. P.C. Caladine, 27 CR, said that on the night in question he was with P.C. Earl on double patrol duty. He joined P.C. Earl about a quarter to 12 at midnight. He said that he had seen the two women (Miss A and Miss B) who were taken into custody on that night on other occasions before the night in question, for as nearly as he could remember, from two to three months or something of that sort in Coventry Street, Leicester Square, Piccadilly, and Regent Street. He had seen them together, and he had seen them apart. His view as to their calling was that they were prostitutes, but he had never cautioned them prior to the night in question, and he could not say whether either had been arrested previously. He had seen them on the night in question, first at the corner of Great Windmill Street and Coventry Street, where they accosted two gentlemen. He told them to pass along. That is what he generally says if women are standing with gentlemen in the street. The two women passed along in the direction of Regent Street, while the gentlemen went up Great Windmill Street. He and P.C. Earl walked along in the same direction as Miss A, and Miss B behind them. He then saw them stop another gentleman in front of the Pavilion. Before they (the constables) got to them they left the gentlemen and went on. They (the constables) walked on, and he (P.C. Caladine) saw them accost another gentleman in Piccadilly Circus, and they (the constables) went up and arrested them. He arrested Miss A and P.C. Earl arrested Miss B. P.C. Earl went on with Miss B and he (P.C. Caladine) followed behind with Miss A. When he had got about ten or twelve yards from the kerb, his prisoner became violent, screaming and throwing herself about. Then a crowd began to collect, and a gentleman came out and took hold of her arm. That was he believed Mr. Y. The man whom he afterwards saw in custody. He had not seen him before, and he was not the man whom the two ladies had accosted at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue. Mr. Y took hold of her arm and said, "You are not going to take her." The constable said, "You leave the woman alone," and eventually he let go the woman. He seized her first ten or twelve yards from the footway facing Shaftesbury Avenue, just before they got to the Fountain. P.C. Caladine then went on with the prisoner just over to the corner of the Fountain pavement. Mr. Y kept on talking to this woman on the other side, and he (the constable) said, "You had better get away; you are only making the woman worse." He could not remember the exact words Mr. Y said. They got near Swan and Edgar's and near Air Street, and then the prisoner became very violent again. She screamed and holloaed, and Mr. Y came up again and took hold of her arm. The constable requested him again to leave go, and when he (the constable) saw P.C. 155 C he said to him "Will you take this gentleman into custody," not knowing Mr. Y's name then. He was then near Air Street. He (P.C. Caladine) did not actually see the arrest. In the meantime Sergeant 20 came up and took hold of the woman's other arm, and they then went to the station down Half Moon Passage. He saw no constables at the entrance to Half Moon Passage, nor were there any policemen at the entrance to the station except the one on the door. When he got inside the station Miss B was already there, and within two or three minutes, or something like that, Mr. Y was brought in. He charged Miss A, and Mr. Y was also charged. He did not hear anybody say as he was going into Half Moon Passage or at the entrance to the station, "Don't let that man with the cap come in."

Cross-examined by Lord Russell he said that he had seen the two ladies behaving frequently in that way before, speaking to different gentlemen in the vicinity of the Circus. He had seen gentlemen walk away from them as if they did not want to have anything to do with them. Being asked by Lord Russell whether up to that night their behaviour had been such that he had never required to caution them, he said, "No, they had not accosted before." When Miss A and Miss B came up to the last man to whom they spoke before the arrest, the constables were behind, and the gentleman was facing the ladies. They walked right in front of him and stopped him. He was walking towards them slowly. When he and P.C. Earl came up the gentleman walked away, and they took the woman into custody. He thought that one of them had hold of the gentleman's arm at the time, but he did not seem to resent it. He walked away. His prisoner tried to throw herself down more than once, and she also screamed very loudly. He did not tell Mr. Y to mind his own business. He had a kind of motor cap on, and he thought he had a kind of light dust coat on. Being asked whether he thought he would know the man, he said he would, and then, looking round the room, he identified Mr. Y. who was present. He simply told him to leave the woman alone, and he (Mr. Y) did not say anything about bailing her out, nor did he tell him that the woman had met him by appointment. He denied that Mr. Y was persuading the woman to go quietly. He did not hear him use words about going quietly, but he might have done so. He talked to the woman alone and did not argue with him (P.C. Caladine). He could not say where P.C. 155 C came from. There was a large crowd about at that time. He saw P.C. 155 C, and directly he saw him said, "Take this man into custody. I call on you to arrest him." The sergeant then came up and helped him to take his prisoner to he station. He did not actually see the arrest of Mr. Y, and so far as he knew it was quite possible that Mr. Y may have walked up a little way to the police station and been arrested. Q. 49753. Q. 49751. In answer to Mr. Dickinson he said that though he had known the two women for two or three months as frequenting the vicinity of this part of Piccadilly he could not say they did so regularly every night. He had not arrested them before because he never saw them actually accost men in his presence. Such persons do not as a rule give him the chance of getting near them to caution them. Q. 50006. P.C. Wood, 155 C, was on patrol duty on the Saturday night in question from Air Street to Piccadilly Circus. He saw P.C. Earl with a woman in custody near the County Fire Office. He (P.C. Earl) was crossing Piccadilly Circus with the prisoner, and he was then just about the Fountain. He saw a large crowd a short distance behind P.C. Earl, and he then saw P.C. Caladine with another woman in custody, and saw her struggling. Just by the Fountain he saw a man trying to pull away the woman from the police constable. The man would not let the woman go, and they walked across the Circus to Regent Street. He followed the crowd a few yards away from the constable and the woman. He saw the man catch hold of the woman by the arm again. It was the same man. The man was Mr. Y. He heard him say to the woman, "All right (——), go quietly." He did not hear him say anything else at all. P.C. Caladine called him to take the man into custody, and he did so near Air Street, and took him to Vine Street Station. He went quietly, walking along Regent Street and down Half Moon Passage. He did not notice any constables in Half Moon Passage when he got there, nor at the entrance to it. He did not hear anybody say, "Don't let that man with the cap come in," or any words to that effect. As far as he could remember, Mr. Y was wearing a cap. There were no constables outside the station, except the man on the door. He took his prisoner into the charge room and charged him. Q. 50024. Q. 50028. Q. 50029. Q. 50031. Q. 50034. In cross-examination by Lord Russell he said that at the time that P.C. Caladine asked him to take Mr. Y into custody the latter had the woman by the arm, and he said that he arrested Mr. Y instantly when the other constable told him to.

In answer to the Chairman he said that he had never seen either Miss A or Miss B before and that on that night he was on special duty—extra patrol—and he was one of a considerable number of extra men who were turned out for that kind of duty. He further said that after P.C. Caladine had ordered him to arrest Mr. Y, and before he actually did so, a large number of the members of the public got between him and P.C. Caladine and Miss A, and when P.C. Caladine got near Half Moon Passage there was a crowd between him and the witness (P.C. Wood), so that he could not actually see P.C. Caladine turning into Half Moon Passage; he simply walked through the crowd and did not notice any constables at that point. When he and his prisoner got to the corner of Half Moon Passage members of the public were going down the passage following P.C. Caladine. He walked with the crowd through the passage. When he got into Vine Street there were some persons there, but he did not see any other constables in the crowd, but he did notice the man usually on the door. He did not remember his prisoner saying anything. Qs. 50027, 50240, 50241, 50242. Qs. 50252, 50253, 50254. Q. 50270. Qs. 50259, 50260. Qs. 50261 50263. Q. 50264. Q. 50278. Q. 50293.

In cross-examination by Lord Russell, the witness said that Mr. Y was pulling the prisoner away from P.C. Caladine. He (witness) never heard him say anything, though he might have done so without his hearing it. He could not say that he was not advising her to go quietly.

Q. 50431 &c. Inspector Bex said that he was in charge of the Vine Street Police Station when the three prisoners Miss A and Miss B and Mr. Y were brought in, that he took the charges, and that he allowed Mr. Y out on bail at 2 a.m., and that the ladies were allowed to go out subsequently.

Observations on the Case.

We have now summarised the evidence which we obtained in regard to this complaint, and we may add that the fact that Mr. Q, who was a friend of Mr. Z, was not called before us, is not, in our view, of any importance, and we are quite ready to assume that he was with Mr. Z on the night in question, and that he would have corroborated his evidence as he did at the Police Court.

We regret that Miss A and Miss B did not avail themselves of the opportunity which we gave them of coming before us under circumstances which need not have given them the slightest embarrassment, whether they were innocent or guilty of the conduct attributed to them by the Police, as it afforded reasonable security against the annoyance of further publicity, and did not necessitate the ordeal of an examination in a public court.

We considered whether we should exercise our power of compelling them to attend, and we came to the conclusion, seeing that Mr. Y was represented by counsel, and was himself present when the Police witnesses gave an account of the circumstances which had led up to and accompanied the arrest of these two ladies, that we should be adequately discharging our duty by throwing upon these ladies the responsibility of deciding, through Mr. Y, with whom they were in communication, whether they would or would not come forward to vindicate, if they could, their characters. They did not do so, and we inferred, therefore, that they were content to let us draw our own conclusions from their silence. We therefore abstained from taking what might have been deemed the harsh and unnecessary step of enforcing their appearance.

We have now to decide whether any misconduct on the part of the constables concerned in this matter has been proved upon the materials afforded by the evidence which has been summarised above.

The conflict of evidence between Mr. Y and Mr. Z on the one hand, and the Police witnesses on the other, is limited to a comparatively small part of the series of events which led to the arrests of these persons on the night in question, and principally relates to details not vitally affecting the issue, so far as the arrest of the two ladies is concerned.

We thought Mr. Y gave his evidence in a very frank manner, which suggested good faith upon his part, but he did not conceal from us that he had been very much annoyed by what had taken place, and we cannot help coming to the conclusion, as to his own arrest, that, owing to youthful inexperience, he had, without any wrong intention, so behaved himself that his conduct was misunderstood by P.C. Calladine and P.C. Wood, and also that he was mistaken on some of the other incidents of the affair. We see no reason to disbelieve him when he says that he simply went to meet Miss A to arrange about a motor drive on the Sunday, that he was acquainted with her simply as the mistress of a friend to whom he referred, and that he was unaware of the fact that she was in the habit of frequenting Piccadilly Circus and the neighbourhood for the purpose of solicitation in a manner which indicated that she was by no means the faithful mistress which Mr. Y seems to have assumed her to be. That Mr. Y's complaint was genuine in the sense that he honestly believed that the constables behaved improperly in arresting the ladies, and subsequently himself, we see no reason to doubt, but it is perfectly clear that he was not informed of what had taken place before he joined Miss A near the Pavilion, and did not know that there was good ground for thinking that she was a common prostitute, nor had he considered the matter from the standpoint of the Police, upon whom is thrown the difficult task of maintaining order in crowded streets.

Mr. Z told us nothing about the arrest of the two ladies; he only spoke about the arrest of Mr. Y. We see no reason to doubt his good faith, but his statements are open to much criticism, and it is evident that he, like Mr. Y, greatly resented what took place, and we think that he unintentionally allowed his recollection to be coloured and biassed by what he hastily thought to be arbitrary conduct on the part of the constables, and perhaps to some extent allowed himself to be influenced by the altercation which he had with other constables outside the police station while he was waiting with a motor car after Mr. Y had gone to bail out the two ladies—an altercation which, so far as appears, was provoked by unnecessary observations by the constables referred to.

The three constables principally concerned in the case struck us as being intelligent and efficient. P.C. Earl had been twenty-one years in the Service, and P.C. Calladine had been fifteen years in the Service, and the defaulter's sheets of both are clean. P.C. Wood has not seen so much service, since he only joined the Force in 1902, but his record is entirely good. All three constables gave their evidence in a careful manner, and we noticed nothing in the demeanour of any one of them which suggested any ground for believing that he was speaking dishonestly. Such discrepancies or differences in their statements as are disclosed in their evidence do not amount to contradiction on material points, or to such inconsistency as ought to raise suspicion. They rather tend to confirm the honesty of their case as proving that there had been no improper combination with a view to fabricating an answer to the complaint.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the police story is in all essential particulars quite true, though as to one point, to which we refer below, we think that P.C. Earl and P.C. Calladine are mistaken.

The questions that arise in the case are two: First, whether P.C. Earl and P.C. Calladine were justified in arresting Miss A and Miss B; and, secondly, whether P.C. Calladine was justified in ordering P.C. Wood to arrest Mr. Y.

With regard to the first question there seems to be no ground for distinguishing between the cases of the two ladies. It is proved to our satisfaction that before this night, over a period of several months, both had been observed by P.C. Earl frequently walking at night in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly Circus accosting gentlemen in such a manner as to lead him to believe they were prostitutes. He said he had seen them doing so both together and separately; and his evidence is confirmed by that of P.C. Calladine. Their statements are entirely uncontradicted. These ladies had the opportunity of coming before us and denying the statements of the two constables, which, be it observed, were not made before us for the first time, but had been in substance made at the Police Court. They have not done so. We have come to the conclusion, therefore, that either they were common prostitutes, or that they had been for some time frequenting the streets in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly Circus, and behaving in such a manner that an unbiassed observer might properly and reasonably have come to the conclusion that they were women of that class.

It is also proved to our satisfaction that on the night in question they spoke to two gentlemen at the corner of Windmill Street; that P.C. Calladine ordered them to move along; and that they then walked on and accosted another gentleman in front of the Pavilion Music Hall.

P.C. Earl and P.C. Calladine both state that after speaking to the gentleman in front of the Pavilion Music Hall they left him, and accosted another gentleman at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue. It is as to this allegation that we entertain doubt, though not a doubt based upon any suspicion that the constables were speaking intentionally falsely. Mr. Y told us that he met Miss A and Miss B at the corner of the Pavilion, after waiting a few minutes, that they took hold of him by the arm, and that they started walking along, and had got as far as the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue, and were waiting to cross opposite the Monico on the Glasshouse Street side, and that, just as they were going across, a constable seized Miss A, etc. Mr. Y does not state that when they were waiting to cross the ladies still had hold of his arm, and it seems not at all unlikely that at that moment they disengaged themselves so as to act independently in crossing the street. We are inclined to think that Mr. Y is right in stating that the ladies joined him at the Pavilion, and that things happened as he said. It follows that the two constables are wrong in alleging that Mr. Y was not one of those whom they saw the ladies accost, and that the gentleman spoken to at the Pavilion and that the one spoken to at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue were different men. It must be remembered that all the witnesses agree in stating that the streets were very crowded (as experience suggests to us was quite likely to be the case) at the hour when the arrests took place, and that the two constables were not following the ladies immediately but at some little distance behind, and that the constables may have made a mistake upon a point which, after all, is not strictly material.

We think, therefore, that what really took place was that the two ladies met Mr. Y, as he says, and very likely took his arm, that they then walked on to Shaftesbury Avenue and stopped there, and that the ladies were arrested by the constables under the impression that they had, after they had been told to move on at the corner of Windmill Street, accosted, in the pursuit of their avocation, two separate gentlemen. Under these circumstances, the anger and indignation of Mr. Y, ignorant as he probably was of the true character, and certainly of the previous misbehaviour of the ladies on this night, at the sudden arrest of companions who were accompanying him by his own desire, was natural enough, and, from his point of view, not without good cause.

We have, however, no doubt that upon the state of facts which existed the constables were within their legal right in making the arrests. Though they had not complied with the regulation as to cautioning prescribed in cases where it is intended to prefer a charge under the Police Act, 1839, section 54, sub-section 11, they had ample ground for believing the two girls were prostitutes, from their behaviour during some two or three months previous to this night; and they had, in our opinion, just committed an offence under that sub-section by accosting two gentlemen at the corner of Windmill Street, one of whom shook off Miss B. It must be remembered that Mr. Y cannot wholly dissociate himself from his lady friends, and whether we are right or not in finding that the constables made a mistake in thinking they were soliciting Mr. Y for the purpose of prostitution, they contributed to the mistake by their conduct while on their way to keep Miss A's appointment with Mr. Y. Under the circumstances, however annoying the police action may have been to Mr. Y, the constables cannot be said to have been guilty of any misconduct.

The Arrest of Mr. Y.

The next question is whether the arrest of Mr. Y was justified.

Here again the case is very largely to be explained by the occurrence of a misunderstanding. We believe that Mr. Y did not intentionally wish to mislead us in his account of what took place after the ladies were taken into custody. It is perfectly clear that Mr. Y had no intention at all of effecting a rescue, and that, whatever the exact words he used were, his intention was to reassure and pacify the lady and simply to accompany her to the Police Station with a view to assist her as being the victim of outrageous and brutal conduct on the part of the police; but it is clear that he had lost his temper, though not without good cause, if the real circumstances had been those which he supposed; and we think that his conduct was a great deal more excited and ambiguous than he imagined, because he himself admitted that the police told him to mind his own business.

As to the place of the arrest, if we take his account literally, there can be no doubt that he is quite mistaken. In his account before us he told his story in such a way as to imply that his actual arrest took place in Vine Street, but it is clear, when the whole of his evidence is looked at in conjunction with that of his friend Mr. Z, that his arrest was effected not in Vine Street but before he got to Half Moon Passage. It looks as though he thought that Half Moon Passage was really nominally as well as actually a continuation of Vine Street.

There is a conflict of evidence between Mr. Y and Mr. Z on the one side, and the police witnesses on the other, as to the circumstances of the arrest. The former would have us believe that it took place after P.C. Calladine and Miss A had gone into Half Moon Passage, and after a noisy conversation with some constables. P.C. Calladine says that before getting to Half Moon Passage he found difficulty in taking his prisoner owing to the interference of Mr. Y, and that he called on P.C. Wood to assist him. If we thought that all the persons concerned had been equally calm and observant, and equally accurate witnesses, we should find very great difficulty in coming to a decision as to which version of the arrest is true. That Mr. Y is not accurate, though we do not believe his inaccuracy is wilful, is shown by his statement that P.C. Wood was called upon by P.C. Calladine to assist him in taking Miss A to the station, and that the latter (P.C. Calladine) went with the constable and Miss A through Half Moon Passage and then came out and arrested him (Mr. Y) after coming back. Now, in fact, there is no doubt that it was Sergeant Lougton who assisted P.C. Calladine with Miss A to the station and then came out again, and that P.C. Wood did not leave Regent Street till he had arrested Mr. Y and took him into the Charge Room. The inaccuracy on this point affords us some ground for thinking that Mr. Y was so upset by all that was taking place that his memory as to details cannot be trusted as against that of men who were simply doing their duty in the ordinary course. We therefore accept the police version of the arrest of Mr. Y, and though we do not believe that his acts amounted to anything like conclusive proof of an attempted rescue, still we think that his interference (though innocent in intention) was in fact of such a character as to amount to an obstruction of P.C. Calladine in the execution of his duty. That appears to have been the view taken of it by Mr. Denman, who, though he took what we regard as an entirely proper and lenient view of the matter, thought it right to bind Mr. Y over to keep the peace.

Under these circumstances we think there was no misconduct on the part of either P.C. Calladine or P.C. Wood in arresting Mr. Y.

Observations as to the Charges Preferred.

The form of the charges made against the female prisoners in this cases requires some comment. As it stands in the Charge Sheet it reads thus: "Common prostitute behaving in a riotous and indecent manner at Piccadilly Circus, Parish of St. James's." That seems to be intended for a charge under the Vagrancy Act, 1824; but the material words of that statute are: "Every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways or in any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner." In the charge taken and entered by Inspector Bex the words "wandering in the public streets or public highways or in any place of public resort" are omitted. That may, of course, have been done simply for the sake of brevity; but having regard to what Sub-Divisional Inspector Mackay told us about the practice which has arisen in the C Division of proceeding in many cases, which are strictly cases of solicitation, under section 54, sub-section 13 of the Police Act, 1839, the entry suggests to us some uncertainty as to the exact charge which was going to be preferred before the magistrate. If, however, we look upon the entry as an abbreviated form of a charge under the Vagrancy Act, we may legitimately ask why in this case it was not taken by Inspector Bex under section 54, sub-section 11 of the Police Act, because it seems to us that there was before him, seeing that the constables narrated the facts to him as they did before us, no evidence, or, at any rate, only the very slightest evidence, of either riotous or indecent behaviour on the part of Miss A and Miss B.

We are clear that nothing in fact was stated as to the conduct of either lady before the arrest which affords any evidence of riotous conduct; and we are inclined to think that mere accosting, and that merely stopping and speaking to men, even if there is every reason to suppose that it was done for the purpose of soliciting prostitution, does not amount to indecent behaviour within the meaning of the Vagrancy Act.

Inspector Bex had himself no recollection of this particular case, but we should think that the reason why he did not take the charge under the Police Act, section 54, sub-section 11, was the fact that the constable did not allege that either of the ladies had been cautioned in the manner contemplated by the Police Orders and Regulations. These contain the explicit instruction that where proceedings under the last mentioned section are contemplated "In the first instance the woman should be cautioned by the Police on duty, and told to move on, and conduct herself properly. Should she refuse and persist in misconducting herself, she should be taken into custody and charged with such offence as she may be guilty of, provided some inhabitant or passenger will attend at the police station and testify that he has been annoyed, or the constable himself has witnessed conduct by the woman which was evidently an annoyance to inhabitants or passengers."

White Book p. 339.

As we read the Regulation, it is not intended to apply to offences by common prostitutes under the Vagrancy Act, or to offences committed by women who may be prostitutes under the Police Act, 1839, section 54, sub-section 13. We can well understand that the authorities intended that a distinction should be made between cases properly coming under the Vagrancy Act and those properly coming under the Police Act, 1839, section 54, sub-section 11. It is clear that the Vagrancy Act, though applying to common prostitutes, was not intended to apply to such a case as that with which we are dealing. To apply to the conduct of Miss A and Miss B on the night in question, the words "wandering in the public streets or public highways or in any place of public resort and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner," is stretching the obvious meaning of the legislation unduly and improperly, for, in deciding the class of cases intended to be brought within those words, the whole scope of the Vagrancy Act must be considered; and we may observe that it has been held that it is not an offence under this section for a prostitute to take hold of a man's arm and solicit him. (R. v. De Ruiter and Others, 44 J.P. 90).

It is evident from P.C. Earl's evidence that there had arisen in his mind some confusion of thought, for being asked by Lord Russell whether, apart from solicitation, he suggested there was anything riotous or indecent in the behaviour of Miss B, he replied, "'Riotous and indecent' means soliciting prostitution—behaving in a riotous or indecent manner"—but immediately afterwards he said there was nothing in her behaviour that one could call riotous in the ordinary course, and nothing indecent, and that all he meant was that she was merely soliciting, and he went on to say that he told Inspector Bex exactly what he had told us. Later in his evidence, upon being questioned as to whether Miss B had been cautioned, he admitted that she had not been cautioned, and on his attention being called to the rule in the Instruction Book, he replied, "If you get close enough to them there is a rule, and you are supposed to caution them. If you cannot get near to them if they run away from you, and you see them repeating the soliciting of prostitution and annoying gentlemen, then you arrest them." He was then asked, "Do you mean you find in practice you cannot give them warning?" and he answered, "You cannot get near enough to warn them." He was then asked, "If that is the case, and you are quite certain of it, you disregard the rule and arrest the woman," to which he replied, "I do not say it is a rule." His attention was then called to the exact words of the Regulation, and on his being asked whether it had happened on more than one occasion that he had had to arrest a woman for soliciting, to whom he had not been able to get near enough to caution he replied in the affirmative.

This evidence, and some of that which we have received in other cases, shows that there is a good deal of uncertainty as to the form of the charge that ought to be made when women have been properly enough arrested for solicitation under circumstances which amount to an offence. Here, the result was that Mr. Denman did not convict, and, though we did not think it necessary to ask him what were his reasons, seeing that it was very unlikely that he had kept any note of the case, and could not be expected to remember its details, there can be little doubt that he took the course of binding the two ladies over to keep the peace because, though the constables were right in arresting them, the evidence hardly justified a conviction under the Vagrancy Act.

We think, therefore, that Inspector Bex made a mistake in taking the charge in the form adopted by him, but, having regard to the uncertainty as to the practice in dealing with the offence of solicitation at Marlborough Street Police Court, we do not think it right to say that the Inspector was guilty of such an error of judgment as calls for censure.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that Mr. Y's complaint was unfounded, and that the conduct of the police concerned in the arrest of Miss A and Miss B and Mr. Y was correct.

XVIII. PLATT'S CASE.

Among the communications which we received, there were several in which suggestions were made that bribery of Police Constables by street bookmakers for the purpose of their being allowed to continue their business without interference was a common practice in the Metropolis.

Our attention was attracted by statements made in writing and at interviews with the secretary by one Alfred Francis Platt, who, while confessing that he had carried on the business of a street bookmaker for many years, stated that he had quarrelled with the Police, and that he wished to make a clean breast of the whole thing. He averred that he had systematically bribed the Police in several Divisions in order that he might carry on the business, and that as part of the system he was arrested and convicted by arrangement from time to time; and he added that he was able to give corroborative evidence of his accusations.

We found upon inquiring further:—

(1) That Platt had been several times convicted for betting in the streets.

(2) That as a result of certain communications made by Platt at Kennington Lane police-station in the L. Division in which he alleged that a Police Constable, named Deed, had tried to obtain money from him by false pretences, and that he had paid him and other Constables sums of money, Police Constable Deed had been dismissed from the Force.

Q. 32120, &c. (3) That in the matter of an appeal brought by one Chapman before the South London sessions on January 15th, 1904, Platt had been called as a witness and had made in the witness box charges of bribery against the Police.

(4) That Platt had also made a complaint to the Chief Commissioner which led to a correspondence between them.

Q. 85. (5) Sir Edward Henry informed us that he had had many allegations of the Police being corrupted at all times by bookmakers, and he had had to deal with those cases when they had occurred.

We considered whether, under these circumstances, we ought to publicly inquire into the charges made by Platt, having regard to the terms of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867, Section 23, by which betting in the streets was prohibited and made an offence in regard to which power of summary arrest was given to the Police, and we came to the conclusion that the matter came within our Terms of Reference. The mere fact that Platt did not come before us with clean hands or a good character, whatever caution it ought to impose upon us in accepting any statement made by him was obviously not a sufficient reason for our not giving him an opportunity of making his charges, since in all cases of corruption involving the giving and receiving of money it is in general only one or other of the parties to the transaction who can give direct personal testimony as to the affair. While, therefore, we felt that it would be difficult to accept the uncorroborated evidence of Platt we thought it expedient to hear what he had to say and to give him the opportunity of affording us such confirmation of his accusations as might be within his power.

Accordingly the evidence of Platt was taken by us on October 18th, 1906, and he was allowed as nearly as possible to tell his story in his own way. In doing so he made general allegations that from 1886 up to 1906 during which time he had been carrying on this business of street bookmaking he had been in the habit of bribing constables in the ordinary course of his avocation; and he made definite charges against constables belonging to: (1) the L., (2) the G., and (3) the W. Divisions by name. He was allowed in the first instance to write down the names of the constables in the G. and W. Divisions accused by him on a sheet of paper which was handed to the Secretary and retained by us.

The investigation of these charges was necessarily spread over a considerable time as we did not think it would conduce to the interest of the Inquiry that we should pin down the complainant to complete his case without giving him the fullest opportunity of obtaining corroborative evidence, and because we considered that having once taken up the matter we ought not simply to throw on Platt the burden of proof, but that we ought to regard it as our duty as the investigation proceeded to call before us any persons who could throw light on the transactions.

We took evidence in regard to these complaints on the following dates:—In 1906 on October 18th, 22nd, 26th; and in 1907 on January 30th and 31st, February 1st, March 26th, April 11th, 12th, 17th and 19th, and June 21st.

Platt was unrepresented by solicitor or counsel, and the various officers and Constables concerned were represented by Mr. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and Mr. R. D. Muir.

Having regard to the extent of the evidence, and the conclusion that we have come to, we do not think it necessary to give any summary of the evidence of the witnesses, but that it will be sufficient if we refer to the relevant parts in the course of our observations.

Career of Platt.

Alfred Francis Platt, who at the time that he entered into communication with us resided at 7, Bird Street, Brook Street, Kennington, was by occupation a cabman, duly licensed by the Commissioner of Police, and he carried on that occupation in the Metropolis, though not regularly, until his licence was withdrawn finally by the Commissioner in February, 1904.

As far back as 1886 he commenced carrying on the business of a bookmaker, and, as we understand from him, from that year down to 1906 he continued to do so for longer or shorter intervals during the racing season in each year. He sometimes did so in the street, in accordance with a system which seems to have been followed by a very considerable number of persons in nearly all parts of London, and sometimes used or conducted betting premises which he took for the purpose in Oakley Street, Lambeth, but, in consequence of raids upon such premises made by the police, he and others were forced to give up that method of carrying on their illegal operations, and thenceforward Platt conducted his transactions in the street.

Down to the summer of 1903 he seems to have been fortunate in escaping arrest for street betting, as he had been only once convicted up to that time. On May 29th, 1903, however, he was arrested by P.C. Powell, 203 L., who was accompanied by P.C. Soer, 204 L., and convicted at Southwark Police Court and fined £1 on the same day under the name of Alfred Smith. He was also arrested on three other occasions, namely, August 1st, September 28th, and October 13th in that year, and was on each occasion convicted and fined under the same name.

On October 17th, P.C. Deed, 180 L., made a bet with Platt by handing him some time between two and three o'clock what is called a "slip" together wth two sovereigns. A dispute arose between Platt and the constable about this bet. P.C. Deed demanded £22 from Platt on the ground that the horse named in the "slip" had won a race, while Platt contended that the race in which the horse mentioned had won had been run and the result known before he received the "slip" and the money, and that P.C. Deed was trying to cheat him and pressing his claim by way of blackmail.

The result of the quarrel was that on Monday, October 19th, Platt made communications which led to observation being kept on both Platt and P.C. Deed on that Monday evening, and to Platt's having an interview on Tuesday, October 20th, at 11.30 a.m., at the Kennington Road police-station with Superintendent Noviss and Subdivisional Inspector Spencer, at which he complained of P.C. Deed's conduct, and made certain statements to those officers. That constable was thereupon suspended on October 21st, 1903, and, after inquiry duly held, was on October 23rd dismissed from the Force for "improperly leaving his patrol and making a bet with a bookmaker whilst specially employed keeping observation to detect betting, and considered unfit for the Police Force."

After the part which Platt had taken in securing the dismissal of P.C. Deed he appears to have thought that it had become impossible for him to continue his operations as a street bookmaker within the L. Division, and, in fact, he has not since that event done so there at any time; and, except as regards the proceedings upon an appeal to quarter sessions brought by a bookmaker called Harry Chapman, who had been convicted upon summons by the Police Magistrate at the Southwark Police Court on October 24th, 1903, he has had nothing to do since then with the Police of the L. Division in connection with any betting transactions.

The appeal of Chapman was heard at the South London sessions on January 15th, 1904, when Platt gave evidence in support of the appeal, in the course of which he made allegations of bribery against Ex-Police Constable Deed and other Constables of the L. Division.

On November 19th, 1903, Platt wrote to the Chief Commissioner a letter complaining that, besides P.C. Deed, P.C. Soer, 204 L., P.C. Gunn, 209 L., and P.C. Powell, 106 L., had been in the habit of receiving from him a weekly wage, and that his arrests had been pre-arranged between him and the constables. He subsequently wrote other letters to the Chief Commissioner, and on March 14th and 24th, 1904, (after the refusal by the Chief Commissioner to renew his cabman's licence) to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. These letters and the correspondence which ensued will be found in the Appendix to the Evidence.

As to where, or during what period during the years 1904 and 1905, and the early part of 1906, he carried on the business, if at all, he gave us no information nor having regard to the course of the investigation was it very material to inquire, but in May, 1906, he entered into relations, the precise character of which is in dispute, with two bookmakers named J. W. Fisher and C. R. Fisher, who had been for some time engaged in street bookmaking in the Clerkenwell Sub-division of the Finsbury Division. According to Platt's account he, together with his brother-in-law (P. McCarthy), engaged the two Fishers as their agents for carrying on the business in Clerkenwell, and there is no doubt that from the end of the first week of May, 1906, Platt, McCarthy and the two Fishers, did carry on a business on some terms or other down to the last week in June, 1906, when the arrangement came to an end owing to Platt's failure to discharge his financial obligations. Subsequently to that time, Platt does not seem, directly or indirectly, to have been concerned in street bookmaking.

As to these facts about Platt's career, there seems to be no doubt, and we may therefore assume, without hesitation, that he had for many years been actively engaged in this illegal business.

Platt's Allegations Against the Police.

Platt's allegations against the Police were made both in a general and in a particular form, that is to say, he told us that during all these years in which he had been carrying on this business he had been in the habit of bribing and treating the Police with a view to being allowed to conduct it with as great a degree of immunity from arrest as possible, and he also alleged that among the constables whom he had bribed were men belonging to three Divisions whose names he gave us. In the statement which he originally made to us we were informed that he had habitually bribed Deed and three other constables in the L. Division, and that he had done, through certain agents, the same thing in the G. Division.

When Platt came forward as a witness he was allowed by us to make his statement in his own way, and the result is that it is not easy to formulate in a very accurate manner the general charges that he makes. The following extract, however, sufficiently indicates what he wishes us to believe had been his relations with the Police—relations which he hints, if he does not expressly aver, were similar to those which had existed between the Police and other bookmakers.

Q. 7083. (1) Being asked to explain how he came into contact with the Police, he said :—

"I have been in connection with them all the years I have been betting. In the different Divisions of the Police I have conducted betting I have always found that if I gave a certain price I could always get a man to do what I required. I could always buy him at his price, and we men who are betting in the streets know best ourselves how to handle them."

Q. 7086. (2) He informed us that he first began business in Lambeth in 1886. He said that
Q. 7090. he had always paid money to the Police from the very first. In answer to the
Q. 7091. question : "When did you first have anything to do with any Policeman at all ?"
Q. 7097. he replied :—

Q. 7099. "The first day I started . . . . in a convivial way ; a drink after I started business, which they very soon found out, and, of course, 'You can come round Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, whichever day is suitable and whichever hour of the day is suitable for you, and there is a trifle for you,' whatever I thought at the time, according to what I thought of the man or according to his disposition, what I thought I would give him."

He said that he remembered the names of some of the constables that he had bribed in that way in 1886, 1887, 1888, and so on. He said :—

"There are some of them on pension, and several of them are dead." Q. 7102.

(3) He told us that during those years constables belonging to the C.I.D. were told off for the purpose of observing, catching, and arresting street bookmakers, but that in 1903 an alteration was made, and constables belonging to a particular Division, in which it was found that street bookmaking was going on, were sent out in plain clothes for the purpose of dealing with bookmakers. He said :— Q. 7105.

"The system at times was that they sent out Police Constables in plain clothes to arrest us sort of men, and knowing the feeling created amongst the different officers—it is a thing amongst us sort of men—we get hold of a constable by the ear. These men who were put on that special duty in 1903—I believe you will find it was continuous—were out for months, but I think at the present time they are changed every week, or every fortnight. At this particular time, 1903, these men were out continuously."

(4) Other general allegations were made by Platt from time to time on some of the numerous occasions when he was recalled ; and he told Mr. Muir that down to quite recently he had been in the habit of bribing members of the Police Force in order that he might not be molested in the business of a bookmaker. Qs. 8328. 8330. 8332.

If Platt's evidence had stopped with general allegations of that sort, whatever might have been our suspicion as to the occurrence of occasional bribery of some constables during Platt's twenty year's career as a more or less regular bookmaker, we might not have thought it worth while to have gone into the matter further, but, as he firmly asserted that he was in a position to give the names of constables in the L. and other Divisions to whom he had given money, we thought it right to allow him to proceed. He readily specified ex-P.C. Deed, P.C. Soer, P.C. Gunn, and P.C. Powell, as constables in the L. Division whom he charged with this misconduct. He was somewhat reluctant at first to give the names of constables in other Divisions, but ultimately he wrote down on a sheet of paper, which we did not immediately make public, the names of certain constables in the V. and W. Divisions, and in the G. Division, who had, according to him, received bribes.

Apart from his general allegations, his case against the Police resolves itself into three sets of charges :—

(1) Those against the four above-mentioned officers in the L. Division ;
(2) Those against the members of the V. and W. Divisions ; and
(3) Those against the members of the G. Division.

We propose to treat these three sets of charges separately.

Before, however, going into the details necessary for the investigation of these specific charges, we ought to say that at the end of what may be called Platt's evidence in chief, certain considerations peculiar to cases of this kind were present to our minds and determined the subsequent course of our dealing with the matter. The first was that Platt's acknowledged career was one which must prejudice his character as a witness. The second was that in cases of corrupt bargain, of improper bribery, and the like, it is not safe to brush aside a party to a transaction simply because he avows his complicity, as if that course were taken it would be practically impossible to detect such misconduct at all. Thirdly, we felt, however, on the other hand that every constable engaged in the work of attempting to prevent the continuance of this illegal business was very much at the mercy of any bookmaker whom he might arrest or molest, and that it was quite easy for Platt, or for any other person engaged in this kind of business, to make false charges against members of the Force. Under the circumstances, seeing that we had been warned by Sir Edward Henry, and that we knew from the Returns which he furnished to us, that bribery by bookmakers had been proved against constables on a good many occasions during the last ten years, we felt it expedient to allow Platt the opportunity of substantiating, if he could, his charges against the constables whom he had named, and, for that purpose, of giving such corroborative evidence as he might be able to obtain, or which might incidentally be afforded by, or arise out of, the evidence of any witnesses who might be called to throw light upon the matter in the course of the Inquiry.

After the cross-examination of Platt by Mr. Muir the Inquiry assumed the form of a search for such corroborative evidence. The confirmation of the charges might be derived: (1) from the testimony of some independent and credible witness, who was a spectator of some dealing between Platt and the accused constables; (2) from some document which came into being in the course of Platt's transactions; or (3) from inferences to be drawn from the admissions or the conduct of the constables implicated by Platt's account.

Platt was subjected to a very close and able cross-examination by Mr. Muir, but it does not seem to us necessary to go over what was touched upon or developed during its course, though we may say at once that its effect was very damaging to Platt's credibility. It made clear that the witness could not be relied upon as to figures or dates, or the details of any transaction; that he had in his possession no documents throwing any light upon his relations with the Police which came into existence before the summer of 1906; that he had kept no books, or none which had been preserved as to his business; and that, except as to the allegations of bribery against members of the G. Division, there was nothing of any kind in writing to support either his broad allegations of bribery or his particular accusations against divers constables whom he had mentioned. It also brought into prominence certain suggestions as to circumstances in Platt's career touching his honour as a betting man, as to which his explanations were by no means complete or convincing. Incidentally, it disclosed the fact that he was addicted to drinking, and that he conducted his affairs in a very slipshod and unmethodical way.

Damaging as Mr. Muir's cross-examination was, it did not leave upon our minds the impression that Platt was a thoroughly dishonest man, whose allegations must necessarily and at once, be dismissed as of no value as was, for instance, the case with ex-Police Constable Deed, as to whom we have something to say later on.

Of course, if Platt had come before us asking for some kind of redress which we were able to afford him, we should probably have thought it necessary to carry the matter no further than to tell him that he was not coming before us with clean hands, and that his story was so full of contradictions and inaccuracies as to the details of his case that we must give judgment against him at once. But that was not the aspect which the matter presented to us. From amidst the very vague allegations, the contradictory statements as to the amounts that he gave to different Constables, and the hints as to the practices of those whom he called "us sort of men," there emerged the fact that he had for many years carried on his business with little hindrance from the Police till the year 1903, when the Deed incident, and the consequences that followed, brought him before Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer at Kennington Lane Station on October 19th.

Besides this, it must be remembered that Platt's evidence must be considered in conjunction with the other information in our possession. We know that for many years past, and up to 1896, this business of street bookmaking has been carried on by a large number of men in all parts of the Metropolitan area according to systems which, with slight variations of detail, conform to a common type, which afforded opportunities to all classes of persons who chose to avail themselves of them of indulging in betting as to the result of horse racing on every day when a meeting for the purpose was being held in the United Kingdom.

System of Street Bookmaking

We may here mention what the system was in its broad outlines, since sooner or later it will become necessary to do so in order to make the evidence as to the alleged bribery of men of the G. Division intelligible.

Shortly stated, the method adopted by these bookmakers was as follows. A man who wishes to make a book, and to carry on that business in the street, takes his stand at a particular place which, in the slang of the business, is called a "pitch," or he gets an expert agent to stand there to do the work of betting for him. It is of course essential that persons who wish to come and bet should know where to find the bookmaker or his agent. The fact of the illegality of the business, of course, prevents any very open and clear public advertisement, and the fact that a bookmaker may be found at a particular place can only be gradually made known in the neighbourhood among the classes who are in the habit of betting, but in time the locality of the "pitch" becomes known and customers expect to find the bookmaker on or near the pitch from about twelve o'clock on each racing day. A bookmaker acquires, as against all other members of the fraternity, after carrying on the business for a time, by etiquette, a proprietary right in his "pitch," and it would be thought quite wrong for any other bookmaker to come and stand on the "pitch" belonging to another.

By common understanding between the bookmaker and all persons with whom, on any given day, he makes a bet, the transaction is governed by certain rules or conditions which the bookmaker has printed on a card, which is discreetly circulated in the neighbourhood, or among persons who desire to bet. The Rules or Conditions do not appear to have been identical in all cases, but there does not appear, so far as we can gather, to have been any very great variation in them in substance. Several of these cards were put in in the course of the proceedings before us, and we may here refer to one issued by J. Forbes, London, who was called as a witness. It is unnecessary for our purpose to give the details of the Rules or the conditions of the betting.

Probably only very few of the persons who actually make a bet with a bookmaker have seen or studied his printed card, but, in practice, if a dispute should arise, the card is appealed to, and payment has to be made to or withheld from a customer by reference to the Rules or Conditions contained therein. Of course, there is nothing to prevent a customer from making a special bet with a particular bookmaker on his "pitch," but if he takes the course which we shall describe in a moment, it is understood that the bet is made on the conditions of the card.

The customer has, of course, nothing to do with the relations between the bookmaker who is ultimately responsible for the payment to him of any bets which he may win and the agent on the "pitch" with whom he makes the bet, and probably in the great majority of cases he does not know that the man on the "pitch" is simply an agent and not a principal in the matter ; so that in practice the man who makes the bet deems it a point of honour that he himself should meet all claims at the appointed time and place.

The choice of a "pitch" is a matter of very considerable moment, because its convenience depends upon several considerations. On the one hand it must be easily accessible to the generality of the people in the neighbourhood who wish to bet ; but, on the other hand, it must not be in too noticeable a position where a crowd might too easily collect and the attention of the Police be attracted, and it should be so placed that there should be easy opportunities of escape in case transactions are observed, and some constable approaches.

In practice, the "pitch" is always near some public-house into which the bookmaker or his customer may retreat if there is ground for thinking that some detective officer is watching. We should think that most of the "pitches" have been very adroitly chosen for adding to the difficulties in the way of a constable catching a bookmaker at his work, and of getting such evidence as would justify a conviction by a Magistrate. It may be added that a "pitch" is usually guarded during racing hours by "scouts" or "lookers out," who are paid small sums for giving timely notice of the approach of a constable in uniform or of any one believed to be a detective or constable in plain clothes.

The manner in which a bet is actually made by a customer is by handing a "slip" (i.e., a piece of paper) on which is written particulars of the race, the name of the horse backed by the customer, and the amount for which he backs the named horse. Usually, the customer encloses in the "slip," or separately hands to the bookmaker, the amount named on the "slip" in cash, and if that is not done, the transaction is not recognised unless there is an express or implied agreement for credit. If a customer is well known to a bookmaker, a bet may, with his consent, be effected by handing the "slip" over without the money if there is a verbal bargain to that effect; and this method of dealing is called betting "on the nod."

A bookmaker is not, of course, able, in the street, to make any entry in a book at the moment, nor does he hand a card or give any receipt to a customer who, from the very necessity of the case, is bound to place implicit confidence in the integrity of the bookmaker. The latter places quickly and secretly the "slips" and the money in his pocket, and, for the most part, he is bound to keep them there accumulating in his pocket, taking the risk that they afford conclusive proof against him in case he should be arrested; but it is not unusual for him to leave his "pitch" at intervals in order to hand over the slips and money to some confederate in a public-house near by, or in some adjacent place where he can disburden himself in secrecy, or else only under the observation of absolutely friendly eyes.

The method of settlement is probably not entirely uniform, but in all cases there is an understanding that the bookmaker will be found in the evening or some time the next day at a particular hour at a particular place where the customers who have won are expected to attend to receive their winnings. This, of course, involves the prompt making up by the bookmaker of the accounts of the day; and, of course, if, on all the transactions there should be a loss, he has to find the balance over and above that which he has taken in order to discharge his debts.

Where the bookmaker on the "pitch" is the principal in the transaction in the sense that he is running the "pitch" on his own account, the making up of the accounts is a matter for himself alone, but where, as in the G. Division, Platt engaged in the adventure in partnership with McCarthy, and it may be with one of the Fishers also, and employed the brothers Fisher as his agents on a "pitch" at Sutton Street, the making up of the accounts each day is a more elaborate affair, which requires the keeping of books and the making of written memoranda.

Measures to Suppress Street Betting.

In the next place, we must bear in mind that the existence of this system of street bookmaking was well known to the Police and a very considerable number of convictions took place each year which show that the Police were making an effort, though by no means a successful effort, to prevent its continuance, and to put down breaches of Section 23 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867. Not only the superior officers, but a large number of the constables in each Division must have become fully acquainted with the system which we have described, and under which the business was being carried on. We gather that special measures were taken to put down street betting by the employment of officers of the C.I.D. in parts of the Metropolis where business was rife, though it was not intended to diminish thereby the responsibility of the constables in each Division for interfering with and putting down the offence. Having regard to the terms of Section 23, and the adroit manner in which the law was systematically evaded, it was practically impossible for a uniformed constable to deal with the offence effectively; and it appears that, though the exertions of detectives specially employed to discover and arrest offenders were by no means fruitless, it was found necessary in 1903 to take more effective steps, and, as we understand, the regular employment of officers of the C.I.D. for this special purpose was discontinued, and the practice adopted of sending out a number of plain clothes constables attached to a Division charged with the special duty of keeping observation on bookmakers, and of attempting to put down the business by taking proceedings by summons or by arrest whenever there was reasonably sufficient evidence to make it proper for a magistrate to convict. This was the method in vogue in the L. Division in the year 1903. We know, from the evidence given by the constables who were concerned in the arrest and prosecution of Platt in that year, how they endeavoured to discharge their duties, which necessarily involved duties of a detective character. They were allowed by their superior officers great freedom of action during the time in which they were engaged on their special duties, and it was left to their discretion, when they left the Police Station, to decide as to where they would go, and in what manner they would try to obtain evidence which might lead to the detection and punishment of bookmakers. They naturally adopted disguises which, from the description given, seem not to have been very skilful, with a view to escaping the notice of the "lookers-out" or "scouts" who might be posted around the "pitch," and which might enable them to approach a bookmaker and catch him in the act of conversing with three or more persons (the number mentioned in Section 23), and either taking "slips" from them, or else with "slips" in his pocket.

We are not concerned for the moment with the question whether this was a very effective way of dealing with the matter, or whether some other plan might not have been resorted to, but we think it right to call attention to the temptations to which it exposed the constables on this special duty, and to the facilities which it afforded them for accepting money from or being treated by bookmakers without any appreciable risk of discovery by a superior officer. It is one thing to allow the experienced and carefully chosen members of the C.I.D. to go about in plain clothes disguised in various ways, because such men are specially trained for work which it is impossible to discharge in uniform, and they receive extra remuneration for that kind of necessary work; but it is quite another thing to place constables whose ordinary work is discharged in uniform, and who have no special training for detective work, in a position which enables them to consort with possible offenders in the street, or to accompany them into public-houses, without attracting the attention of members of the public, and possibly escaping recognition on the part of superior officers. We are not saying that the authorities were wrong in reposing such great confidence in men with good records like P.C. Deed, P.C. Soer, and the others who came in contact with Platt; but, in considering the weight to be attached to the latter's accusations, we cannot but feel that the virtue of those constables was subjected to a very severe test for men in their position, receiving weekly wages by no means large, to whom gifts of even small amounts like 5s. and 10s. for doing nothing except looking the other way, or avoiding a particular "pitch" on a racing day, must have seemed gratifying additions to their earnings.

It seems to us right to look these facts in the face, especially when we consider the Police Returns as to bribery by bookmakers, which have been furnished to us by the Chief Commissioner.

We have, too, the ascertained fact that from May down to October, Platt was regularly carrying on his occupation on a "pitch" in Robert Street; and that that fact was perfectly well known to the four men who became implicated in his charges is clear, because he was arrested four times during those months at the very same place—on the first occasion at about 1.45 p.m., and on the other occasions at about 2.30 p.m., or 2.45 p.m., while on the numerous other racing days during that season he appears to have been quite unmolested. With the explanation given by P.C. Soer, P.C. Gunn, and P.C. Powell we deal below. Here, we refer to the fact as one which, in conjunction with all we know about this system of street bookmaking, gives to the evidence of Platt a significance which it otherwise would not have possessed.

The Inquiry into Platt's Complaint Against Police Constable Deed.

Before considering the specific allegations made by Platt against the constables he named we think it necessary to make some observations on the way in which the charges against P.C. Deed were dealt with by the Police authorities. Let us see, then, what was the course taken by Superintendent Noviss and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer of the L. Division when Platt brought P.C. Deed's conduct to their notice.

The facts are these. Platt called at the Kennington Lane Police Station on Monday morning, October 19th, and was seen by Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer, and a conversation took place during which Platt made a complaint against ex-P.C. Deed. It is not clear how far any positive course of action was agreed to, but it seems that it was understood that Platt was to arrange to see P.C. Deed at 8 p.m. on the evening of that day (Monday) at the "Tankard" public-house Brook Street with a view to testing Platt's statement as to P.C. Deed's conduct; however that may be, on the evening of this Monday Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer did keep observation on the movements of P.C. Deed.

Shortly after 6.p.m. on the same day (October 19th) Platt had an interview with Superintendent Noviss at Kennington Lane Police Station, and told the Superintendent that he had called with reference to a letter which he (Platt) had sent on the previous night complaining of a Police officer. The Superintendent had received no such letter and Platt said that he had not really posted the letter, but that about twenty yards away from the pillar post he gave it to a man whom he described to the Superintendent as "one of your own cloth" to be posted by him. Nothing seems to turn upon the letter, but, in view of what took place, the interview is important. There is some conflict of evidence as to what was said, but the Superintendent in his evidence made it perfectly clear that Platt not only complained to him about P.C. Deed having tricked him into a bet after a horse he was backing had won the race, but also that he charged P.C. Deed with accepting money from him.

The Superintendent's account of the interview is as follows (after Platt had referred to the letter which the Superintendent had not received):—

Q. 40538. "I asked him then what the letter contained. He said: 'It contained a complaint against a constable named Patsy, stationed at Kennington Road who tried to ramp him on a bet on Saturday. He came to me about 2.40 p.m. and gave me a paper with two sovereigns, saying: 'Here is a bet for you, you may as well have it as anyone else.' He also stated that the bet was made after the race was won, and the constable and a friend had been round to his house on several occasions since to demand the winnings, which were,
Q. 40539. I think, something about £20 . . . He afterwards said that when the constable gave him the paper he took him into the public-house and treated him and gave him 5s. I asked him if he had a witness, and he gave me the name of a man named Turner. I then sent for Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer, from Kennington Road, and he attended very shortly afterwards. I asked Platt to repeat the statement that he made to me respecting the constable, and he did so. I ordered the Sub-divisional Inspector into plain clothes, and told him to keep observation at the "Tankard" public-house, Kennington Road, where Platt had informed me previously a friend of his had made arrangements to meet the constable. Platt then left my office and so did the Sub-divisional Inspector. On the following morning I again saw Mr. Platt and the Sub-divisional Inspector."

On the next day (Tuesday the 20th) the Superintendent again saw Platt, and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer, in the presence of Platt, informed the Superintendent of what he had observed as to P.C. Deed's conduct the night before. The Superintendent then arranged with Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer and Platt to attend at Kennington Road Station the same morning at eleven o'clock in order that their statements might
Q. 40541. be made in the presence of P.C. Deed. During this conversation Platt made a general statement that it had cost him £3 10s. a week for years past for Police. The Superintendent told us:—

Q. 40544. "I asked him whether it was given to the C.I.D. or to the uniform men. He declined to say, and his last words almost to me just before he left my office on the morning when I invited him to give me any particulars, he refused to do it, and just as he was about to leave my office he struck his left breast with his right hand and said: 'I have notes in my pocket book.' I asked him particularly to show me his pocket book, and he said: 'No, I have no further complaint to make at present. I will see how this job gets on first.'"

Platt duly attended Kennington Road Police Station at eleven o'clock on Tuesday, the 20th, as arranged, and was there confronted, in the presence of Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer, with P.C. Deed. The statements of both were taken down in writing, and signed by them respectively, and P.C. Deed was permitted to put questions through the Sub-divisional Inspector to Platt, to only one of which we need call attention. P.C. Deed asked:—

"When I saw you at Waterloo Station did you not say to me: 'Who is that man there?' pointing to a friend of mine. 'I cannot get on my pitch as there are several strangers about. I thought he was a detective.'?"

to which Platt answered:—

"Yes, I asked that question in order to gain time, so as not to pay out."

On the same day Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer reported the result of the proceedings in the case of P.C. Deed, 180 L., and, on receiving his report, Superintendent Noviss deferred the case, but suspended the police constable on the ground that further inquiry was necessary.

On Thursday the 22nd, the inquiry was continued before the Sub-divisional Inspector who duly reported to the Superintendent, and, the Superintendent having made his observations on the case, it was referred to the Chief Constable before whom P.C. Deed appeared as a defaulter on the same day, and the constable, after the Report had been read to him, said :—

"I am very sorry, and have nothing to add to my report."

The case was thereupon referred to the Assistant Commissioner, and on Friday, October 23rd, P.C. Deed appeared before the Assistant Commissioner, and on being interrogated as to whether he had anything to say in his defence he replied :—

"I am very sorry. It was weakness on my part to do such a thing. I have never done such a thing before."

The Assistant Commissioner then gave final judgment on the matter in the following words :—

"You have done good work, I see, but I can find no grounds whatever to treat you leniently. You are employed to suppress betting, and while you are on duty you are found with the very men you are there to arrest. The amount of discredit you have brought on the Force is so incalculable you are unfit to remain. You are dismissed."

The proceedings in the matter are contained in documents which are printed in the Appendix to the Evidence, but the above appears to be the substance of what took place.

The dismissal is recorded on the same date (October 23rd) at the Executive Branch of the Central Office thus :—

"Dismissal (G.O., page 37, Pars. 124 to 128) L. P.C. 180–85303 Deed. Improperly leaving his patrol and making a bet with a bookmaker whilst specially employed keeping observation to detect betting, and considered unfit for the Police Force. Pay to 20th inst.—F.W."

The inquiry appears to have been conducted in accordance with the Orders and Regulations, and we have no comment to make on the course of the proceedings, but we are struck by the fact that, so far as the formal documents connected with the case are concerned, there is nothing to show that the allegations of Platt that he had given 5s. to P.C. Deed and treated him at the public-house were considered and dealt with as a substantive count in the charge against P.C. Deed, and no notice at all was taken of, and no inquiry was made into, the general allegation of bribery. The complaint was treated solely as a charge that that constable had improperly left his patrol and made a bet with a bookmaker.

On November 19th Platt made a complaint to the Chief Commissioner by a letter in which he said :—

"Respecting the statement I made of P.C. 180 L., who has been dismissed from the Force through the facts of my statement, I beg to state the complaint I made against the other three Police Constables, viz., 204 L., 203 L., and 209 L., which was in the presence of Superintendent Noviss and Inspector Spencer at Kennington Lane. The above officers were in the habit of receiving of me a weekly wage, and, moreover, they never fairly arrested me in my occupation as a street bookmaker. That was always prearranged as to what time they should come and take me into custody, which in the Charge Book will prove I was only charged between the hours of 2.30 p.m. and 3 o'clock p.m. It, moreover, has come to my knowledge the other three officers as above mentioned have not been punished or reprimanded, so I am sure you will give the matter your kind investigations, and act as you may think proper in the matter as regards the truth of my statements."

This letter was duly acknowledged on the 20th by the Chief Commissioner. Reports were thereupon called for from Superintendent Noviss, Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer, and from the constables named.

Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer made his report, which was countersigned by Superintendent Noviss on November 23rd. He states therein :—

"The assertion that he had paid a weekly wage to various Police Officers was made as stated, and he further stated he kept a diary in which the particulars were entered. He was invited to produce the diary, so that the necessary particulars as to numbers, names, etc., might be investigated; but he declined. When he made his complaint at Kennington Road Station, which I took down, I again invited him to tell all he knew; but he declined to give particulars, but made sweeping allegations against Police generally. Beyond the allegation of betting by P.C. 180 Deed (which was admitted by the Police Constable), he went on to say that he had given the Police Constable 5s. commission, and had paid for drink in a public-house for him. This was proved beyond all possible doubt to be untrue. He also stated that when charged on October 13th he handed 10s. to two Police Constables in the charge-room. This, also, is absolutely false. He has vacated the position he used to occupy, and one other man has been arrested there for the same offence, but he cannot be connected with Platt."

On the same day Superintendent Noviss in his Report stated :—

"I beg to state that when Platt made his complaint against P.C. 180 L. Deed, who was dismissed vide P.O. October 23rd last, he made a sweeping allegation against Police generally, stating that it cost him £3 10s. per week to pay them all. I invited him to mention any case, which he refused to do. He then said: 'I have notes in my pocket book.' I asked him to let me see it, which he refused, and stated: 'I have no further complaint to make.' In his complaint against Deed he stated that he gave him a drink and 5s. at the time he had the bet. He produced a witness, Charles Turner, who saw Police Constable Deed make the bet; but this man said Deed walked away and did not go into the public-house as Platt alleged. This proved that Platt's statement was false with respect to the drink and the 5s., which he alleged took place inside the 'Hero' public-house. The three Police Constables complained of have arrested or assisted to arrest Platt, alias Smith, and the times of arrest vary from 1.45 p.m. to 2.45 p.m. On each occasion he pleaded guilty, and made no complaint at the station when charged to the officer on duty. Platt is a low-class man, and his associates are the same. Police Constable Deed was improperly leaving his patrol and making a bet with a bookmaker whilst specially employed keeping observation to detect betting. The facts were admitted by the Police Constable. The complaint is undoubtedly made through spite against the three Constables, who have done excellent work in respect to street betting, and have clean records. I have no doubt that Platt's object of complaining is to intimidate Police from doing their duty, as no other officers only those mentioned in the complaint have been employed on this duty on Kennington Road Sub-division."

Upon these reports, we remark that, according to Platt's account of the interviews, he did bring to the notice of the Superintendent and of the Sub-divisional Inspector the numbers, if not the names, of the men whom he said he had bribed. He said that at the interview at which Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer read to Superintendent Noviss an account of his movements on the Monday night, he walked up and down the room, and said :—"After the moneys that I was giving them," or words to that effect, and that Superintendent Noviss made an exclamation to Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer, "I knew this sort of game was going on." That interview appears to have been the one which took place at Kennington Lane Police Station on the morning of Tuesday, the 20th. Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer remembered Platt walking about the room, but he did not remember the observation, "After the moneys I have given" being made by him, and added that he made sweeping allegations, but what the exact words were he did not then remember, nor did he recollect Superintendent Noviss making any exclamation to the effect that he knew "this sort of game was going on," but he did not think he did. Superintendent Noviss denied that he said anything that indicated that he thought that sort of thing (i.e., bribery) was going on.

Platt also said that at the interview between him and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer on the same morning at the Kennington Road police-station he told him about the arrangement he had made as regards the times of arrest, and said :—"If you will look into the Charge book you will see what times I was brought in," and that the Inspector then referred to the Charge book and then made entries on a slip of paper, the point being that by doing that the Inspector became acquainted with the names and numbers of the constables Platt was accusing. The Inspector, in his evidence before us, admitted that he did look at the Charge Book in order to verify the times of arrest referred to by Platt.

We do not attach much importance to the details of what passed at these interviews, and, so far as there is a conflict of evidence, we believe the statements made by Superintendent Noviss and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer in preference to the versions of the conversations given by Platt.

It sufficiently appears from what the Superintendent admitted that he quite well understood that Platt was alleging that he had been paying £3 10s. a week in bribing constables, and he must have inferred from that that it was paid with the intention of obtaining as much liberty as was possible to carry on his illegal business. He and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer had before them, after the proceedings against Deed had commenced, full particulars as to the number of times that Platt had been arrested in the course of the summer, and as to the names of the constables who had effected the arrests, and those who appeared as witnesses on each occasion; and he knew that during the months of May to October, 1903, the four men who had been told off in plain clothes for the purpose of keeping observation on bookmakers were P.C. Deed, P.C. Powell, P.C. Soer and P.C. Gunn. That being so, however general this allegation of bribery was, it would appear that these officers understood it to refer to these four constables, and it is natural to ask why inquiry was not made at once into the whole matter. Superintendent Noviss told us it was the first time he had known such an accusation made in all his experience. We accept his statement though it appears startling when one reads it in the light of what we know from the confidential Police Returns as to the number of constables who have during the last ten years been dealt with on this very charge of bribery by street bookmakers. But whilst accepting his statement, that it was the first time in his experience that he had known such an accusation made, we are entirely at a loss to see why that should be any reason for his not inquiring into it. On the contrary, seeing that a man of the Superintendent's experience of the world must have been aware that there is always danger of corruption wherever large numbers of men are employed, we should have thought he would have been placed on his guard and would have deemed it his duty to investigate the matter thoroughly. Nor is our astonishment lessened by reading the Report of the Superintendent dated October 22nd, 1903, which he ends with the reflection that:— Qs. 40768. 40769. 40770. 40771.

"Police Constable Deed has hitherto performed his duty very well and has been engaged on special observation on this and other divisions respecting betting, and I cannot understand why he was so foolish as to bet under such circumstances for a man he knew practically nothing about."

without a word of comment on the improbability of the explanation given by the constable.

We cannot avoid asking ourselves, therefore, why the inquiry made by the Superintendent was of so limited a character. Accepting to the full the accounts given by Superintendent Noviss and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer as to the conversations between them and Platt, and therefore rejecting Platt's statement that he had by name referred to P.C. Gunn, P.C. Soer, and P.C. Powell as men whom he had bribed, they must have known that Platt's real complaint was not that P.C. Deed had been guilty of a breach of discipline in making a bet with him, but that he had tried to cheat him, although he and other constables had been in his pay.

The whole proceeding seems to have been based upon the notion that the only question of importance was whether, in fact, P.C. Deed had made a bet with a bookmaker. It is perfectly true that, under the circumstances, P.C. Deed's conduct in making a bet, whether he did so on his own account or on behalf of a friend, was misconduct of the gravest character; but it does not seem to have occurred to Superintendent Noviss that it was not an offence likely to have been committed unless the relations between him and Platt were already improper, and that it was possibly the culminating incident in a series of corrupt acts.

Let us see what the position was in October, 1903. In that year the employment of men belonging to the C.I.D. for putting down street betting had been discontinued, and the system of sending out constables in plain clothes had been substituted. The four men chosen earlier in the year for this sub-division of the L. Division were P.C. Deed, P.C. Powell, P.C. Soer, and P.C. Gunn, and all four had been employed more or less continuously on the special duty of putting down street bookmaking from May to October. All were trusted men, and chosen because they possessed special qualifications for the task. P.C. Deed was, to use Superintendent Noviss's own words, "a very trusted officer," and his experience of this kind of duty extended over two years. On this October 19th, the Superintendent himself had sent P.C. Deed with another officer to keep observation on a bookmaker at Tyer Street, Lambeth, because the constables belonging to the Kennington Lane Police Station who had been endeavouring to detect him in the act of carrying on his business in the street were so well known that they had been unable to do so; and it was P.C. Deed's duty on leaving Tyer Street to report himself off duty at the Police Station. The moment Platt made his allegation as to P.C. Deed having made a bet with him in Robert Street, between one and two o'clock, the Superintendent must have inferred that if the statement were true, that P.C. Deed had disobeyed orders, and had gone past the Police Station without reporting himself, to make a bet with Platt. His doing so was obviously a very grave breach of duty, and it naturally required immediate investigation. We know what took place. The matter was promptly dealt with, and on October 20th the Superintendent had before him, for making his report to the Chief Constable, the written statement of Platt, the written statement of a witness, Charles Turner, taken before Sub-divisional Inspector Hazelden, and the statement of P.C. Deed, and he and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer knew that Platt, who had brought this grave breach of discipline to their notice alleged not simply that P.C Deed had Q. 40709. Q. 40667 received 5s. and a drink immediately after handing the "slip," but that he alleged that he had been regularly paying as much as £3 10s. a week to constables in the Division. Here, then, was Platt, who was very angry at being followed about by a constable who had tried to cheat him, though they had been on friendly terms, admitting his own offence, and taking a course which made it practically impossible for him to continue his avocation in the L. Division. One would have thought that instead of treating the matter as if it were a complaint of some one breach of discipline by a particular constable, on one particular occasion, the full significance of Platt's coming forward and making these statements would have been at once apparent to an experienced Superintendent, and yet Superintendent Noviss not only at once refused to believe that the constable had received 5s. and a "drink on Saturday," but totally ignored the general allegations made by Platt simply because, when asked, he refused to produce some book to which he referred as being in his possession, and to give at the moment particulars of his payments. We cannot help observing that Platt was shown to be quite right in saying that P.C. Deed did make a bet with him, though the "slip" was not in his handwriting. Why, if Platt was right as to that, was it to be at once presumed that he was wrong as to the 5s. and a drink, or even as to the general allegation of bribery ?

It is true that Charles Turner made a statement in which he said that he saw a plain clothes officer, whom he knew by the name of "Patsy," hand to Mr. Platt, a bookmaker, a slip of paper with some money, that the officer then walked away, and that he saw no more of him. What was there to make it plain that, if Turner's evidence necessarily justified the inference that Platt was speaking untruthfully in saying that he gave 5s. and a drink to P.C. Deed, he ought to be believed in preference to Platt ? Especially is this the case when Charles Turner's whole statement is looked at. After referring to a conversation between Platt and himself outside the "Hero" public-house, he said :—

> "About 6.45 p.m. the same evening I was in the 'Tankard' public-house, Kennington Road, when the same officer called in and asked me if I had seen Alf., meaning Mr. Platt. I replied 'No,' and he at once left the house."

It did not occur to Superintendent Noviss that it was an odd thing that the "very trusty officer," P.C. Deed, should have been on such terms with Platt and others as to make it seem to one Turner, at any rate, the most natural thing in the world that the former should be looking about for the latter, and asking for him under the name of "Alf.," the name, be it recollected, which appears on John Forbes' card as that of his agent at Waterloo. It seems, too, to us odd that the Superintendent did not, as he had before him the charge-sheets showing the particulars of Platt's arrests, notice that P.C. Deed had been concerned with P.C. Soer on October 13th in arresting him. Surely the fact that though "Patsy" had so unkindly treated "Alf." only four days before, the former should go up seemingly in quite familiar and confident fashion to the latter in order to make a bet for a friend was one worthy of a little reflection.

We should have thought that this incident in itself, and the detailed facts which it brought to light, would have suggested to the Superintendent that it was worth while to inquire into the relations at any rate between Platt and P.C. Deed a good deal further instead of remaining content with the latter's admission of guilt, coupled with his asseveration that it was a single offence committed in a moment of aberration to oblige a friend. It is, however, only fair to the Superintendent to say that he had no ground except Platt's statement for thinking that P.C. Deed was not a man of good character. We have had the advantage of seeing him in the witness box, and of discovering that he is a reckless and unscrupulous liar. Still, we cannot help thinking that Superintendent Noviss ought to have endeavoured to probe the matter further, and not to have contented himself with treating the matter as if it were one in which Platt had complained simply of a breach of discipline on the part of the constable.
Q. 40872. That Superintendent Noviss was not entirely satisfied is shown by the fact that after the dismissal of Deed he did think it necessary to instruct Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer to keep watch on the other three men to see how they conducted themselves. But no explanation seems to be given of the very limited character of the actual inquiry made as a result of Platt's revelations.

Platt, however, did not allow the matter to drop, and, in consequence of the complaint which he made to the Chief Commissioner on November 19th, reports were called for, and Sub-divisional Inspector Spencer made a report on November 23rd, in which he gave his recollection of Platt's assertion as to the payment of a weekly wage to various Police officers, and so forth. On the same day Superintendent Noviss likewise made a report, in which he stated that Platt had :—

"Made a sweeping allegation against Police generally, stating that it cost him £3 10s. per week to pay them all," but that he had refused to mention any case or to produce the pocket-book to which he referred. The Superintendent also said :—

"In his complaint against Deed he stated that he gave him a drink and 5s. at the time he had the bet. He produced a witness, Charles Turner, who saw Police Constable Deed make the bet; but this man said Deed walked away, and did not go into the public-house as Platt alleged. This proved that Platt's statement was false with respect to the drink and the 5s. which he alleged took place inside the 'Hero' public-house."

As to the latter statement that: "This proved that Platt's statement was false with respect to the drink and the 5s.," we are unable to follow the Superintendent, because we can see no ground at all for believing Turner in preference to Platt, and we are not at all satisfied that Turner's evidence, even if true, affords anything like a complete negation of Platt's allegation as to the 5s. and the drink. It should be noted that the statements of Platt and Turner agree that the bet was made outside the public-house, and all that Turner says is that he saw the officer go away, and that he did not see him enter the public-house, but that he (Turner) immediately went in alone, so that it is quite possible that Platt and P.C. Deed may have met again, and that they may have gone into some bar where they were not observed by Turner.

The three constables referred to by Platt in his communication to the Chief Commissioner, namely, P.C. Soer, 204L.; P.C. Gunn, 209L.; and P.C. Powell, 203L., also made reports in which they denied the accusations made against them.

Nothing further was done by way of inquiry by the authorities, and on December 10th Platt was in substance told that he must take any course which he deemed advisable.

The correspondence and the proceedings in reference to the appeal of Chapman to the Newington Sessions, to which reference has been made above, may be passed over.

The renewal of Platt's licence as a cabman having been refused in February, 1904, he, on March 14th, wrote to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who, as usual, referred the matter to the Chief Commissioner. The latter wrote on March 24th a letter to the former, in which, after referring to the conviction of Platt for street bookmaking as being the reason for the refusal of his licence, he added :

"The man has made several allegations against the Police, which, when investigated, have been proved in most cases to be without foundation. One of the Constables, however, of whom he complained, has been dismissed for improperly leaving his patrol, and making a bet with a bookmaker whilst specially employed in keeping observation to detect street betting The other complaints seem to have been made with a view to intimidating the Police from doing their duty in the matter of keeping watch for street betting, as the officers against whom the allegations were made were men of clear records and good service, and no evidence could be obtained to support the man's statements."

Having regard to the conclusion at which we have arrived as to Platt's statement, no harm has been done to him by the fact that the Home Office, upon receiving the Chief Commissioner's letter, refused to take any action, but, in the light of what we know as to the treatment of the whole matter by Superintendent Noviss, we confess we are somewhat surprised at the terms of the Chief Commissioner's communication. The statement that: "The man has made several allegations against the Police, which, when investigated, have been proved in most cases to be without foundation," strikes us as odd. It is true that on investigation it was proved that P.C. Deed had been guilty of a grave offence, but we can hardly consider that the other complaints that Platt made had been investigated in any real sense of the term; and the last statement of all, that: "No evidence could be obtained to support the man's statements," hardly seems supported by the facts, because, so far as we have been able to learn, no steps had been taken beyond asking for Platt's diary, to obtain any evidence as to his allegations except receiving the statement of Charles Turner, whom Platt himself put forward, and, later on, calling for reports from the three constables incriminated.

We have thought it right to call attention to all the steps taken in consequence of Platt having complained to Superintendent Noviss, because we attach the utmost importance to the manner in which complaints made by members of the public are received and treated by the Police authorities; and while we notice that the terms of the Chief Commissioner's letter show that he is in entire accord with our view, and that he believed when he wrote it that adequate inquiry had in fact been made into Platt's complaint, we regret to say that we think that the steps taken by Superintendent Noviss to arrive at the truth as to Platt's allegations were inadequate, and that he did not apply his mind with sufficient acuteness to the materials before him.

White Book, p. 5.

The responsibility of a Superintendent is very great. "The Superintendent of a Division is responsible for its discipline and that the Commissioner's Orders and Regulations are strictly complied with." While we recognise that a Superintendent ought prima facie to repose the utmost confidence in the members of the Force under him, and we do not in the least blame Superintendent Noviss for having a strong inclination to disbelieve or even to brush aside startling allegations made by men of indifferent character, or who, like Platt, avow that they are carrying on an illegal occupation, yet where, with regard to incidents like that of P.C. Deed, a serious offence occurs, and it is shown that the Superintendent's confidence was misplaced, and it might be reasonably inferred from the facts before him that the relations between the offender and a member of the public had been corrupt for some time, every effort should have been made to ascertain the full facts of the case and discover whether corruption, if it had existed in that case, had spread to other constables as well.

Further, it seems to us strange that this aspect of the matter did not present itself either to the Chief Constable or to the Assistant-Commissioner who dealt with the Deed case. The Assistant-Commissioner in dismissing Deed contented himself with treating it as one of making a bet with a bookmaker, and said :—

"The amount of discredit you have brought on the Force is so incalculable you are unfit to remain."

We do not in the least disagree with that expression of opinion, though, as applied to a single foolish act on one occasion, it may seem to be too severe ; but we should have thought that an Assistant-Commissioner, who presumably had before him the three written statements, would have deemed it his duty to inquire how so grave an offence came to be committed, and whether its commission did not imply a very undue familiarity between the offender and the bookmaker, and push his investigation further than was done by him in this particular matter.

The officers and constables whose names were given to us by Platt as having received bribes from him were (excluding Deed) eight in number : P.C. Powell, 203 (now Sergeant) ; P.C. Soer, 204 ; P.C. Gunn, 209, in the L. Division ; Detective Constable Bex and Detective Constable Hancox (now both Sergeants) in the V. and W. Divisions, and Detective Sergeant Laing, Detective Sergeant Leach and P.C. Cass, 430, in the G. Division.

We propose to consider, first, Platt's allegations against the members of the L. Division.

Case Against Police Constables Powell, Soer, and Gunn.

Platt's allegation, though made in different words at different times before us, comes to this, that he was during the month of May, 1903, and down to the time of his quarrel with P.C. Deed, carrying on his business as a bookmaker at a pitch in Robert Street, near Waterloo Station, just outside the small Ale Stores in that street, that he became acquainted with P.C. Deed and the other three constables, that as a result he made arrangements with them to pay them weekly bribes, and that in consideration thereof, he was to be allowed to pursue his calling without molestation, subject to his submitting, in order to save appearances, to arrest and conviction at convenient times.

Qs. 8775. 8776. 8777.

It is not necessary to go into the details of the various alleged transactions between Platt and the four constables. It is sufficient to say that Platt's evidence is neither clear nor consistent as to the amounts which he paid to each of these men, or as to his various conversations and dealings with them. Whether he is an honest or dishonest witness, he is a loose and inaccurate one ; but, from our point of view, mere inaccuracy on points as to whether the amount was £1 or only 10s. which Platt handed to the constables on a particular occasion, save as a test of credibility is of no importance, and, even as a test of credibility, such uncertainty or inaccuracy is by no means conclusive ; for if Platt had come before us with an absolutely clear and consistent case as to the amounts that he had given the constables, the number of times, and the exact hours at which he had met them and stood them drinks in public-houses, we should have naturally been invited to regard such punctilious certainty as a sure indication that his story was a mere fabrication from end to end.

We do not feel, having considered all the evidence brought before us in connection with our inquiry into Platt's allegations, able to say that he is so dishonest that we, charged as we are with investigating the question whether there is any basis for such allegations, can dismiss the whole matter by saying that there is no reason for believing any of his statements concerning his relations with the Police. We can, however, say that he told us a good many falsehoods, and, unless there is some strong and practically indisputable confirmation of his testimony, it would not be safe to come to the conclusion that any particular member of the Force accused by him has been guilty of any impropriety or misconduct.

Now there are two things, however disposed we may feel to make allowances for mere inaccuracy, for careless misstatement, or for even intentional falsehood as to detail, which shake our confidence in Platt's general trustworthiness.

The first is that during these months while, according to his account, he was paying these very considerable sums to the Police, it is, we think, certain that he was not, as he represented to us, carrying on business on his own account during the whole time. During part, at any rate, of that time he was acting as the agent of a bookmaker named Jack Forbes who was called before us. According to the evidence of this person, he employed Platt for three or four months from May or June, 1903, as a bookmaker at "50s. a week to start with, rising to £3;" and he never gave money to Platt to pay to the Police or authorised him to make such payments. Q. 41093. Q. 41096. Qs. 41108. 41109.

Now if we could regard Forbes as an independent or disinterested witness, and he had been a man of good character, we might have deemed his statement as to his relations with Platt as being true, but we cannot for a moment regard Forbes in that light. He, like the other bookmakers who were called and who gave evidence to discredit Platt, seemed to us to be more untrustworthy than Platt himself. The two Fishers, to whose evidence we have to call attention below, were in our judgment nearly as impudent and unscrupulous as P.C. Deed, and though we cannot use those adjectives with the same degree of certainty about Forbes, still we cannot regard him as one whose word is to be accepted on any relevant matter unless there is some strong corroboration. He contradicted himself before us on the question whether Platt had ever told him anything about payments made by him to the Police. In his examination-in-chief he said that though he had never given money to Platt to pay to the Police, or authorised him to make such payments, he (Platt) had said a few times that he had had to give them money, but in his examination by the Commissioners he denied that Platt had ever said anything to him about payments to the Police. Again, when pressed as to his contradictory answers, he said Platt did complain of having to give money to the Police, but that he (Forbes) did not think he (Platt) stopped any money for that purpose. The impression left upon our minds was very unfavourable to this witness, and, though, assuming that Platt was simply his agent, it is practically certain that Platt could not have been paying £3 10s. a week to the Police, yet we have little doubt that Platt was, at any rate, representing that he was, to some extent, bribing the Police, and that Forbes acquiesced in his so doing. Qs. 41108. 41109. Q. 41320. Qs. 41395. 41396.

Unfortunately for Platt, he produced a card showing the conditions on which John Forbes carried on business, the outside of which we have set out above, and which contains, as will be seen, the information that his agent at Waterloo was "Alf." The card is undated, but as it was not suggested by Forbes nor, so far as we can discover from the evidence by Platt, that the latter had acted for the former in any other year, we feel obliged to infer that this card referred to the business which Platt was carrying on at Robert Street, Waterloo, in the summer months of 1903. That, in our opinion, tells very heavily against Platt, because, apart from the fact that it shows that he was deceiving us when he tried to lead us to believe that he was carrying on business on his own account, it makes it unlikely that he was in a position to pay the very considerable sum, amounting to £3 10s. a week, which he said he was paying to the Police, without getting into serious financial difficulty with his employer.

The other thing that weighs with us adversely to Platt's general credibility is his own conduct in attempting, at least on one occasion, to evade arrest, and in employing "lookers out."

P.C. Soer and P.C. Gunn arrested Platt on August 28th. The account given by the former of the manner in which the apprehension was effected is that he and P.C. Gunn were on that occasion keeping observation on Platt while on his pitch in Robert Street. They posted themselves on the slope or exit from Waterloo Station which runs at right angles to Robert Street, and is only connected with it by a small door leading to a flight of steps running down into Robert Street opposite the Ale Stores near which Platt was accustomed to stand when engaged in bookmaking. P.C. Soer looked through the door, and saw Platt standing with some men betting with him. He said to P.C. Gunn: "Here he is," and rushed down the steps. Platt, upon seeing him, ran into the doorway of the workshop next to the Ale Stores, and, followed by P.C. Soer, ran up the steps to the first floor, and then jumped from a doorway opening thence into Robert Street. P.C. Soer also made the jump, and fell on the top of Platt. Platt scrambled up, and ran to the "Hero" public-house. P.C. Soer followed, and caught him at the door of the public-house and arrested him, whereupon Platt threatened to strike him.

These facts were not denied by Platt, and they may be taken as substantially proved. Certainly such a determined attempt to escape seems quite inconsistent with the relations which Platt would have us believe existed between him and the two constables. If the resistance had been merely colourable, there would have been nothing in the point. We are satisfied that Platt did really attempt to get away, and, as to this, he has not given us any satisfactory explanation. It should be noted that he had not been arrested since August 1st, and that the period, therefore, at which, according to the alleged arrangements, he might expect to be arrested had arrived. His explanation amounts to this, that he had arranged with Soer to be arrested on August 28th or rather that Soer had told him he would "take" him. In fact he did not keep the appointment by being on his "pitch" as he had to go home because his daughter was ill. Soer arrested the man Platt left on his "pitch," and afterwards he came to arrest Platt himself. The latter considered this "a shabby trick" as it involved two convictions in one day. Still here, amidst all the confusing statements and counter-statements made in the course of the evidence in this case, we have
Q. 15743. something certain from which we may draw the inference that Platt the third time on which he was arrested behaved in a manner inconsistent with that which we should have expected if the arrangement which he suggests had in fact been made.

These two things go very far not simply to shake our confidence in Platt, but tend to disprove allegations very material to his case against these three officers; but, on the other hand, the facts connected with the dismissal of P.C. Deed, the materials collected during the Police Inquiry, and the evidence before us lead us to think that Platt's case as to the bribery of P.C. Deed is substantiated.

We have seen that Superintendent Noviss thought there was nothing in the statement that the dismissed constable had received 5s. and a drink when the bet was made, and that he put aside all other allegations of bribery as not being worth attention. We need not go over the details of the Deed incident, or do more than refer to the written statements that were made in consequence of Platt's complaint. We have heard what P.C. Deed himself had to say before us in answer to Platt's charge that he had been in his pay. No experienced man who heard the whole of his evidence before us, and observed him in the witness box, could help coming to the conclusion that he is a man so regardless of the truth that no reliance whatever can be placed upon anything that he says. We cannot agree with Superintendent Noviss that the bet of October 19th was the first transaction of an improper kind that had taken place between Platt and P.C. Deed. When one really applies one's mind to the consideration of the three written statements together with the oral evidence which we have received, one cannot doubt for a moment that P.C. Deed and Platt, or, to use the nicknames by which they were known at the "Hero" public-house and elsewhere in the neighbourhood of Waterloo, "Patsy" and "Alf," were on very familiar terms before this bet was made on October 19th, and when we reflect that Forbes, though before us he tried to appear shocked at Platt's iniquity, shuffled a good deal, and gave us the impression that he thought some constables or other in all probability had been bribed by him, we feel as certain as it is possible to be in dealing with a matter of this kind that P.C. Deed had in fact been bribed probably more than once. That being so, the existence of corrupt relations between Platt and at any rate one of the four plain clothes men told off to keep special observation on bookmakers is proved to our satisfaction.

That fact, however, is by no means corroboration of Platt's allegations against the three other constables concerned. It is not strictly any evidence at all against them, since there is nothing whatever to connect them with P.C. Deed except the mere fact that they were engaged upon the same kind of duty. The utmost that can be said is that it ought to have put the Superintendent responsible for the discipline of the Force in the L. Division on his guard and ought to be borne in mind by us in considering analogous charges brought against other constables closely connected with Deed in this special work. One cannot help saying to oneself, if P.C. Deed, who for two years had been engaged in this kind of work, and who was, in the opinion of his superior, "a very trusty officer," could yield to the temptation offered by this book maker, how can one be certain that others, too, may not have been led away? It is almost inevitable that misconduct of this kind by a member of an organised Force should raise a cloud of suspicion over the heads of others, however little they really may deserve such an unfortunate consequence. The only sure safeguard against such unmerited misfortune is to be found in the immediate and vigorous action of the superior officers who are responsible for the discipline and integrity of all the men under them. Still, though we may say at once that the fact that in our opinion P.C. Deed had been in receipt of money from Platt, does not afford sure ground for concluding that the relations between Platt and any one of the other three officers concerned were corrupt, we could not help approaching and scanning the evidence with more searching looks than if Platt had failed to show any bribery at all in the L. Division.

The Defence of Police Constables Soer, Gunn and Powell.

In answer to such case as Platt made against them, P.C. Soer, P.C. Gunn, and P.C. Powell gave, of course, an absolute denial. All three men are constables with excellent records, and their Defaulters' Sheets are clean. They gave their evidence well, and there was nothing disclosed in the course of their examination which tended to throw any doubt upon their word, or to show that their relations with Platt were in any way compromising. The only point which the record of Platt's convictions, and the facts admitted by these three officers, suggest to us is Platt's comparative immunity from May to October from arrest. That he was carrying on business on racing days at or near to some place in Robert Street there is no reason to doubt, and one cannot but ask oneself why it is that he was only arrested on these four occasions; and, in view of Platt's allegations, it is curious to note that, except on the first occasion, when he was arrested shortly before 1.45, the arrests took place towards the close of racing hours.

The answer of the constables is that their duties were not confined to watching Platt, but to watching all the bookmakers in the Sub-division, and they point, in proof of the fact that they were zealously discharging their duties, to a pretty long list of convictions of bookmakers in the Sub-division during these very months, which shows that whereas Platt was arrested four times no other bookmaker was during that time, and in that Sub-division, arrested more than three times. It was also made clear that the arrest of a bookmaker for street betting with a reasonable certainty of obtaining a conviction, that is to say under circumstances which enable the arresting constable to show that two or three or more men were gathered together for betting, was by no means an easy thing, partly because of the requirements of the law, and partly because of the system of "scouts" or "lookers out," and the difficulty of adopting such disguises as would escape the vigilant attention of the clever and adroit persons with whom they had to deal.

Case against Detective Constables Bex and Hancox.

Platt's case against the two Detective Constables Bex and Hancox, who were stationed at Tooting in the V. Division in 1895 and 1896, and who have since been promoted to the ranks of Sergeants, may be very briefly dealt with.

Platt stated that he had carried on business at Tooting from 1897 down to 1902 or 1903, and that he had made payments to detectives there just as he had been in the habit of doing in the L. Division. On being asked to write down the names of the detectives whom he had bribed he wrote down the names "Bex" and "Hancox." He was cross-examined as to his Tooting transactions with a view of showing that he had behaved dishonestly to the punters by making default in paying them their winnings. As we gather, he did not deny that some dispute had arisen in connection with his operations there, and the explanation that he gave was by no means satisfactory. Q. 7072.

We need not, however, express any opinion upon the point because, after what we have said above, matters which in an ordinary case would be of importance as tending to discredit a witness are not crucial in a case like this one. There is nothing to show that Platt is wrong in saying that he carried on his business at Tooting, and therefore had the opportunity of bribing constables on duty in that part of the Metropolis, but Platt has given us no evidence tending to confirm his charge against the two members of the Force named by him.

Detective Sergeant Bex and Detective Sergeant Hancox both appeared before us, and denied all knowledge of Platt, or acquaintanceship with him. Both, however, had been engaged as Detective Constables at Tooting in the V. Division in the years 1895 and 1896, but not afterwards, and, as Platt, according to his statement before us, only commenced his business at Tooting in 1897, it is clear that, if Platt is not post-dating the commencement of his operations at Tooting, he never can have come across either of these two men there. Still, one cannot help feeling that it is a very curious thing that a person in Platt's position should have known that either of these two Sergeants had ever been on duty as detectives employed at a place in the V. Division if they had in fact never met, and Platt's recollection of the dates is, not unnaturally, so uncertain that it is quite possible he may have carried on business at Tooting before 1897.

Platt persisted in saying that he made the acquaintance of both Detective Constables at Tooting, and said that he had played billiards with Sergeant Bex at "The Clock House," near King's Cross, as late as the time of the General Election in January, 1906. Sergeant Bex said he was not a billiard player, and denied that he had played with Platt, but he believed that he had been to "The Clock House" for refreshment when he was following a suspected house-breaker living at Rowton House about two years previously to the time at which he gave evidence before us (i.e., April 12th, 1907).

James Lloyd, a billiard marker, was called in order to support Platt's suggestion that Sergeant Bex had played billiards with him, but his evidence is quite inconclusive.

The Case against Detective Sergeant Laing, Detective Sergeant Leach and Police Constable Cass.

The three members of the Force attached to the G. Division whose names Platt wrote down at the sitting on October 18th were Sergeant Laing and Sergeant Leach, both of the C.I. Department, and P.C. Cass, 430 G., who was employed to deal with street betting in 1906 as a plain clothes officer.

We have shortly stated how Platt came to enter upon a bookmaking venture in the G. Division. Before May, 1906, he appears to have never operated in Clerkenwell. The main facts connected with the business which he carried on there for a few weeks are clearly ascertained. Before May, 1906, he was acquainted with a bookmaker named Joseph William Fisher, commonly called "Bill" Fisher. This Bill Fisher and three brothers, with only one of whom, Christopher Robert Fisher, commonly called "Bob" Fisher, we are concerned, had been carrying on business as bookmakers together or singly in the Finsbury Division for some time. Among the other places or "pitches" at which they had acted as bookmakers was one in Sutton Street, Clerkenwell, near the "Sutton Arms" public-house. Early in May, Bob and Bill Fisher were in difficulties, and unable to meet their liabilities. On May 7th, Platt met Bill Fisher with whom, as we have said, he was previously acquainted, and Bill Fisher took him to meet Bob Fisher. A conversation then took place in which it was suggested that Platt should take over the "pitch," including its liabilities, and pay Bob Fisher and Bill Fisher weekly wages for acting as his agents. Platt was, however, not in a position to make the venture alone, and entered into partnership with Patrick McCarthy, his brother-in-law, who was a general dealer in Lambeth. According to Platt and McCarthy the arrangement ultimately come to was that Platt and McCarthy were to take over the "pitch," discharge the then existing liabilities to punters, and employ Bob Fisher at £2 10s. and Bill Fisher at £2 a week as their agents on the Sutton Street "pitch." That this was substantially the arrangement is not denied by the Fishers, but Bill Fisher alleges that he was to receive a third of the profits in addition to the weekly wage as a partner in the venture with Platt and McCarthy. This last term is, however, denied both by Platt and McCarthy. Whatever was the exact arrangement, the business of the Sutton Street "pitch" was carried on down to June 23rd by Platt and McCarthy, who found the necessary capital, and the two Fishers, who did the actual work on the "pitch."

On that day McCarthy retired, and the business was continued by Platt alone, with the two Fishers as his agents, till June 30th, when the arrangement came to an end by Platt's failing to provide enough money to enable the Fishers to settle with the punters in respect of their winnings on the last day of the joint operations.

The two Fishers both represented that Platt behaved dishonestly and badly towards them. It is not, for our purposes, necessary to settle the question, but it ought to be pointed out that Platt had paid off the liabilities annexed to the "pitch" when he and McCarthy took it over on May 7th, and that no proper account has ever been taken, and it may be that if that were done the balance might be against the Fishers. In any case, the mere fact that Platt's capital was exhausted did not necessarily imply dishonesty on his part but may have been as much due to misfortune as were the financial difficulties in which the Fishers had found themselves on May 7th. The important point, so far as our Inquiry is concerned, is the fact that the Fishers considered themselves greatly aggrieved by Platt, and were, as it seemed to us, actuated by a very unfriendly spirit towards him.

The relevancy of the above facts to our Inquiry will appear in a moment. Platt, in the statement which he originally made to our Secretary alleged that he had been so disgusted with his treatment by the Police in the L. Division in 1903 that he had determined, when he made the arrangement with the Fishers for the business in the G. Division, where he knew, according to his statement, it would be necessary to bribe the Police, to keep an account of all the payments which the Fishers might have to make to him on his and his partner's behalf; and he said that he had kept a book in which there was a full account of such payments. In this connection it is to be noted that "Bob" Fisher in his evidence before us admitted that Platt had referred to the management of the Police. Unfortunately, Platt did not bring this book to our office before he gave evidence, and on our requiring its production he was unable to produce it, and alleged that he had been unable to find it where he had put it at his home; and it then appeared that his wife, with whom he was not on good terms, had destroyed it. Mrs. Platt, his wife, was called and admitted that she had burnt this book after she found that her husband had gone to give evidence before us because she had a brother in the Force who had a large family and had only three years to serve to get his pension; and she thought that her husband's conduct in attacking the Police might affect his chance of getting the pension; but she also admitted that she did so in a passion.

Q. 8539 to 8542.

Platt seemed to attach very great importance to the book, and for the purpose of refreshing his recollection as to the names or numbers of constables and the amount of money expended in bribery, it might have been of value to him. In our view, however, as the entries in the book were in Platt's handwriting, it would have been of little value to us as affording corroboration of his charges. It is obvious that entries made by Platt in a book kept for his own purpose, which the incriminated constables, of course, were never shown, really could carry Platt's case no further. Strictly speaking, the entries could not be used as evidence, and could only be referred to by Platt for the purpose of refreshing his memory. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to decide the question whether such a book ever existed, or whether, if it did exist, it really was burnt by Mrs. Platt under the circumstances stated by her or not; but we are inclined to think that Mrs. Platt spoke the truth and that the book, whatever its value, had in fact existed, and that there were entries in it of the kind indicated by Platt.

Though, whatever may be the reason, we have never seen the book by which Platt set so much store, he handed us in a number of books to which considerably more importance must be attached. They are six in number, and that they are books containing genuine entries in the handwriting of Platt, or one of the Fishers made in the course of, and for the purpose of, the business carried on by Platt and McCarthy during the agency of the Fishers on the Sutton Street "pitch" in May and June, 1906, is beyond doubt. To such entries much greater weight must be given than to entries in a private book kept by a man simply to aid his own memory. All these books contain the records of actual transactions made in the ordinary course of business. To understand their significance, it is necessary to state precisely how the Clerkenwell business was carried on.

As we understand it, the arrangement was as follows. On racing days "Bob" Fisher took his stand on the Sutton Street "pitch" and "Bill" Fisher took his stand on another "pitch" about two hundred yards away. They received from the punters the usual slips, together with sums of money for which they backed a horse or horses. The conditions according to which the business was carried on as between the bookmakers and the punters at these "pitches" were of the usual type, and are for our purposes, immaterial. At the end of the racing hours, Platt, McCarthy and the two Fishers met in some private room for the purpose of settling the accounts of the day, making arrangements for the payment of the winnings of punters at the appointed time and place, and, having regard to the number of the transactions the aid of memorandum books was necessarily invoked. No proper account books however, either of the partnership dealings between Platt and McCarthy, or the transactions between the firm of Platt & McCarthy and the Fishers were ever kept. For the daily settlement the Fishers produced all the "slips" received and all the money that they had taken was placed upon a table; the amounts for which, according to the "slips," various punters had backed various horses were added together, and the amount of money laid upon the table was ascertained. Strictly speaking, the sum total for which, according to the "slips," horses had been backed, and in respect of which the punters had paid their money when handing in the "slip" should have always tallied with the sum total of the money placed upon the table by the two Fishers. But the carrying on of the work by the Fishers involved certain payments for expenses which they had to incur and which they were entitled to debit in account against their employers.

When expenses had been incurred and paid, the sum total of the moneys produced at the settlement was less than the sum total of the amounts which according to the "slips" had been handed to the Fishers. Strictly speaking, any deficiency so disclosed should have been then inquired into, and the amounts which the Fishers were entitled to "stop," that is to say, to credit themselves with, should have been ascertained, and entries relating to them made in a memorandum book; and, as will be seen, to a certain extent this system was followed. After ascertaining the sum total of the amounts paid by punters it became necessary to decide what were the winnings of the punters in order that the Fishers might be put in funds to meet and discharge their liabilities at the time and place appointed. For this purpose the "slips" were handed over, and, in case a punter had won, his name was written down in the memorandum book, and also the amount due to him as a winner. This was done in regard to every "slip," and, the amount of the winnings being thus ascertained, the two Fishers took sufficient money to discharge the liabilities of the firm. Needless to say, the system was not carried out in all its details. Where a man, for instance, well known to the Fishers as a person of credit, had not got the money with him his "slip" was accepted without insisting on his paying the money at the moment (i.e., the transaction was "on the nod"). In one case, as we know, a bet was effected by a telegram directed to the proprietor of a public-house. Sometimes the Fishers appear not to have been ready with their accounts of expenses on a particular day, or had in fact delayed payment in respect of expenses, and the settlement of these small items was deferred to another day, but as a rule, though not always, entries were made in the memoranda book as an aid to memory. The result was that a considerable number of memorandum books containing entries made from day to day during the time this business was being carried on were used for these temporary purposes of daily settlement, and remained in the possession of Platt, as the more active member of the firm who were financing the Fishers. Platt usually came into the neighbourhood at or about mid-day. That being the system Platt produced to us a number of these books which had been used for these daily settlements and alleged that there were entries in those books which showed that the Fishers had in May and June 1906 paid money to Policemen for the purpose of securing immunity from arrest, and he pointed out to us entries which, according to him justified his statement, and implicated by name Sergeant Laing and Sergeant Leach. The entries affected to record, according to Platt's contention, the fact that the Fishers had been allowed certain sums for "Coppers" (that is Policemen) and "Tecs" (that is detectives) and he pointed to an entry of 10s. against a name entered thus "L——g" which he said meant that 10s. had been paid to Sergeant Laing.

We think it well for the sake of clearness to set out the portions of the accounts recorded in the memorandum books in which these entries occur.

1. The entry alleged to refer to Sergeant Laing occurs in the book put in and referred to in the evidence as A.P. 1. As is the case with all or nearly all the pages or accounts in this book no date is placed to any of the entries, but there is no doubt that all the pages in the book refer to transactions in which Platt and McCarthy on the one side and the Fishers on the other were engaged.

The following shows all that appears on the page in which the entry "L——g" is found :—

The word "queries" is one that occurs a good many times in the books, and appears to have been intended to cover questions raised in consequence of a shortage in the moneys produced by the Fishers. As we gather, the Fishers were asked to account for any deficiencies, and the amounts which they were allowed to "stop" were settled in conversation and entries jotted down in the book as the settlement proceeded or inserted when the total deduction was arranged.

The page containing these entries is unnumbered, and, so far as an inspection of the book shows, has no necessary connection either with the pages that follow or with the pages that immediately precede it, but both the former set of pages and the latter set of pages contain a list of the names which according to the system must be the names of punters who had won.

The page set out above is on the right hand side on opening the book, and on the page opposite to it are various names, seemingly the names of horses, and certain entries which are not easily or at all intelligible. From the position of the page set out above it would appear to refer to the operations of the day to which the names of the punters set out on the succeeding pages had reference.

The figures £18 and £6 5s. and the total £24 5s. seem to have been made afterwards, and their connection with the other figures on the page is not clear.

There is so great a conflict of evidence between Platt and the Fishers as to what the entries mean that we must endeavour to find out the significance of a page like that set out above for ourselves. Forming the best judgment we can, we think that the £18 and the £6 5s. represent the receipts by "Bob" Fisher and "Bill" Fisher amounting in the whole for the day to £24 5s.

2. The second series of entries said to disclose payments to the Police occurs in the same book. The page is as follows :—

We may disregard as immaterial the three first lines of this page.

The six entries amounting to £21 1s. 6d., seem fairly intelligible. The whole series represents the result of a conversation between the parties concerned by means of which the Fishers were accounting for the takings shown by the "slips."

The entries as to "Scouts" and "Com," (i.e., commission) require no comment.

With regard to "Chandler" we have to remark that the nickname by which Sergeant Laing was known was "Jerry Chandler," but it so happens that the Fishers employed a scout of the same name who played a small part, as will be seen later on, in what took place on Platt's evidence before us becoming known in the G. Division.

As to the entry "Darby," we have no information. The word "Coppers," which prima facie refers to Policemen, is the one that attracts our attention in this extract. It was said by the Fishers that "Coppers" when used in the books did not refer to Policemen at all, but referred to the copper coins found among the silver and gold which they produced at their meetings with Platt and McCarthy.

3. In the same book there is an entry in a list of expenses apparently incurred y the Fishers of "Cop. 1s."

4. In the second book which was put in and referred to in the evidence as A.P. 2, and in which the entries bear a general similarity to those in A.P. 1, there are several entries relied upon by Platt as referring to payments made to the Police.

The following is the first extract containing an entry of this kind :—

Again, there is little doubt that we have here jotted down figures representing the result of a conversation at a meeting held for the settling of a daily account between Platt and McCarthy and the two Fishers.

5. Later on we have another series of entries in which the word "coppers" occur. It is as follows :—

The words "Queries paid" at the head of this page we understand as meaning questions as to the deficiency or shortage in the moneys produced at the settlement by the Fishers.

8. In a book marked A.P. 7, there occurs another series of entries which Platt relied upon as supporting his allegations against the Police of the G. Division. They occur in a note book kept by Platt himself, and are in his handwriting. They have, therefore, not the same significance as entries made in the course of the business in the handwriting of one of the Fishers, but it appears to us, after examining the book, and considering the place in which the entries are found, that they are genuine entries made on June 7th, and refer to transactions between Platt and the Fishers.

The extract which we give refers to June 7th, and is found on the top half of a page in the note book, across the middle of which a line is drawn. Below the line there are entries relating to transactions on June 8th. The following is a reproduction of what appears on the top half of the page :—

9. In Platt's note book, from which the above extract containing the name of "Leach" was taken, was found, as he alleged, a slip of paper which was in the book when it was handed by Platt to the Secretary. Platt, when the book was handed to him by the Secretary in the course of his examination, produced this paper from it, and affected not to have known till then that it was there, but he recognised it as having been written at the time of one of the daily settlements during the period when the Fishers were carrying on business for him and McCarthy in the G. Division. It ought to be mentioned here that various slips of paper of a similar kind relating to various transactions were found in other books. The slip of paper is smaller than the page of the note book in which it was found, and is either a piece of note-paper cut down for the purpose of making memoranda upon it or else a leaf torn out of some other book. It is clearly not a leaf cut out of Platt's note book, because the pages of that book are ruled, and there are no lines upon the piece of paper in question.

The pencil entries upon it are as follows :—

We are satisfied that all these books from which we have made the above extracts are genuine books in the sense that they were used during the time at which the Fishers were acting as Platt's agents in Clerkenwell for the purpose of keeping a record of their dealings and for the settlement of their accounts from day to day. Except Platt's note book, they were books kept by the Fishers. The entries in the books consist for the most part of long lists of the names of punters who had won, and of the amounts which had become due to them. These lists are generally in the handwriting of "Bill" Fisher, but some of the lists are in that of "Bob" Fisher. Besides the list of punters, there is a variety of entries, the exact significance of which only the parties to the transactions can understand, and which were made for some merely temporary purpose. There is, however, throughout the books another class of entries which relate evidently to amounts which had been expended for various purposes in connection with the business, and it is to this last class the entries in Platt's note-book and the account on the slip of paper found in that book belong.

Prima facie, we have no doubt at all that the persons who made the entries, and who were discussing the entries, meant by the term "Tecs" detectives, and by the term "Coppers" Policemen, as Platt alleges. Both the Fishers, however, denied that they made any payments on account of Platt's business to any detectives or to any constables, and they gave us their explanation of the entries; they both attempted to give explanations of the entries which would be consistent with their own honesty towards Platt as agents and at the same time consistent with the fact that no payments had in fact been made to the Police. "Bob" Fisher admitted that there was on all, or on nearly all the occasions of a daily settlement, a deficiency in the sum total of the moneys produced by him and his brother as compared with the sum total of the money which punters had paid to them according to the betting slips, and that such deficiency was not fully accounted for by such legitimate expenses as the payment to "lookers out" or "commission" sometimes paid to persons acting as sub-agents for bringing customers and for necessary refreshment and other petty expenses which might reasonably be asked for from his principals. Prima facie, for any surplus deficiency, after such legitimate allowances had been made the two Fishers would be responsible to the principals. "Bob" Fisher, however, did not admit that any such surplus deficiency was ever due to any misapplication of moneys received by him or his brother, but that such shortages were in fact caused either by Platt himself taking the money or directing him (Fisher) to make payments behind the back of, and unknown to, his partner McCarthy. Such surplus deficiencies, he said, were due to the fact that he had paid for drinks by Platt's instructions, that he had made bets for Platt without his handing him over the amounts for which he backed horses, as, in strictness, he ought to have done, and for other payments on Platt's account which the latter desired should be concealed under fictitious terms or names. Accordingly, he explained the appearance of the words "Tecs," "Coppers," and of names such as "L——g" and "Leach" as being entries made at Platt's request in order to deceive his partner McCarthy: in short, that at the settlement he would make up, with Platt's acquiescence, a false account of expenses inserting such terms as "Tecs" which Platt passed and explained to McCarthy as being a necessary bribe to the Police. Such an explanation, having regard to the character of the men concerned, is not absolutely improbable. We have no doubt at all that "Bob" Fisher was quite rogue enough to join Platt, his more active principal, in cheating McCarthy, who was a kind of sleeping partner, though one does not see what possible profit, except an unauthorised drink, "Bob" Fisher was getting out of the matter, nor are we sure that Platt was not wicked enough to so act though we are not prepared to believe that he in fact did so.

The explanation does not strike us as being by any means satisfactory, especially when we consider that " Bill " Fisher said that the real arrangement was that he was to receive a third of the profits of the business in addition to his weekly wages, for, if that were so, then " Bob " Fisher, in manipulating the accounts in accordance with Platt's wishes, was defrauding not only McCarthy but his brother " Bill " as well.

This somewhat forced explanation was not the only one which the Fishers attempted to give of these suspicious entries. Others which, be it noted, were inconsistent with its being the true one, were put forward. It was suggested that the word " Coppers " simply represented the sum of all the copper coins found on the table, but why they should be treated separately and only the silver and gold taken into account, is not made clear to us; nor is it consistent with the use of the word " copper " in the singular in the seventh extract given above. But as to this last point it may be said that that entry is in Platt's handwriting. We could understand that if there were four or five pence left on the table, for the purpose of easy calculation, they might be handed back to the Fishers, and treated as a part of an allowable deficiency as being too inconsiderable to be brought into account, but why so considerable an amount as 4s., for instance, should be treated in that way when such small sums as 1s. were duly accounted for in " expenses," we are at a loss to understand; and be it noted that that explanation does not get rid of the quite unambiguous entry " Tecs."

The suggestion was also made that Laing and Leach were punters who, as we understand the suggestion, had not been paid on the preceding day for some reason or other. The answer to that suggestion is that the word " L——g " appears clearly under the word " expenses," and that the name " Leach " occurs in the middle of a series of entries, also obviously referring to expenses; nor were the Fishers able to satisfy us that they had among their customers any punters named Laing or Leach to whom these entries could be reasonably supposed to refer.

Forming the best judgment we can upon the whole matter, and fully impressed with the untrustworthy character of the two Fishers, and of Platt himself, we think there can be no reasonable doubt, whatever may be the true inference from it, that in the regular course of business between the Fishers on the one side, and Platt and McCarthy on the other, the former were over and over again allowed by McCarthy and Platt to debit them with various sums on account of payments which the Fishers stated they had made to officers and constables in the G. Division.

But while we feel bound to come to that conclusion, we, of course, recognise that it does not necessarily follow that, in fact, any such payments were made, and it may be that the Fishers never made any such payments at all, but simply falsely alleged to Platt and McCarthy that they had in fact been made. Platt, however, told us that on one occasion though he did not see money pass he saw Fisher pass something to Laing in Bury Street or Redding Street. Qs. 31236 to 31242

That may, of course, be an absolute invention, but if Platt did indeed see " Bob " Fisher talking to Sergeant Laing, it would tend to confirm Platt's belief that payments were made to the Police for which allowances were in fact made.

As we do not consider ourselves bound strictly by the rules of evidence, it is not necessary for us to inquire how or in what circumstances these entries might become admissible in proceedings against the members of the Force attacked by Platt. It should be observed, however, that the Fishers were witnesses on the Police side, and came before us to contradict Platt's allegations, and that the entries were put to them in what may be called, without any great impropriety of language, cross-examination. Except the one statement of Platt that he had seen " Bob " Fisher pass money to Laing, there is absolutely no evidence, apart from the entries themselves, to connect either Sergeant Laing or Sergeant Leach with the transactions at all. In a case like the present, knowing that this kind of illegal business has been extensively carried on notwithstanding the efforts made by the superior Police authorities to suppress it, we cannot help allowing the entries to become factors in arriving at an opinion upon the question whether there is any truth in Platt's allegations. Speaking broadly, we ought to look at the facts before us as an employer would look at analogous facts in coming to a conclusion as to whether charges made against persons in his employment were or were not well founded. Looking at these entries from that standpoint, we cannot avoid taking them into consideration though the amount of weight which ought to be attached to them in coming to a decision on the questions before us must be matter of personal opinion. But whatever weight be given to them, it carries the case against the two Sergeants only a very little way, if at all. P.C. Cass is not implicated by name in these entries, though he was in fact employed at this time in keeping observation on bookmakers in the neighbourhood of Sutton Street, and the fact that though some of the Police had been bribed, the names of Laing and Leach may have been falsely used, makes it impossible for us to regard the introduction of their names as affording evidence of their guilt on which we can rely as against the accused.

Immunity of the Fishers in May and June.

Let us now see how far Platt's suggestion that the Fishers had been lucky in escaping prosecution or arrest during the time they worked for him at Sutton Street and the other "pitch" is well founded.

Q. 43126. According to "Bob" Fisher there were five convictions "between the three of us." The three referred to were himself, "Bill" Fisher, and his brother Thomas Fisher, who seems to have had nothing to do with Platt and McCarthy's business. He also said that there had been twelve convictions against them in the two years during which they had been betting in the Division before the arrangement was made with Platt; but it appears that neither "Bob" Fisher nor "Bill" Fisher were prosecuted or arrested during May and June, that is during the time they were working for Platt and McCarthy.

Q. 43765 to 43769.

P.C. Cass was employed as a plain clothes officer to deal with street betting from June 11th to July 8th, 1906, and, though during that time nine bookmakers were arrested by him, neither of the Fishers was among them, though he admitted that he knew them as bookmakers, and that he and Sergeant Barton had kept observation on them in 1903. He also admitted that he had made arrests of bookmakers within 100 yards of where the Fishers were betting. The explanation that he gave for his not arresting either of the Fishers was:—

Q. 41870, &c.

Q. 41945. "Because they stood in a very peculiar place to get at them, and I was so well known to them and they had some very smart touts; some used to ride bicycles, and there was a large block of buildings close to where they stood."

It must be taken, therefore, as established for what it is worth, that neither "Bob" nor "Bill" Fisher was arrested during the time they were working for Platt and McCarthy.

The Meeting on the City Road Bridge.

We have now referred to all the circumstances put forward by Platt as tending to confirm his allegations.

In the course of our Inquiry, however, the happening of an event which struck us at once as possibly significant was revealed: we mean a meeting that took place between "Bob" Fisher and Sergeant Wright, Sergeant Laing and Sergeant Leach, at midday on Saturday, October 20th. To understand why the meeting has any bearing on Platt's accusations it is necessary to recall what had taken place before us on Thursday, the 18th, which was the day on which Platt made his first statement in public.

Platt, after having given evidence about the Deed incident and his relations with the Police of the L. Division, etc., added in reference to the G. Division:—

Q. 7252. "I have been in the habit of paying 48s. a week there, but I really do not want to come to the front, until I know how the case goes on."

He was then asked to tell the Commission the names of the officers to whom he had been giving 48s. a week, when he replied:—

Q. 7257. "I have not given it to them myself personally, but the men who are in my employment have given it to them. I have to consider those men's future days. I have to consider that they have to get their living in Clerkenwell in future days, but to prove my statement that I am doing such a thing, at the last I will mention the officers' names, to prove that I am speaking the truth, only I have got seven men working for me, they have families to keep, and I do not think I should be doing right unless I let them know in the first instance that I am doing it."

He was thereupon pressed to give the names, and ultimately he wrote down the names on a sheet of paper handed to him for the purpose, and which he handed back to us. We looked at the paper and found the names that he had written were "Lang," "Cass," and "Leach." The paper was then handed to Mr. Leslie and by him locked up.

At that time the only persons in the world, except Platt himself, who could have known of his own knowledge the names he had written down were ourselves and our secretary. In many of the evening newspapers of the 18th, and in the morning newspapers of the 19th, there were fairly full reports of our proceedings, but in none of the reports brought to our notice was there any mention of the names of Laing, Leach or Cass, nor was any one of those three names mentioned in the course of the proceedings before us on the 18th. That being so, it is at first sight a very curious thing that within forty-eight hours of the publication of the fact that Platt had written down the names of certain members of the Force of the G. Division, and handed them to us as being the names of men whom his agents in Clerkenwell had bribed, this notorious bookmaker, "Bob" Fisher, should be having an interview not at a police-station but in a public street with three officers, two of whom bore names which Platt had secretly written down and handed to us. We could not, having regard to the kind of case that we were investigating, fail to look upon that as a very odd circumstance which certainly required explanation. If the names of Laing and Leach had been publicly mentioned on the 18th, the matter would not have struck us in the same light, because, in that case, we should prima facie have thought that they had sent for "Bob" Fisher with a view of getting information to be used for their defence, or that some other satisfactory explanation could be easily given. The point that at once impressed us was this—that a man whose name Platt had already given us in his written statement as one of his agents in the G. Division should, almost immediately after Platt had given his evidence, be having a conversation with three officers, two of whom had been secretly designated by Platt as those whom that agent had bribed. For assuming the story of Platt to be true, and that the relations of "Bob" Fisher with Sergeant Laing and Sergeant Leach were in fact corrupt, the meeting in plain clothes of the men so deeply compromised in a public place where they could converse more safely on highly confidential matters than at the police-station, to talk over the matter with the man by whom they had been bribed would be a not unnatural circumstance, because in that case they would be anxious to know if there was any ground for fearing their names were mixed up in the affair and to concoct a plan of action with "Bob" Fisher. In a matter of this kind where so many witnesses are obviously ready to lie, any one having to try to arrive at the truth must attach the very greatest importance to any event which is absolutely proved, and from which inferences may legitimately be drawn in the light of one's experience of life.

Curious as this meeting seems to us to be, and unfavourable to the Police as were the deductions which we prima facie felt inclined to draw, even if no explanation had been given by any of the men who met together on the occasion in question, we should not have felt disposed to regard our inferences from this suspicious circumstance as by any means conclusive, but in fact, however, explanations were given both by "Bob" Fisher and by the three officers who were present at the interview.

Let us first see what "Bob" Fisher had to say about it; and here we are assisted as to what took place by letters and circumstances ascertained beyond all doubt.

First of all, we have a letter dated October 18th, and received by us on the 19th, from "Bob" Fisher, addressed to the Secretary. In that letter he says:

"I wish to appear before the Commission to refute the statements made by Alfred Harry Platt, as I know them to be absolutely false. I hope you will kindly allow me to appear, as it is of the greatest public importance that the true statement of affairs should be made known. I will present myself to-morrow morning prepared to give evidence."

On October 19th, "Bob" Fisher wrote to Messrs. Wontner & Sons, saying:—

"In reference to the evidence given before the Commission yesterday by Platt, I am in a position to rebut a great deal of it, as I know as far as I am concerned, that it is absolutely false, also that he absconded with £27 entrusted to me by my customers, likewise that he has not got one agent in this division, that is the G. Division, also I doubt whether he has got one in any part of London. I also have evidence of him absconding with another man's money from Lincoln's Inn district. If it is possible to have an interview with you this afternoon, I think I will be doing a public service. I am employed as a betting agent by Mr. Henry Jones, of 151, Gray's Inn Road."

When examined before us the evidence that he gave as to his movements, after he heard what Platt had said before us, was not at first very clear, and, though he spoke glibly enough, his first account of the course of affairs was not quite consistent with the letters or with what he ultimately told us. We have already expressed an unfavourable opinion as to the veracity of this witness, and though his answers to questions bearing upon what he did after hearing of Platt's evidence, came trippingly enough from his tongue they were by no means convincing. That some of Platt's statements, as he said, "got on his nerves," may be believed. Though one does not see that he had much to fear from any revelations concerning what had taken place in 1906, the fact that he had quarrelled with Platt and was incensed against him, supplies a motive for his line of action and accounts for the strong feeling against his former employer.

Ultimately the account that he gave showing how the interview came about was as follows :—

Q. 43891. "I will tell you how it exactly occurred. I was going on with my ordinary day's work; I was still betting, when this Commission came on, for my present governor. It was pointed out to me in the papers, and I looked at it and read it over, and what struck me was that Platt made a statement before the Commission that he had (that means he had at present) five representatives in the G. Division, and that he was paying the Police £3 10s. a week. When I saw 'Platt,' I thought surely that must be the Platt that was with me, and I became rather indignant to think that a man who had run away with money, belonging not to me, but to my punters, should dare to come here to make a statement to that effect. I thought to myself, 'I will see into this.' I had to go through my ordinary business, make the papers up, and pay the punters out, and at about quarter or half-past nine that night as I was going, I said to the scout Chandler: 'Who are the head of the Police in this district?' He said: 'I think Wright and Leach, or Hammond.' I think he mentioned the name of Hammond as well. I said: 'You tell them I want to see them to-morrow on the City Road Bridge at twelve o'clock.' I had not seen him any more that night, nor the next day. I went and kept the appointment on the bridge, but previous to doing that I went down to King's Cross Police Station. I did not exactly know where these men came from, I was going to go in there, and I saw a detective. I anticipated he was a detective by his build. I spoke to him, and said: 'Are you a Police officer?' He said: 'Yes.' I said: 'Well, I am a bookmaker, and worked for that man who has been before the Commission,' and I said: 'What he says is false. What is the best thing to do?' He said: 'The best thing to do is to see the Commissioners or the solicitors.' With that I came direct from him to Mr. Muir's chambers, and from there I went to the City Road Bridge to see the officers . . . I accosted them."

Now let us turn to the evidence given by the three officers of Police. We begin with Sergeant Wright, because he is not incriminated by any of Platt's allegations. He said :—

Q. 42866. "As far as I recollect, Sergeant Leach came into the office shortly after nine, and said that a man had stopped him, and said a man named Fisher wished to see him or me at the City Road Bridge about mid-day, about twelve o'clock, I think, was the time."

When Sergeant Leach came in and made this observation Sergeant Laing was also present in the office. He (Sergeant Wright) and Sergeant Leach then agreed that they would see Fisher. Sergeant Wright was then working with Sergeant Leach, and he occupied himself in the office till about eleven o'clock and then he went with Sergeant Leach to the North London Sessions, and Sergeant Leach had a conversation with Sergeant Tomlin, of the D. Division, while he waited some little way away. Then he saw Sergeant Laing come up and they stood talking till Sergeant Leach joined them, and Sergeant Wright said to him: "We are going to the City Road, we are going to meet that Fisher," and then they all walked to the City Road bridge. According to his recollection, when they arrived at the bridge, though his account is not very clear, Fisher spoke to him and to Sergeant Leach, Sergeant Laing having stopped a short distance away, and when "Bob" Fisher began to speak of the information which he wished to give them, Sergeant Wright called out to Sergeant Laing: "Jim, you had better come and listen to this." He then gave an account of the conversation as follows :—

"I remember when Fisher commenced the conversation he said he had asked for Leach and myself, as he thought it was only right; that he had been to the Police solicitors in respect of the information that had been given by Platt before the Royal Commission, that he had seen something in the papers regarding Platt and officers of the G. Division, and that he had worked for Platt, or he and Platt had been connected at some time or another, and whatever Platt had said in connection with our officers or whatever names he had handed in, was entirely untrue, and I think he said something about it was quite possible that the name of Leach and myself might be mentioned, as on one occasion we were somewhere in the vicinity of where he betted, and his tout came running up at the time that Platt was with him, and said: 'Look out'—I do not know whether it was Wright or Leach, but he may have mentioned our names—'Wright and Leach are about,' and it was quite possible, he said, that Platt may have handed in the two names that he remembered hearing. He said at the time that Platt was very much interested as to who Wright and Leach were, and I believe he said he walked away as though he was trying to find out where we had gone to. That was the sort of story he told us."

Sergeant Leach also gave us an account of what took place. After denying in examination by Mr. Muir, and in cross-examination by Platt, that he had ever taken any bribe from any bookmaker, he said, when examined by the Chairman as to the interview on the bridge :—

"I was going to the office, and just outside the office a man accosted me, and he told me that a man named Fisher wished to see me or Wright at twelve o'clock on the City Road Bridge. I said : 'Fisher ; what do you mean ? ' and he said : 'Fisher, the book-maker.' He then left me, and I went into the office. The other officers were there at the time, and I mentioned to Wright what had taken place, and subsequently we kept the appointment." Q. 42509

In answer to the question what Fisher said he told us :—

"I could not recall word for word, but it was to the effect about these allegations made by a man named Platt about bribing the Police in the neighbourhood of Clerkenwell and he thought it might possibly refer to either Wright or me, because on one occasion we were walking down Little Sutton Street, where he carries on business, and one of the scouts ran down, saying : 'Look out, here is Wright and Leach,' and that is how Platt might have got hold of the names, and he heard the names had been handed up, and our names might have been included amongst them. He also went on further something about that Platt had been making out that he (Platt) had been paying money to the Police, and showing names in the book, but, of course, robbing the man who had been financing him. I cannot exactly recall the words."

Sergeant Laing, after denying the allegations made against him, was examined as to the interview with which we are now dealing, and gave an account of the way in which the interview came about which agreed in substance with that given by Sergeant Wright and Sergeant Leach, but he gave us more information as to the conversation which led to the interview. He said :—

"We thought it advisable that more than one should be there. We never knew what it might lead to. Only two days before the three of us went together, and raided a receiver's place. It often necessitates two or three going together, and sometimes three or four or five or even six, if we could have them sometimes. . . . I did not know what he (Fisher) was going to communicate ; I had not the least idea. It was not till then that I knew he was in any way connected with Platt. That was when I knew it." Q. 42236

He denied that it ever occurred to him that what Fisher wanted was to see him about the evidence which Platt was giving. This seems a little surprising because he admitted that he had read about Platt's evidence in the newspapers, and his Inspector had asked him that very morning whether he knew Platt and he answered that he did not. As to what Fisher said at the interview, he did not give us so full an account as the other two officers, but what he did say is not materially different.

We have to ask ourselves whether this explanation by "Bob" Fisher and the three police officers is satisfactory. On the face of it there is certainly nothing improbable. It might be thought, on first considering it, that the ordinary course that Sergeant Leach would have taken, when spoken to by an unknown man, whom we however know to have been Chandler, one of the scouts referred to in the entry printed above, would have been to send a message to Fisher to the effect that if he had anything to say he had better step up to the station. The answer which the Police suggest is that informers often send messages of that kind, and that if they do not go and meet them at the place indicated valuable clues to some crime or knowledge that might be useful to them in some other way might be lost.

"Bob" Fisher read or learnt otherwise of Platt having given evidence on the Thursday night at about a quarter to nine, and he had a conversation with his employer, one Harry Jones, a bookmaker, on the same evening, in which, according to him, he said—

"This is a nice thing for a man to turn round and say. He says he has now five agents in the G. Division, and he is paying the Police £3 10s. a week."

We know he wrote to us on the 18th (that is if he inserted the right date) a letter which we received on the 19th. His answers do not make it clear what he did on the 19th, but it is an ascertained fact that he wrote to Messrs. Wontner & Sons on that day, and there is nothing in his evidence which amounts to a contradiction of that given by the three Police Sergeants.

We think, therefore, that there is nothing on the face of the story as told to indicate that the evidence as to the way in which this interview came about and as to what passed at it is not substantially true. Of course, as is always the case where an explanation of some incident is required in a case of this kind it is quite an easy matter for the parties concerned to arrange an account of the whole affair which shall be internally consistent and reasonably possible. If we had "Bob" Fisher alone to deal with, we should not feel justified in accepting any explanation vouched for only by his testimony ; but we have here the evidence of three Police Sergeants who have had fairly lengthy careers in the Force, and have conducted themselves so well as in due course to receive promotion, and who, at the time of these events, enjoyed the confidence of their superior officers. Apart from what Platt has said, and from the entries in the books which we have set out above, there is absolutely nothing before us showing that they were unworthy of that confidence; and, as to Sergeant Wright, neither in Platt's evidence nor in any documents that we have examined is there any thing at all tending to show that he has ever had any connection at all of an improper kind with either of the Fishers or with Platt himself. Whatever suspicion might still be left in our minds with regard to Sergeant Laing and Sergeant Leach, there is nothing at all which ought to induce us to doubt for a moment the complete integrity and veracity of Sergeant Wright. We do not think that we should be acting in accordance with sound discretion if we considered the fact that he, like the other two Sergeants, is an officer of the G. Division, afforded any basis for doubting his truthfulness. On the contrary, his presence at the interview greatly diminishes its significance as a point against the other two Sergeants. Obviously, if the interview had been between "Bob" Fisher and either Sergeant Laing or Sergeant Leach alone, or with them both, a very different complexion might still attach to the incident.

Conclusions.

We have now gone over all the materials upon which we have to form a conclusion as to whether the specific charges made by Platt against the eight members of the Force whose names are given above have been substantiated.

Our conclusions are :—

(i.) We cannot rely upon Platt's unsupported testimony.

(ii.) There is no sufficient corroboration of any of Platt's allegations against the constables accused by him.

(iii.) The members of the Force accused by him all have excellent records and are of good character.

(iv.) The charges made by Platt are not established to our satisfaction.

Summary of Results of Special Complaints.

The results of the findings in the above cases, so far as the conduct of the constables and officers complained of is concerned, may be summarised as follows:—

Gerothwohl and Lavalette's Case.—P.C.'s Isaacson, Wallington, Divers and Wellbelove, and Inspector Berry, were not guilty of the acts of misconduct alleged to have been committed by them respectively. Inspector Berry was wrong in not paying more attention to the protests of Gerothwohl and Lavalette.

The D'Angely Case.—The arrest of Eva D'Angely by P.C. Page was justified, and the conduct of P.C. Page and the other police officers and constables concerned was discreet and correct.

Clinch's Case.—P.C. Gibbard was guilty of misconduct. Inspector Gadd acted improperly in seeking and having an interview with Clinch after the charge had been made before the Inspector as station officer.

Altfuldisch's Case and Maurer's Case.—Neither Inspector Mackay nor any of the officers concerned in these cases was guilty of any misconduct.

Dubery's Case.—P.C. Murray was guilty of misconduct.

Mrs. Braham's Case.—P.C. Atkinson was guilty of misconduct. P.C. Allen's conduct was correct. Inspector Billson was guilty of errors of judgment.

Andrews' Case.—P.C.'s Dawson, Stevenson, Peck and Manning, and Sergeant Hollands, were not guilty of the acts of misconduct alleged to have been committed by them respectively.

Wilson's Case.—P.C. Worsley was guilty of misconduct.

Wells' Case.—P.C. Dunham was guilty of misconduct. Sergeant Hawes was not guilty of any of the acts of misconduct alleged against him.

Mullins' Case.—P.C. Morgan was guilty of misconduct. Inspector Wheeler committed an error of judgment.

Baker's Case.—P.C. Pittuck was guilty of misconduct. Inspector Mason committed an error of judgment.

Harding's Case.—Neither P.C. Cann nor any of the constables concerned in this case were guilty of any misconduct.

Mrs. X.'s Case.—The action of P.C. Cole and the other police officers and constables concerned in this case was correct, and they were none of them guilty of any misconduct.

Emms and Norrey's Case.—Neither P.C. Jeffery nor any of the officers concerned in this case were guilty of any misconduct.

Riley's Case.—P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp were not guilty of the acts of misconduct alleged.

Gamble's Case.—P.C. Ashford and Sergeant Sheedy were guilty of the misconduct alleged against them respectively.

Mr. Y.'s Case.—Conduct of the Police concerned was correct. P.C.'s Caladine, Earl, and Wood were not guilty of the acts of misconduct alleged against them respectively.

Platt's Case.—The charges made by Platt against the members of the Force accused by him were not established to our satisfaction.

In eleven of the special complaints into which we inquired we find that the conduct of the Police was correct, and in the remaining eight cases we find that there was misconduct, more or less serious, or errors of judgment on the part of the constables and officers concerned. In inquiring into these nineteen complaints we had to consider the circumstances of twenty-three arrests. It will be seen from the Reports above that in eighteen instances the arrests were justified, and in five not justified. In three out of the five cases in which the arrests were not justified there was conduct on the part of the person arrested which afforded some pretext for Police intervention, and in one case the constable interfered under a mistake. In no case was there misconduct found on the part of an officer of the rank of Inspector, but we found in five cases that an Inspector had committed errors of judgment, and in one case that an Inspector had committed an impropriety. The total number of the men found guilty of misconduct is nine, of whom one only, a serjeant, is of a rank above that of ordinary constable. Short particulars of the above cases, with our findings, are given in the Appendix (Table I.).

All which we humbly submit to your Majesty's gracious consideration.

TABLE GIVING PARTICULARS OF CASES INVESTIGATED WITH RESULTS.

Gerothwohl and Lavalette	Piccadilly (Vine Street). Drunkenness and Disorder. Drunk and disorderly on Boat Race night in Piccadilly	C	Dismissed by Mr. Denman. Official inquiry held.	July 23, 25, 30, October 16 — 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 6th Sittings.	(i.) Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not assaulted and arrested at the entrance to Vine Street Police Station as alleged, but were arrested on the South side of Piccadilly. (ii.) Gerothwohl and Lavalette were not drunk, but were disorderly. They were, therefore, not guilty of the offence of being drunk and disorderly on the 7th April, 1906. The police were honestly under the impression that they were drunk, and, therefore, cannot be blamed for preferring a charge of drunk and disorderly conduct against them. (iii.) The arrest of Timmings was justified and his conviction right. (iv.) P.C. Divers behaved regularly in taking over Timmings from P.C. Isaacson and bringing him to the police station. With regard to the proceedings in the charge room :— (i.) P.C. Isaacson, P.C. Wallington and P.C. Divers were not guilty of any disorder or misconduct in the charge room as alleged. (ii.) Inspector Berry maintained good order in the charge room, but was wrong in not paying more attention to the protests of Gerothwohl and Lavalette and should have sent for the Divisional Surgeon in accordance with the usual practice.
Madame D'Angely.	Regent Street (Great Marlborough Street). Solicitation. As a common prostitute behaving in a riotous and indecent manner in Regent Street.	C	Dismissed by Mr. Denman.	July 30, 31—4th and 5th Sittings.	(i.) Eva D'Angely was guilty of solicitation for the purpose of prostitution on the 24th April, 1906, and her arrest by P.C. Page was justified. (ii.) The conduct of P.C. Page and of the other police officers and constables in the matter was discreet and correct.

Clinch	King's Cross (King's Cross Road). Disorder in Street. Summons against Police Constable for assault in John's Mews, Rosebery Avenue.	G	Dismissed by Mr. Bros. Misconduct with woman also charged before Royal Commission.	Oct. 16, 17, 18—6th, 7th and 8th Sittings.	(i.) We accept the account given by Clinch as substantially true except in his description of the violent character of the assault made by P.C. Gibbard, and we do not believe the story told by the latter. (ii.) We think Inspector Gadd did not bring any improper pressure to bear on Clinch in order to induce him not to take proceedings against P.C. Gibbard, but with regard to the interview at the Post Office, seeing that a charge had been made against the constable before him as station officer, it was improper on his part to seek and have that interview with Clinch.
Altfuldisch	Soho (Great Marlborough Street). Disorder in Street. Disorderly conduct and using obscene language in Greek Street.	C	20s. or 14 days by Mr. Denman.	Oct. 16, 17—6th and 7th Sittings.	(i.) Altfuldisch, Maurer, and Ruppert were lawfully arrested by Inspector MacKay. (ii.) Neither Inspector MacKay nor any of the officers or constables concerned in these cases was guilty of any misconduct whatsoever, but on the contrary behaved with commendable promptitude and discretion under difficult circumstances.
Maurer	Soho. Disorder in Street. Disorderly conduct and using obscene language in Greek Street.	C	10s. or 7 days by Mr. Denman.	Nov. 20—14th Sitting.
Rubery	King's Cross (Hunter Street). Assault on Police Constable in cab yard in Sandwich Street. Counter-charge of assault with truncheon and drunkenness on part of Police Constable.	E	Charge of assault on Police Constable refused at Hunter Street Station. Official Inquiry held and Police Constable ordered to resign from Force for his misconduct by Assistant Commissioner Wodehouse.	Oct. 22—9th Sitting.	We agree with the decision of Assistant Commissioner Wodehouse.

Name of Complainant.	District, Class of Case and Charge.	Division of Police.	Result before Magistrate, &c.	Dates of hearing before Commission in the years 1906 and 1907.	Commissioners' Findings.
Mrs. Braham	Lambeth (Larkhall Lane). Drunkenness and disorder. Drunk and disorderly in South Lambeth Road preferred. Disorderly only taken.	W	Dismissed by Mr. Sheil. Official Inquiry held, and Police Constable and Station Officer ordered to be strictly cautioned.	Oct. 23, 24—10th and 11th Sittings.	1. As to P.C. Atkinson :— (a) We find that he was guilty of misconduct in arresting Mrs. Louise Braham. (b) We find that he did not assault her offensively as she asserted. (c) We think that he, under a mistaken impression as to her character, unnecessarily approached her, and by speech or conduct so frightened her as to make her lose her self-control. (d) Having arrested her he wrongly charged her with being "drunk and disorderly," and when that charge was refused by the Inspector he wrongly charged her with disorderly conduct, knowing that if she had been guilty of any disorder, such disorder was due to his own provocation. (e) At the Police Court, where he appeared and gave evidence as prosecutor, even if he did not make any false statement, still he did not give the magistrate a full and complete disclosure of all the relevant facts. 2. We have no comment to make upon the conduct of P.C. Allen, whose behaviour was correct throughout. 3. As to Inspector Billson :— (a) We think he was guilty of an error of judgment in having a private conversation with P.C. Atkinson. (b) We think he was guilty of an error of judgment in accepting the charge of "behaving in a disorderly manner."
Andrews -	Finsbury (Old Street). Disorder in Street. Disorderly and assaulting the Police in Luke Street. Counter-charges of assault by Police Constables, and summonses granted against Police.	G	Bound over to keep peace by Mr. Cluer. Summonses dismissed by Mr. Biron.	Oct. 24, 25—11th and 12th Sittings.	(i.) P.C. Dawson was justified in arresting Andrews. (ii.) Neither he nor P.C. Stevenson was guilty of ill-treating Andrews on the way to the Station. (iii.) P.C. Dawson rightly preferred the charge against Andrews. (iv.) Neither P.C. Manning, P.C. Dawson, P.C. Peck, nor any other Constable was guilty of assaulting and wounding Andrews at the Police Station as alleged. (v.) Sergeant Hollands rightly accepted the charge against Andrews.

Wilson -	Westbourne Park. Disorder in Street. Attempting to rescue one Mallows from lawful custody, and violently resisting lawful apprehension.	X	Dismissed by Mr. Plowden. County Court judgment for £20 damages against Police Constable for unnecessarily using truncheon.	Nov. 21, Dec. 4—15th and 20th Sittings.	(i.) P.C. Worsley was justified in using the truncheon to defend himself from an assault by George Wilson; and though it was not proved to the satisfaction of the learned Judge that the blow on the head was necessary, yet under the circumstances the difficulty of avoiding excess of force was so great that the Constable ought not to be censured for such excess. (ii.) P.C. Worsley was guilty of serious misconduct in striking G. Wilson while he was on the ground, for which he has been adequately punished.
Wells -	Islington (Upper Street). Disorder in the Street. Disorderly conduct and using obscene language at Highbury Barn.	N	Dismissed by Mr. Fordham.	Nov. 22, 28, Dec. 14—16th, 17th, and 27th Sittings.	(i.) That P.C. Dunham was not justified in arresting Wells; that P.C. Dunham wrongfully preferred a charge of disorderly conduct and making use of obscene language at Kelvin Road against Wells; and that P.C. Dunham at the Police Court gave evidence which tended to exaggerate the case against defendant in such a way that the Magistrate might have been misled. (ii.) That Sergeant Hawes was not guilty of any improper conduct in the charge room. (iii.) That Sergeant Hawes did exercise due and reasonable care in seeing that the cells were clean and fit for the reception of prisoners. (iv.) That Wells was not detained unnecessarily at the Police Station.
Mullins -	Lambeth (Kennington Road). Drunkenness and disorder. Drunk and disorderly and using obscene language in Oakley Street.	L	Dismissed by Mr. Rose.	Nov. 22, 29, Dec. 3—16th, 18th, and 19th Sittings.	(i.) P.C. Morgan, owing to provocation innocently given by Mullins, lost his temper and assaulted him. (ii.) Upon Mullins coming back to P.C. Morgan in Oakley Street and asking for his number, the latter wrongfully arrested the former, and took him to the police station. (iii.) In making the arrest and taking the prisoner to the station, P.C. Morgan used more force than was necessary. (iv.) P.C. Morgan wrongfully assaulted Mullins in the charge room at the police station by striking him a blow in the face, causing him slight injury. (v.) P.C. Morgan gave false evidence in support of the charge at the Police Court. (vi.) Inspector Wheeler was guilty of an error of judgment in accepting the charge of drunkenness

Name of Complainant.	District, Class of Case, and Charge.	Division of Police.	Result before Magistrate, &c.	Date of hearing before Commission in the years 1906 and 1907.	Commissioners' Findings.
Baker	Notting Hill Gate (Notting Hill). Drunkenness and Disorder. Drunk and disorderly in Kensington Place.	F	Dismissed by Mr. Garrett.	Nov. 22, Dec. 4—16th and 20th Sittings.	(i.) P.C. Pittuck was guilty of an error of judgment in demanding Baker's name and address. (ii.) P.C. Pittuck wrongfully arrested Baker. (iii.) P.C. Pittuck falsely preferred a charge of being drunk and disorderly against Baker. (iv.) Inspector Mason committed an error of judgment in accepting the charge preferred. (v.) Inspector Mason did exercise reasonable care in summoning the doctors whose names and addresses were given to him by Baker. (vi.) Inspector Mason did not improperly insist on Baker being examined by Dr. Jackson. (vii.) P.C. Pittuck did not make a full and complete disclosure of all the relevant facts to the Magistrate at the Police Court.
Harding, alias Tresadera	Whitechapel (Commercial Street). Disorder in Street. Summons for assaulting Policeman in execution of his duty in Sclater Street.	H	Dismissed by Mr. Cluer.	Dec. 4, 5, 6—20th, 21st, and 23rd Sittings.	All the constables concerned in the arrest of Callaghan, and his conveyance to the Commercial Street Police Station, did their duty remarkably well under very trying circumstances. The accusations made by Harding against Police Constable Cann of having falsely and maliciously instituted proceedings against him wholly fail, and Harding was guilty of the assault and battery for which he was prosecuted.
Mrs. X (heard in camera.)	Regent Street (Great Marlborough Street). Solicitation. Using insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace may have been occasioned at Oxford Street.	C	Dismissed by Mr. Denman under Section 16 of Summary Jurisdiction Act.	Dec. 5, 7, 10—22nd, 24th and 25th Sittings.	That the complaint of Mrs. X fails, and that the action of the constables concerned was correct.

Emms and Norrey	Whitechapel (Commercial Street). Disorder in Street. Assaulting Policeman in Brick Lane (Emms was arrested summarily, and Norrey on Warrant.)	H	Dismissed by Mr. Cluer as against both accused.	Dec. 13, 14, 19, Jan. 29, 30—26th, 27th, 28th, 30th, and 31st Sittings.	(1) P.C. Jeffery did not, without provocation or justification, assault and beat Emms with his truncheon; but Emms and Norrey, without justification, assaulted and beat P.C. Jeffery, who used the truncheon in self-defence and without more force than was reasonably necessary to defend himself against his assailants. (2) P.C. Jeffery was justified in arresting Emms and causing him to be conveyed in an ambulance by other constables to the police station. (3) P.C. Jeffery did not make any false charge against Emms, but rightly charged him with being concerned with a man not in custody in assaulting him whilst in the execution of his duty at Brick Lane. (4) Emms, whilst rising from a chair on which he had been placed in the charge room, was compelled by force by P.C. Wood, another constable, to sit down on the chair for the purpose of having his wounds attended to by the divisional surgeon but the force used was not such as to cause any additional pain to Emms, or to injure him in any way. (5) P.C. Jeffery did not give false evidence at the Police Court in support of the charge against either Emms or Norrey (6) P.C. Jeffery did not maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, commence and carry on a prosecution against John Norrey, but on the other hand Norrey was jointly guilty with Edward Emms of an assault and battery on that police constable. (7) The complaint of Mrs. Allen and Mrs. Hoy is quite unfounded. (8) The complaint of Emms that he was ill-treated at the police station is quite unfounded.

Name of Complainant.	District, Class of Case, and Charge.	Division of Police.	Result before Magistrate, &c.	Dates of hearing before Commission, in the years 1906 and 1907.	Commissioner's Findings.
Riley	Shadwell. Drunkenness and disorder. Drunk and disorderly and using obscene language in Old Gravel Lane.	H	2s. 6d. or one day by Mr. Dickinson.	Jan. 28, 29—29th and 30th Sittings.	(i.) P.C. Mizen did not, while taking Riley to the police station at the time in question, assault him by striking him in the face with his fist. (ii.) P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp did not use any unnecessary violence in taking Riley to the police station on that night. (iii.) P.C. Mizen and P.C. Kemp did not give false evidence at the police court when they denied that P.C. Mizen had struck Riley, as above mentioned.
Gamble or Pearce.	Whitechapel. Disorder in Street. Assault by Police.	H	No proceedings taken.	Feb. 20, 21, 28, March 4, 5—35th, 36th, 37th, 38th and 39th Sittings.	(i.) P.C. Ashford was guilty of the misconduct alleged, but in kicking Gamble did not intend to do him the serious injury which resulted. (ii.) Sergeant Sheedy was guilty of misconduct in that :— (a) He did not intervene between Gamble and the constable, whom he observed in conflict in Osborn Place, and terminate the disturbance, ascertain its cause, and then take the consequential steps which the performance of his duty under the ascertained circumstances required. (b) He omitted to make any report at all to the Inspector or other superior officer.
Mr. Y (Heard in camera.)	Regent Street (Vine Street). Disorder in Street. Attempting to rescue Miss A from lawful custody of Police at Piccadilly.	C	Bound over by Mr. Denman.	June 11, 13, 18—56th, 57th, and 58th Sittings.	That Mr. Y's complaint was unfounded, and that the conduct of the Police concerned in the arrest of Miss A. and Miss B. and Mr. Y was correct.
Platt	Street Betting. Bribery of Policemen by Street Bookmakers in Lambeth, Clerkenwell, Tooting.	L G V & W	——	Oct. 18, 22, 26, Jan. 30, 31, Feb. 1, Mar. 26, April 11, 12, 17, 19, June 21—8th, 9th, 13th, 31st, 32nd, 33rd, 40th, 43rd, 44th, 45th, 46th and 59th Sittings.	(i.) We cannot rely upon Platt's unsupported testimony. (ii.) There is no sufficient corroboration of any of Platt's allegations against the constables accused by him. (iii.) The members of the force accused by him all have excellent records and are of good character. (iv.) The charges made by Platt are not established to our satisfaction.

* The fall in numbers results from the alteration in procedure subsequent to the Cass case.

† Previous to 1893 charges against prostitutes for drunken and disorderly conduct were included under this heading.

‡ Previous to 1893 persons bound over to keep the peace were regarded as convicted; since that year the large number bailed under the provisions of 34 Edward III., c. i., or the Magistrates' Commission of the Peace, are shown as discharged.

I certify this return to be correct,

T. MOORE,

Superintendent Executive Branch.

New Scotland Yard

17th October, 1906.

RETURN 22.

RETURN of the Number of Apprehensions by the Metropolitan Police Force in each of the Years 1903, 1904, 1905, and of the number of Cases in which proceedings were taken against Members of the Force in respect of such Arrests, or in which, after inquiry, they were found not to have been justified by the facts (being the RETURN to an Address to the House of Commons, dated 15th May, 1906).

Year. (1)	Number of Persons Apprehended and Dealt with by Magistrates. (2)	Number of Cases in which Legal Proceedings were taken against Members of the Force in respect of such Arrests. (3)	Number of Cases in which after Inquiry (of a Disciplinary Nature by Superior Officers) the Arrests were found not to have been justified by the facts. (4)
1903	124,554	5	20
1904	126,530	3	34
1905	127,317	4	24
Total	378,401	12	78

Five cases included in column (3) are also included in column (4).

NOTES.—In addition to the numbers in column (2), 836 persons were apprehended during 1903, 1,075 during 1904, and 1,193 during 1905 for various minor offences and liberated on bail by police to appear at Court, but failed to attend at the hearing of the case.

The results of the proceedings in the 12 cases in column (3) were as follows:—

No. of Cases.	Results of Proceedings.
3	Charge dismissed.
2	Charge dismissed with costs against complainant.
1	Complainant failed to appear, the constable having apologised.
1	Case settled by plaintiff paying costs.
1	Jury stopped the case, plaintiff to pay costs.
1	Plaintiff awarded ¼d. damages, each side to pay own costs.
1	Constable ordered by magistrate to pay 21s. towards costs. In subsequent County Court proceedings the constable was ordered to pay 1s. damages, but without costs.
1	Plaintiff awarded £20 damages and costs. The County Court held that the constable was justified in using his truncheon, but used it more than was necessary.
1	Constable fined 40s. or one month's imprisonment.

In 67 of the 78 cases included in column (4), the charge made by the constable against the person arrested was refused at the police station.

E. R. HENRY,
Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

New Scotland Yard,
13th June, 1906.

RETURN 26.

RETURN showing the Amount of Fines imposed upon Bookmakers for Betting in Streets situated within the Metropolitan Police District, during each of the ten years ended 31st December, 1905.

Superintendent,
Executive Branch.

MEMORANDUM AS TO THE EVIDENCE OF MR. ——— ONE OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE MAGISTRATES.

The Commission have the honour to invite Mr. ——— to give evidence relevant to the inquiry which they are making under the warrant appointing them dated the 28th May, 1906.

They beg leave to state that the terms of reference in that warrant are as follows:—

"To inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged, with power to make recommendations thereon."

The Commission request Mr. ———

(a) To state what, in his opinion, are the duties of constables in the metropolis in regard to the three above-mentioned classes of cases?

(b) Whether, in his opinion, those duties are discharged as a rule with discretion, honesty, and efficiency?

(c) To state the recent instances (if any) of misconduct on the part of constables which have come under his notice.

(d) To make such comments and criticisms on and such recommendations as to the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force as to the above-mentioned classes of cases as may, in his opinion, assist the Commission in making its Report.

In making this request the Commission beg leave to say that they do not wish to press Mr. ——— to reply in public to any questions the answer to which, or any expression of opinion upon which, publicly made might be detrimental to the public service; but they will be obliged if he will communicate the answers to such questions (if any) to the Commission privately.

For Mr. ———'s assistance the Commission beg leave to call his attention to the following matters upon some or all of which members of the Commission may ask questions:—

I.—Rules and regulations framed for the guidance of the police and issued to constables in the instruction book.

Suggestions for their amendment.

Does he recommend their being made more specific?

II.—Arrest.

Method of effecting arrest.

Taking prisoner to station.

Use of truncheon.

Treatment of prisoner in charge-room and at station.

Have any prisoners recently complained to witness that they have been treated by constables irregularly or with undue violence?

Were any of such complaints, in witness's judgment, well founded?

Has witness any reason for believing that constables use their powers of arrest unjustly or unnecessarily?

Do they summarily arrest persons whose names and addresses are known or might be easily ascertained, and against whom proceedings by summons would be equally efficacious?

Has witness recently tried any cases of alleged assault by constables?

If so, give instances, and state the result in each case.

III.—The charge-room.

Maintenance of order in the charge-room.

Duties of Inspector in command of the charge-room.

Duties of Inspector as to taking or refusing a charge.

Are the regulations as to taking or refusing a charge satisfactory?

Treatment of prisoner in charge-room.

When should he be placed in the dock?

Do Inspectors as a rule exercise a sound discretion in taking or refusing charges?

Does the judgment of the witness in favour of the defendant usually imply or involve an error of judgment or blameworthy conduct on the part of the officer taking the charge?

Does witness recollect any cases in which the Inspector was clearly guilty of wrong or negligent conduct in taking a charge?

If so, give instances.

Does witness's experience lead him to believe that Inspectors are, from professional bias or habit or other causes, unduly prone to take charges that a magistrate or other competent unbiassed person not connected with the police force would, if he were in command of the charge-room, refuse?

In witness's opinion ought the proceedings in the charge-room to be regarded simply as, firstly, a disciplinary check on the action of the constable preferring the charge; and, secondly, as a means of securing the attendance of the person arrested at the police court by making arrangements for his due custody or his release on bail; or should they be regarded as also involving a preliminary investigation into the guilt of the prisoner?

Having regard to the damage to reputation sometimes sustained by innocent persons in consequence of their being publicly put upon their trial for these street offences, is witness of opinion that some reform is desirable in the regulations as to taking and refusing charges?

Witness is respectfully requested to consider whether the question of taking or refusing the charge might in doubtful cases be postponed for further inquiry, and the prisoner in the first instance released upon giving sufficient bail for his appearance at the police station if called for at a later time for the further consideration of the question whether the charge should be taken.

Witness is also requested to consider whether it would be expedient to cast the duty of taking or refusing a charge upon public servants not members of the police force and not appointed by the Chief Commissioner or other police authority.

IV.—The cells.

Taking of prisoner to cells.

Treatment in cells.

V.—Bail.

Are the regulations as to taking bail at police stations satisfactory?

Do prisoners complain that the facilities for obtaining bail are insufficient?

Do they complain that their sureties are kept waiting for too long a time?

To what, if any, extent are such complaints well founded?

VI.—Medical attendance on prisoners.

Are the regulations as to medical assistance satisfactory?

Have any cases recently come under the notice of witness in which there has been an improper neglect to summon medical assistance?

In cases of alleged drunkenness what is the practice of the Court when witness is presiding as to the reception of medical certificates as to the prisoners' condition when charged?

VII.—Under what statutory provisions are cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets dealt with?

N.B.—The attention of the Commission has been drawn by Sir E. Henry, Chief Commissioner, to the following provisions:—

(a) As to drunkenness:—
Police Act, 1839, s. 58.
Licensing Act, 1872, s. 4, s. 12.
Licensing Act, 1902, s. 1, s. 2.

(b) As to disorder:—
Police Act, 1829, s. 7.
Police Act, 1839, s. 64, s. 54 (12) and (13), s. 63.

(c) As to solicitation:—
Police Act, 1839, s. 54 (11), (12), (13), s. 64.
Vagrancy Act, 1824, ss. 3 and 4.

VIII.—Application of the statutory provisions.

Does witness experience any special difficulty in the application of the statutory provisions to individual cases?

If so, explain the difficulty, and state to what extent, if any, such difficulty is due to the wording of these provisions.

Judging from witness's experience, are the regulations made for the guidance of or the instructions given to constables as to the exercise of their powers of arrest in the three classes of cases above mentioned sufficiently clear?

In solicitation cases what evidence does witness usually require from the prosecutor as prima-facie evidence—

(a) That the defendant is a common prostitute or night-walker?

(b) Loitering or being in a thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers?

Does witness usually require the evidence of a person solicited or annoyed, in addition to that of the prosecuting constable?

In cases where the defendant is charged under the Police Act, s. 54 (13), what evidence does witness accept as sufficient to make out a prima-facie case of "insulting words or behaviour?"

Does witness accept mere solicitation by the defendant as some evidence of "insulting behaviour" within the meaning of the section?

What view has witness formed as to the conduct of constables and superior officers in dealing with cases of

(a) Drunkenness, and

(b) Solicitation?

Has drunkenness in the streets diminished during recent years?

Is the number of charges dealt with by witness decreasing?

Has the action of the police in recent years tended to diminish solicitation in the streets or the number of prostitutes frequenting the streets?

Generally, has the action of the police in regard to the suppression of disorderly houses upon the condition of the streets?

Generally, has the action of the police in that regard and in regard to solicitation tended to the improvement of morals in the Metropolis?

Has witness any recommendations to make as to the conduct of the police in regard to cases of drunkenness and solicitation?

Solicitation of women by men:—

Under what statutory provisions or common law rules does witness deal with charges made by women of solicitation or molestation by men?

Are such charges frequent?

Has witness reason to believe that the powers of the police are insufficient to protect women in the streets from molestation by men?

IX.—Alleged bribery of and blackmailing by constables.

Have any defendants recently complained of being blackmailed by constables, or have any cases of acceptance of bribes by constables come under witness's notice?

If so, give instances.

Has witness any ground for believing that the bribery of constables by prostitutes or street bookmakers is common or widespread?

X.—Duties of constables as to prosecuting charges.

Are prosecutions usually conducted in a satisfactory manner?

Ought the constable preferring the charge to be more frequently represented by counsel or solicitor?

Does witness ever require the evidence of persons other than members of the police force before convicting?

XI.—How does witness deal with complaints made to him by defendants or by members of the public of misconduct on the part of constables or superior officers?

Is it his practice to communicate with the Home Office or the Chief Commissioner as to any such complaints?

Does witness ever of his own motion, as the result of facts coming to his knowledge, communicate with the Home Office or the Chief Commissioner as to the conduct of constables or superior officers?

If so, has witness any comments or criticisms to make on the action or inaction of the Home Office or the Chief Commissioner in regard to his communications?

Dated the . day of , 1907.

TWELVE SUGGESTIONS SENT IN BY MR. TIMEWELL, SECRETARY OF THE POLICE AND PUBLIC VIGILANCE ASSOCIATION.

1. The first suggestion is that the Metropolitan Police Force should be placed under the control of the direct representatives of the electors in the Metropolis who would be more amenable to the wishes of the people than the Home Secretary.

2. The second suggestion is that the highest appointments should be open to men of the rank and file, so that, as in the legal, medical, and other professions, the Chief of the Police should be fully equipped for his responsible duties by experience gained in the various grades through which he has passed.

3. The third suggestion is that in order to ensure that men of integrity should attain to the most responsible positions, the rank and file should be permitted, in certain cases, at any rate, to communicate directly to the Watch Committee, and, supposing they were under a Watch Committee, assured that, whatever their rank, their communications should receive proper attention. If this were done, for instance, by policemen who found themselves unduly pressed by their officers to make arrests, or who were being trained and encouraged to disregard the sanctity of an oath to get convictions it would probably have the threefold effect of assisting those in authority to select the most worthy men for promotion, and of redressing a police and prisoners' grievance at the same time.

4. The fourth suggestion is that the age at which men may join the force should be raised to 25 or 30 years. The public would then have the advantage of more matured men as recruits, and the further advantage of retaining their services up to the age of 50 or 55, while the saving in pensions would be very considerable, and the number of pensioners entering the labour market to compete unfairly with the ordinary workers would be materially reduced. He stated that the total expenditure of the Pension Fund for the year ending March 31st, 1906, amounted to £450,485 19s. 10d.

5. The fifth suggestion is that recruiting should cease for a time, and the undesirables should be carefully weeded out until the force should be reduced to a size (say, 10,000 or 12,000) that would compare in relation to the population, etc., with provincial towns. It is undoubtedly a mistake to think of the force as having to control (that is how it is often referred to—that the force has to control so many millions of people) seven millions of people. The overwhelming majority of those people are not only law abiding themselves, but they would be ready to assist in preserving the peace among others. With regard to this fifth suggestion I should like to point out to you the difference in the cost of the Metropolitan Police and the cost of the provincial police, and in order to do that I have added the population of 31 of our largest towns together, which make up a population of something over the population of the Metropolitan Police District. The population of the 31 largest towns in England and Wales was 6,606,310. The population of the Metropolitan Police District was 6,554,449. That is a population greater than the population of the Metropolitan Police District by 51,861. The inhabited houses in the 31 towns were 1,298,264, and in the Metropolitan Police District 924,143, being less by 374,121. The strength of the Metropolitan Police Force in fifteen years was 15,565, and for the 31 large towns 10,144, so that the strength of the police of the 31 towns was smaller by 5,421. The salaries and pay of the Metropolitan Police Force were £1,589,966, and for the 31 towns £904,886, so that the amount of salaries and pay of police of the 31 towns was smaller by £685,080. The gross total cost of the Metropolitan Police was for the same years £2,196,321, and for the 31 towns £1,164,279. That shows that the cost of the police of the 31 towns was smaller by £1,032,042. That is taken from the Police Report (County and Borough) for the year ending the 20 h September, 1906. The figures are taken from this report simply for comparison, they probably having been all prepared in the same way and at the same time.

6. The sixth suggestion is that it may be well to consider seriously whether the regulations as to the procuring of refreshments by the police while on duty should not be relaxed, and whether policemen who are found drunk on duty should not be more severely dealt with than at present. I think it impossible to really prohibit drinking. It would seem, therefore, to be the wiser course to remove the cause, or one of the causes, of secret drinking which appears to make many policemen servants of publicans and a very real danger to the public. I think if the foregoing suggestions were carried into effect the great bulk of wilful and careless mistakes would be prevented, and if the following suggestions were acted upon many other unavoidable mistakes would doubtless be discovered, and much needless suffering and humiliation would be avoided.

7. The seventh suggestion is that persons on being charged at a police station should be immediately handed over to the care of a neutral person not connected with the force, who should be responsible, say, to the Magistrate, for the safe keeping of accused persons, and for the production of the charge sheet, together with a written and signed account of anything the person or the police may say when the charge is taken. This latter would obviate any dispute as to what was actually said at a time when the prisoner is usually without witnesses. The person having charge of prisoners awaiting trial should be empowered to accept bail of one or more persons (I say one or more, because in very poor districts £10 bail from one person may make it impossible for him to get bail at all; whereas if they will take two persons or three persons for a smaller amount they would get it) in suitable cases at a uniform rate, according to the offence with which the prisoners are charged, and as far as possible to arrange for their attendance before the Magistrate at a time when their work would be the least interfered with. At the trial he or an assistant should make any inquiries the Magistrate may require. If a Magistrate wants to verify any statement, either a statement made by the police or by an accused person, I do not think a member of the Police Force is a proper person to send to make those inquiries. Therefore it seems to me that the fairest way would be for the Magistrate to have a certain number of, you might call them police court officials, if you like, to make such inquiries, so that they would be perfectly sure that those inquiries were made fairly.

8. The eighth suggestion is that police courts should be really open to the public, so that anyone desiring to hear a case tried, or, say, wishing to give evidence on behalf of a stranger, should have an opportunity of doing so. I think if the people who wanted to give evidence could enter the police court anywhere, say, in a public gallery or in a public place, and a case was brought before the Magistrate which they recognised—they might know a man by name, or know something about it, because they had perhaps seen the arrest the previous night—they would be able to say, "I will go and give evidence on behalf of that man." At the present time it appears to me there is no possibility of getting into a police court.

9. The ninth recommendation is that all evidence should be given on oath or affirmation, including evidence of previous convictions, which should be given at the proper time, so as not to embarrass persons with a bad record who might be innocent of the charge on which they are at that time before the court.

10. The tenth recommendation is that it should be made less difficult to obtain process against policemen who wilfully commit perjury. No one would desire that they should be recklessly proceeded against, but there ought to be some limit to a Magistrate's discretion which should preclude him from saying, in effect, "If you lay before me the sworn information of six reliable witnesses I shall refuse to allow the police to be tried."

11. The eleventh recommendation is that in cases where official legal assistance is required for the police it would be well for a representative of the Chief Commissioner to personally interview the officers concerned before engaging a solicitor. I mean it should not be left to the local police to decide whether a certain constable should be defended or not.

12. Recommendation twelve is with regard to medical men. It may well be worth considering whether it would not be in the interests of all parties concerned to have a number of medical men on the books at each police station who would be willing to visit accused persons at stated fees instead of limiting the work to the divisional police as at present.

NOTE.—These recommendations were made by Mr. Timewell on behalf of the Police and Public Vigilance Society, excepting numbers 6 and 7, which were made by Mr. Timewell in his own name.

EXTRACTS FROM EVIDENCE TAKEN BEFORE THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF 1834.

The following are the extracts from the evidence given before the Select Committee referred to in our report.

(Evidence of Lieutenant-Colonel Rowan and Mr. Richard Mayne.)

Q. 1.—(To Colonel Rowan.) Are you one of the Commissioners that have been appointed to carry into execution the Metropolitan Police Act which passed in 1829?—(A.) I am.

Q. 2.—(To Mr. Mayne.) Are you the other Commissioner?—(A.) I am.

Q. 3.—Under what authority were you appointed to that situation?—(A.) Under sign manual.

Q. 4.—When was the Police first established?—(Colonel Rowan.) In September, 1829, but not all at once; being deemed an experiment, it was thought necessary to enter upon it by degrees, and therefore the district was taken charge of by the police in parts at three different periods, viz., in September, 1829, in February, 1830, and in May following.

Q. 5.—To what extent was it established in 1829?—(A.) Less than one-third; six of the seventeen divisions were established in September, 1829.

Q. 6.—When did the first increase for that establishment take place?—(A.) In February following.

Q. 7.—What was the addition made to the districts over which the police then watched?—(A.) There were seven additional divisions appointed in February, 1830, and the remaining four, making up the seventeen, in the following May.

Q. 8.—Then in May the whole district was completed?—(A.) It was.

Q. 9.—So that from May, 1830, the whole of the Police Force, as it now stands, has been in actual operation?—(A.) Yes, it has been added to since that in a trifling degree in numbers.

Q. 10.—What is the strength of the Police Establishment?—(A.) I will state the strength as it stood upon the completion in May, 1830, and also what it is at present. In May, 1830, after the completion, it stood: 17 superintendents, 68 inspectors, 318 sergeants, and 2,892 police constables. It now stands: 17 superintendents, 70 inspectors (being an increase of two), 342 sergeants (being an increase of twenty-four sergeants), and 2,968 police constables (being an increase of 76 police constables), which were added from time to time by the authority of the Secretary of State.

Q. 11.—The districts remain the same?—(A.) The divisions remain nearly the same, and there is no increase of district.

Q. 12.—What was the gross in 1830, and what is the gross now?—(A.) 3,259 in 1830, and at present 3,397.

Q. 13.—Has there been any alteration in the police force since the 30th of March, 1831?—(A.) Yes, there have been occasional small additions.

Q. 14.—So that the total numbers now are greater than they were on the 30th of March, 1831, when the last return was made to Parliament?—(A.) Yes.

Q. 4181.—It has been stated to the Committee that a practice has lately been introduced of suffering an inspector or sergeant, or even an inferior officer, if he be acting in the place of an inspector, to examine witnesses, and take on him the responsibility of discharging persons given into custody; and it is said to be a new practice, and to have led to inconveniences; and an instance of that inconvenience is represented to have occurred in a case connected with the Mint, in which a child of very tender years had had to give evidence; the child was examined by the magistrates, and asked the usual questions as to the child's knowledge of a future state, and then the oath was administered, and the child examined; and upon her evidence the magistrate was going to commit the man for trial; the individual was a dexterous person, and waited very patiently; and as soon as the examination was over the prisoner said, "Your Worship, that child has given you a very different account from what she did when this was tried before the inspector." The magistrate says he was a little astonished, and said, "What do you mean by 'being tried before?'" The mother stepped forward and said, "Your Worship, the whole case has been investigated at the station house; one of the constables came and took the child out of bed at 2 o'clock in the morning out of its sleep, and examined the child, and asked it a great many questions; and other witnesses were examined at a later hour at night at the station house." The magistrate said he was a good deal astonished at that; but the man proved, by cross-examination of the child and other witnesses, that she had given a different account before the mother explained it. The magistrate had no doubt that the correct account was one given when the child came before him; but there was such a variation in the two accounts given by the child, he did not send the man to trial; and he says he sent for the inspector, and pointed out the impropriety of the conduct pursued. The officer stated to the magistrate he had done it as part of his duty, and the magistrates understand from that it is a part of the system. Now this is given before Mr. Broughton. What the Committee wish to know is, if you have a recollection of any such occurrence as that?—(A.) I have got a report here of the proceedings of a case, which we suppose to be the one in question.

Q. 4182.—Does it appear from that report that the transaction was as represented here, and that the officer had been acting contrary to his duty? (Mr. Mayne read the report.)—(A.) On reference I cannot ascertain that a mint case has occurred with such circumstances, but another case, and which I conceive to be the same, from the circumstance of the child having been examined and taken out of "a warm bed," as stated by the Magistrate, was reported to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the course pursued by the police was approved of by the Under Secretary of State. I should say that Mr. Broughton has made representations to us on that and other occasions, and we have told him we acted under the direction of the Secretary of State, and, as we conceived, we were bound by law to do.

Q. 4183.—What is the usual practice with reference to the discharge of persons brought to the station-house?—(A.) There is a mistake made by some of the Magistrates by not attending to the distinction between discharging a case after it has been received and not taking a charge. I think the case is not a regular charge until the person who makes the charge has signed the charge in the charge-book or in the charge-sheet, which goes before the Magistrate. The Superintendent or Inspector, or whoever acts in his place, is not authorised to discharge, nor does he discharge anyone after the person has signed a charge, but the Inspector is authorised to question before he takes the charge the persons who bring it relative to the nature of the case brought to the station; he finds frequently that which the party making the charge calls a felony is no felony at all. The Commissioners for some time past have had weekly returns sent in of the number of cases in which charges have been refused, and the particular reason given for refusing each charge; we find, by looking over those carefully, that in the last two months there have been between 700 and 800 cases brought to the several police-stations which the officer there had refused to receive. I can only say, if I had been sitting at the watch-house that I do not think there were more than one or two cases in the whole 700 or 800 in which I should have taken the charge had it been offered to me, and I conceive great injustice would have been done, from the nature of the cases, had the charge been received and the parties locked up. There are charges of various kinds. One charge of felony was this: Two persons had been drinking in a public-house; they had made a bet of 1s. on some trifling circumstance; the man who lost refused to pay; he was immediately given in charge of the police for felony. That is merely one out of a thousand, which proves the nature of the cases refused at the stations. I should say, generally, if the whole of the charges were taken which are brought to the police and offered to them as charges, sometimes by constables, sometimes by private individuals, the police service could not be carried on, such an outcry would be raised against the police on the injustice of taking such charges where there is so great a facility in making them. Comparing former periods, when there was not so great a facility for taking charges with the present state, when a police-constable is at every point, and parties have an opportunity at the moment of giving parties in charge, it becomes a different question, and a very serious question, whether every case is to be taken.—(Mr. Mayne.) I have had some conversation with the Secretary of State upon the subject, and pointing out the inconvenience of every charge made being received by the police, mentioned, as an instance, that when we dismissed a police-constable without pay, letters have been written to us that we had robbed the individual of his pay; suppose that charge was made to a police-constable thus against one of the Commissioners, "I charge you with robbing me," the Commissioner is taken down to the station-house; he states who he is; the dismissed constable insists he robbed him, because the Commissioner refused to allow him his pay; are we to be locked up for 12 or 36 hours on that charge? There are also many cases where drunken women and others make charges so foolish and groundless that no police-officer would be justified in receiving the charge and locking the party up, as must be the consequence.

Q. 4184.—Are those charges not received reported to you?—(A.) Yes; and the reasons stated for which they are not received, which we examine into, to see if the discretion has or has not been properly exercised.

Q. 4185.—Have you, ever since the establishment of the police, had reason to doubt the accuracy and truth of the representations made to you of those charges that have not been received?—(A.) No; nor have any complaints been made to us on the subject, and we think complaints would have been made had any ground for them existed.

Q. 4186.—But more particularly with reference to your own Superintendents or Inspectors who may have been entrusted with using that discretion of receiving or otherwise, the charge, have you had reason to doubt their having refused to receive charges, and having neglected or omitted to represent to you that they have had such charges made to them, but they have refused to take them?—(Colonel Rowan.) The order from the Commissioners to keep the account of each case is not of very long standing, but it has been done by the Superintendents of their own accord in a number of divisions from the commencement; the order from us to keep the whole of the cases in which the charges have been refused was given within the last two months. (Mr. Mayne.) I do not think the police officer could make any answer to an action for false imprisonment if he locked up a party upon a wholly groundless or foolish charge, though the charge had been made to him by another.

Q. 4187.—Is there any check you have on them to insure the faithful discharge of duty by these Superintendents or Inspectors?—(A.) I take it we have a very efficient check by the manner in which we communicate on all occasions with them, and all classes in the service, also from the great pains we have taken to make it known that we are ready to hear and attend to every complaint by whomsoever preferred. (Mr. Mayne.) And if any person is improperly discharged, some one is most likely interested in the case who would make complaint. If a party making the charge feels aggrieved by its not being received, he would complain to the Commissioners; nor does the refusal by the Inspector prevent the charge from being made subsequently before a Magistrate. In all the cases brought under our notice, the party discharged was to be found, and might have been taken before a Magistrate subsequently, had there been cause to do so, from the Inspector having improperly refused to receive the charge and detain him at the station.

Q. 4188.—Does it occur frequently that prosecutors do complain to you when persons are improperly discharged?—(A.) I do not recollect a single instance of it; a great number of complaints have been made by Magistrates and the public of charges being too frequently and readily taken. The Inspector is restricted, also, by an order upon the subject, that during the hours a Magistrate is sitting, or at any time in the day, whatever the charge is, if the party is brought into custody to the station, he is to be taken then before a Magistrate; so that when a Magistrate is sitting, if a person is brought in custody he is not discharged at the station, as he would be at night, but is in every case taken before the Magistrate; for being already in custody, no inconvenience arises from taking him directly before a Magistrate to be discharged at once, if the Magistrate thinks fit to do so.

Q. 4189.—The practice is, in criminal cases, where an individual gives a person in charge, if he signs the charge-book, giving his address, and so on, that then in such case that person given in charge is detained until he can be carried before a Magistrate?—(Colonel Rowan.) Invariably. (Mr. Mayne.) When the charge-sheet is signed, the charge is received, and not before. The course pursued by the Inspector on duty at the station, when a party is brought there to be charged, is as follows:—In the first place, the Inspector inquires the nature of the charge, that, if true, he may know it is such as would justify him in locking up the party; having ascertained that, if supported by primâ facie, or indeed, any credible evidence, it is received; but if it should appear, as it does sometimes, on a little inquiry, that the alleged felony is such as, for instance, that which Colonel Rowan has already mentioned about the bet in a public-house, and there are many cases of that nature, or if a woman of the town charges a man with robbing her because he had refused to pay her for prostitution, in these, and the very many other cases of that nature, the Inspector refuses to take the charge.

Q. 4190.—What is the mode of proceeding observed at station-houses when a charge is exhibited?—(A.) As I have stated, the complainant is asked the nature of his charge, and if it appears such as would justify the Inspector in locking the party up, the Inspector inquires on what grounds he makes the charge; that is stated in general terms, and unless it appears exceedingly improbable, the Inspector receives the charge, and the party complaining signs his name, and the constable signs also, if there be one in the case; the charge-sheet is the next morning taken before a Magistrate, and each case is then heard and disposed of by him, and the parties produced, or their absence explained, and if out on bail, etc. An account of the charge-sheets delivered out from the Commissioners' office is kept, and the Superintendent of each division is obliged to account for all delivered to him, so that it is not in his power to destroy one, or substitute another, without it being discovered.

Q. 4192.—You are not aware of any practical inconvenience that results from the present mode of taking charges at the station house?—(A.) No, and I take the practice, as I have described it, to be not only according to law and common sense, but so much grievous injury would be done, and such an outcry raised in consequence, if every charge brought to the station was received, and the parties either locked up or held to bail to appear at a police office next day, that it would be impossible for the police to stand against the public feeling that, I think, must necessarily be excited against them; in many cases it would be an intolerable evil to lock females up merely because a charge was made against them, although it appeared at the time wholly groundless; some of the magistrates have found fault with the police for locking up persons, when it turned out that the inspector had not exercised a sound discretion on the case. The Commissioners take every opportunity to instruct the Inspectors and correct them wherever it appeared they had decided wrongly; but that will happen sometimes; it is an unavoidable evil.

Q. 4243.—Is there a person always in attendance to take any complaints that may be brought at your office?—(Colonel Rowan.) Always (Mr. Mayne.) Day and night.

Q. 4244.—And if such complaints are lodged at your office, how soon do they come under the eye of the Commissioners?—(Colonel Rowan.) Either the same day or the following morning. (Mr. Mayne.) The same moment frequently.

Q. 4245.—But never longer than the following day?—(Colonel Rowan.) Never longer than that.

Q. 4246.—How long a time usually elapses after the complaint has come under the eye of the Commissioners before attention is given to it by letter to the party complaining?—(Colonel Rowan.) A letter is sent off generally immediately, to say that the complaint will be inquired into; probably the same moment the complaint is made; the constant practice is to have that letter prepared immediately, and given into the hand of the person who makes the complaint to the Commissioners, stating "that the complaint will be inquired into immediately," in order that they should feel a satisfaction that the thing should be done, without waiting for the result, which sometimes cannot be got at for several days, as the inquiry may occupy a good deal of time. After the complaint has been inquired into, the result, in some shape or other, is always made known to the person who has made the complaint.

Q. 4247.—Does your means of communicating with your Superintendents, and the other superior officers of the establishment, enable you to judge accurately of the mode in which they discharge their duties when out of your sight?—(Mr. Mayne.) We think so, certainly. (Colonel Rowan.) It is, certainly, as far as we are competent to judge.

Q. 4248.—Have you found anything in the conduct of any of the officers so objectionable as to render it necessary for you to dismiss or to get rid of those officers?—(Mr. Mayne.) I remember the case of two Superintendents whom we found not competent for the situation. (Colonel Rowan.) And who in consequence resigned.

Q. 4249.—How did you get possession of the facts that led you to come to the conclusion of their not being competent?—(Mr. Mayne.) We found the division not in the state that it ought to be, either as to the prevention of crime, the general purposes of police, the good conduct of the men, nor the satisfaction given to the inhabitants, and upon talking with the Superintendents on the daily business of police, and from such other opportunities as we had of forming a judgment, we came to the conclusion that they were not fit for the situation.

Q. 4250.—So that in the cases to which you have alluded there was no specific complaint made against the people, but your own observations induced you to imagine they were not competent to discharge their duties?—(Mr. Mayne.) I do not think there was any specific complaint in either case. Also it has happened with several of the Inspectors; we have been obliged to dismiss some, and some we have told, as we did to the Superintendents I have mentioned, that they must resign. We have daily communications with the superior officers of each division.

Q. 4251.—In reference to the complaints which might be made at your office, is the establishment sufficiently large to admit of a complaint being attended to as soon as it is made, and as soon as the party makes his appearance at the office, or are the parties obliged to wait any considerable time before the complaints can be heard?—(Mr. Mayne.) They are almost immediately heard; generally the arrangement is such that the parties coming in to complain are heard almost immediately; I should say immediately. We always give precedence to them before the other business with our own people; and generally such an hour has been appointed that we see them the moment they come; they name the hour themselves, and as soon as they come we see them. It frequently happens that parties have refused to lay complaints before the Magistrates against the police, and have preferred coming before the Commissioners; but I should here wish to say it is our opinion, after the experience we have had, that it would be preferable to send complaints much more frequently to the Magistrates than to us; we conceive it to be less immediately our duty, and I think it would be more satisfactory to the public to have the cases heard before the Magistrates, who decide in public, and who would not be supposed to have any leaning in favour of the police; at the same time, I really believe that we have decided more strictly against the police than a Magistrate would have done, in some, at least, of the cases.

Q. 4252.—That is in consequence of an apprehension that you might be supposed to lean more favourably to your men?—(Colonel Rowan.) Certainly; that is one reason why we wish to get rid of the responsibility, that the public might see we have no leaning either way. (Mr. Mayne.) We wish that the Magistrates should take cognisance even of acts of misconduct of the police, though the offence is only a breach of discipline, whenever the complaint is made by one of the public; we think it would be satisfactory to the public, and would also prevent any insinuations as to the bias that may be supposed to exist in our minds, or complaints of the difficulty of coming to such a distance as from all parts of the town down to the Commissioners' office.

Q. 4253.—With regard to complaints and information made by various parties that have been examined before the Committee as to the difficulty of finding redress at the hands of the Commissioners, is it the wish of the Commissioners that those parties should come forward with specific charges, in order that they might have the opportunity of meeting them?—(Mr. Mayne.) I am convinced we should be able to meet them all. In every case where a specific charge is made, we have been able to give such an answer as appeared to us satisfactory.

Q. 4254.—It has been stated by some gentleman, who has given evidence before the Committee from the Parish of St. Saviour's that the general feeling is, that if complaints were made to the Commissioners, no redress would be obtained, and that therefore they considered that it would be a loss of time to go to the Commissioners' office to make such complaints, and that opinion was strengthened by the case of a person of the name of Garrod, a leather japanner, in Loman's Pond, who was passing down Kent Street, when he was assaulted by a gang of robbers, attacked and knocked down, and very much injured; that several individuals saw the transaction, the police were called, but they refused to take them into custody; the person who was assaulted was told he might obtain a warrant against them, but he thought it would be a complete waste of time, from the characters of the men; and he is stated to have made several applications to the Commissioners at Scotland Yard, both by letter and by personal attendance, and afterwards he addressed a letter to Lord Melbourne, but that letter only pointed out the evils with regard to assault cases, and did not require a reply; but that from the Police Commissioners he received no redress?—(Mr. Mayne.) I have been looking to that part of the statement, but he does not say what was the result of his communication with the Commissioners. It has been stated that the party made several applications to the Commissioners in Scotland Yard, both by letter and by personal attendance, and afterwards a letter was addressed to Lord Melbourne, merely pointing out the evils with regard to assault cases, and it did not require a reply. The complaint is in truth against the law, and not against the police, who only act in obedience to it; but I should say, that as to the letters, we can produce from the office the proceedings upon them. With regard to what may have passed when he came to the Commissioners, I know I have in some cases, and from the tenor of this I think it very likely that I have done so in it: I have admitted the inconvenience to the public of the practice of the police, telling the party that we were acting according to the law on the subject. I have recommended parties to lay the case before the Secretary of State, mentioning the inconvenience to which the public were exposed from the present state of the law, but that the police could not act differently so long as the law existed. It was one of the subjects upon which we recommended, in a letter to the Secretary of State, more than a year ago, that an alteration should be made in the law.

(Evidence of Sir F. A. Roe, Chief Magistrate.)

Q. 1442.—You spoke of the constitutional connection between the Magistrate and the constable?—(A.) I alluded to the way the law views it; a constable appointed at a court leet by the steward of a manor, or at a quarter sessions, becomes the servant of the Magistrate; the constables at the police offices, though differently appointed, are still more so. I never had a wish to appoint the constables; I think it is better elsewhere, but when appointed they are completely under our control; whereas, if appointed by the Commissioners of Police, they would be removable at their discretion, or on the complaint of the officers of their corps, which certainly would alter the relation towards the Magistrate which the law recognises.

Q. 1443. Are the powers of the Superintendent of the police very large?—(A.) They seem to me to be very great.
